Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It cannot be said to be a marsh or slough, and that seems to be about the designation properly applicable to the Hootalinqua. Hon. gentlemen I fancy have contemplated the serious aspect of alienating 4,000,000 acres of land to Mann & Mackenzie. My hon. friend put a very cheerful aspect upon it this afternoon when he told us that the miners of that country would in all probability prefer dealing with Mann & Mackenzie than the Dominion government. All I have to say to that statement is that it is not very flattering to the policy of this government regarding the administration of the Yukon country, not very flattering to the regulations passed by the Minister of the Interior and altered three or four times, when we find hon. gentlemen, supporters of the bill, using as an argument that the miners of that country would prefer dealing with strangers, that private parties would prefer dealing with Mackenzie & Mann than dealing with the government. I always thought the government of the country exercised a paternal influence over industries of this kind and usually passed such regulations as met with public approval. But when we find those public regulations of so undesirable a character that private parties can secure immense concessions and franchises in that country, and deal more generously with the miners than can the government themselves, then I cannot fancy any less flattering description of the policy of that government. Now, very few gentlemen may have considered that a tract of 4,000,000 acres means a mile belt 6,250 miles long, or in other words this government propose giving to Mackenzie & Mann a strip of land say two miles in width stretching along a tract as long the entire line of the Canadian Pacific Railway from the city of Vancouver to the city of Montreal. Hon. gentlemen who have travelled over the Canadian Pacific Railway, who have taken some five or six days to travel on a fairly fast running train from Montreal to Vancouver, through that immense tract of country, and viewing the country a mile on either side, extending between those two cities can then appreciate the magnitude of the grant which is about to be given to those gentlemen. In a speech recently made by Mr. Ogilvie at Victoria he made some reference to the richness and the wealth of those lands, so that hon. gentlemen may comprehend the illimitable wealth about to be alienated by the government and vested in the hands of a firm of contractors for building 150 miles of narrow gauge railway. Let me read to you a short statement made by Mr. Ogilvie at that time as to the enormous wealth of that country and as to its possibilities. He says :

> Bonanza and Eldorado Creeks afford between them 278 claims, the several affluences will yield as many more, and all of these claims are good. I have no hesitation in saying that about a hundred of those on Bonanza will yield upwards of $30,000,000. Claim 30 below, will yield a million in itself, and ten others will yield from $100,000 up. These two creeks will. I am quite confident, turn out from $60,000,000 to $75,000,000, and I can safely say that there is no other region in the world of the same extent that has afforded in the same length of time so many homestakes—fortunes enabling the owners to go home and enjoy the remainder of their days—considering that the work has had to be done with very limited facilities, the scarcity of provisions and of labour, and that the crudest appliances only are as yet available.

Considering, in connection with this grant, that the policy of the government up to the present time has been to reserve alternate claims, these alternate claims are claims which have been reserved in the very richest portions of the Klondike district, but under this contract, will pass to Mann & Mackenzie.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Those reserved claims which lie alongside of million dollar claims referred to by Mr. Ogilvie can be taken by Mann & Mackenzie, will my hon. friend point out anything in the contract or bill which will prevent those men from claiming those reserves. In addition to that we are giving four million acres of land to build what? The Minister of the Interior when interviewed on the subject said, with almost a tremor in his voice, that this was a superhuman undertaking—the greatest railway enterprise undertaken on this continent, and we were led to believe for a short time, until we got authentic information that this 150 miles of road would be hewn out of solid rock or driven through the most formidable physical difficulties with which it was possible for man to grapple. But let us see what Mr. Ogilvie says, the gentleman who seems to be responsible for the policy of the administration in that country. Mr. Ogilvie, when addressing the Victoria board of trade said as follows :

From the head of the Stikine ——

He is now speaking of the Teslin Lake route which we have before us.

From the head of the Stikine the road would follow through an undulating country which presents no obstacles to railway construction, and for the greater part of the distance of 150 miles is pretty well covered with timber.

Here we have the statement of Mr. Ogilvie, an authority upon the configuration of that country, and that it presents no obstacles whatever to railway building.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is not the hon. gentleman reading Mr. Jennings's report.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have read Mr. Jennings's report, and Mr. Jennings says very little about the physical difficulties, if any, which are to be overcome. I might say I had the pleasure coming down the other day on the train with an engineer who had gone over that route, and he informed me that the greater portion of the route was over table lands, involving very little difficulty or outlay in railway building. When you consider this same firm is receiving something like $375,000 from the British Columbia government as a cash subsidy for building the same road, one is almost led to the conclusion that the cash subsidy of the British Columbia government will contribute very largely towards the building of the road.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—And the land subsidy as well.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Surely these gentlemen must have hypnotized both governments. Receiving $375,000 and land grant from British Columbia, and 4,000,000 acres from the Dominion government, surely these gentlemen with their enterprise should be able to construct 150 miles of narrow gauge railway for these valuable grants, leaving out of consideration for the moment the fact——

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I should like to remind the hon. gentleman that they have bonding privileges as well on the main line and its tributaries.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, bonding powers for $10,000,000. With these bonding powers, a British Columbia franchise, a Dominion franchise and an ample bank account these gentlemen have, I fancy with close application will succeed in building the road. Have hon. gentlemen considered for a moment the possible returns of the revenue of this road? I am not now dealing with Mr. Jennings's report as to the carrying capacity, but I am dealing with the argument advanced by the government why this bill should be passed. This government does not seem to take into consideration that there will be any difficulty whatsoever about the carrying over that road of 150,000 passengers, estimated at this number by the hon. member from Halifax. A 100,000 passengers at 15 cents a mile one way only would mean $2,250,000. I am only calculating one way; 100,000 tons of freight at $50 a ton—and $50 a ton is the amount fixed in Mr. Jennings's report—would come to $5,000,000; 100,000 passengers at 15 cents a mile and 100,000 tons of freight at $50 a ton would yield a gross revenue, not including return carriage and freight, of $7,250,000. Now these are the figures to be deduced from facts urged by the government in behalf of the passage of the bill. My hon. friend may say that I am drawing on my imagination or calculating upon a volume of trade which will never take place but I am taking the government figures and knocking off 25 per cent therefrom. I am taking the freight rates as fixed by Mr. Jennings and I say the revenue thus deducible would amount to $7,250,000. Now, I am opposed to the alienation of this quantity of land for another reason than that which I have already stated. If the public resources are thus squandered then we may abandon all idea of securing other routes from other points. Cold comfort was given to those advocating the Edmonton route and urging the building of a line through the interior—and possibly a grant might be brought down during this present session but if these extraordinary and extravagent grants are to be made there will be certainly such an exhaustion of the public resources as to render it impossible for us to consider for a moment the building of the Edmonton road. I would further point out to my hon. friend that this blanket donation which they make to Mackenzie & Mann includes the timber and coal. So impressed was my hon. friend from Miramachi the other morning when he heard Mr. Livernash that he conceded the fact that it would be detrimental to the best interest of the country that the timber should go with those lands to Messrs Mackenzie & Mann. It does justice to his common sense and good judgment, and I would not have expected my hon. friend to come to any other conclusion. When hon. gentlemen consider that the only means a miner has of thawing out the immense depth of frost found in that country is by securing the timber on the public lands, you can then conceive of the calamity, because it would be nothing short of a calamity, that the government should alienate all its timber resources in the Yukon. Fire wood in that country, for the purpose of carrying on operations, is worth $25 a cord at the mouth of the shaft. When you take into consideration that a cord of wood will only thaw ten cubic feet of earth, and when you further take into consideration that from present operations the frost is known to extend at least fifty or sixty feet into the earth, you can realize the amount of cord wood that will be necessary for carrying on the rude and crude operations of placer mining in that country. You alienate to this firm of contractors this immense tract of land, taking with it not only the minerals but the timber, and you render the miner powerless and unable to carry on his operations, and you place in the pockets of these men a fortune which might possibly exceed even the value of the lands themselves. The same may be said of the coal deposits. I find in the statement made by Mr. Ogilvie, in the same speech that I referred to some minutes ago, that the coal deposits in that country are very large indeed. I will read a short extract:

> We have coal in abundance. It is to be found in the Rocky Mountains, or, rather, the ridge of high mountains running parallel to them in the interior. A deposit of coal in this range runs right through our territory. At two points near Forty-mile it also crops out, in one place only about 40 feet from the River Yukon. Further up the Yukon on one of its many smaller feeders, at Fifteen-mile Creek and on the head of the Thronda, there are also out-croppings of coal. On the branches of the Stewart and on some of the Five Fingers of the Yukon, coal is also exposed. In fact, there is any amount of coal in the country with which to work our minerals when we can get in the necessary facilities.

You hand over to these people all the coal deposits of this immense country—and you manacle the miner in placing the whole of that country in the hands of a corporation or firm of contractors, who very naturally will take the greatest amount of money out of it. Another point to which I should like to make reference and which has often been repeated here by the Secretary of State, and also the Minister of Justice, viz., that this in fact is a gamble—that very little value is to be attached to these lands. In speaking of the immense tract of land to be alienated it has been the policy of the government to disparage the value of those lands and speak of them as entirely worthless and impoverished. It reminds me of the late Bill Nye's description of some lands in Ireland which were so poor that they could not raise a row on them. Mr. Ogilvie who seems to be an authority on their richness, in his lectures in England, speaks of the inexhaustible wealth of that country and states positively that for generations to come untold millions of gold would be extracted from them. But my hon. friend says it is a gamble. The Minister of Justice is the minister to whom the people of Canada would look to suppress anything of a gambling transaction. If there is anything which peculiarly comes within his department it is the protection of the public from gambling and swindling combinations of all descriptions. But we know very well who will be the sufferers from the floating of this transaction. It is not a gamble so far as the contractors are concerned. We know very well that this bill will no sooner receive the assent of parliament than the news will be cabled to England and the land will be floated on the English market before we have the news in Canada of the negotiations. Will any hon. gentleman doubt that it would be even an improbable thing for these contractors to divide those 4,000,000 acres of land into 40,000 parcels of 100 acres each, and unload them upon the English, the American, and the Canadian markets at $5 an acre. Mr. Osler, member for West Toronto and a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company said very truly that this land grant, if put on the London market, would realize to-day more than the twenty-five million acres of arable lands given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and there is not an hon. gentleman familiar with stock operations in London and elsewhere but knows only too well the vast possibilities that this immense grant of land is capable of realizing in cash. The people who would put their money into this enterprise are those who could least afford to lose the money with which they would speculate at this time of feverish excitement on Klondike speculations. We know very well that those large amounts of money raised for schemes of this kind are contributed by widows and orphans and curates and others who can least afford to lose the money invested in them. I say it is the duty not only of the Minister of Justice but of the Canadian parliament to prevent schemes of this kind being unloaded upon the credulous people of Great Britain. There has been already too much exploitation of schemes of this kind in Great Britain. As my hon. friend to my right said the other night he could point out in different parts of the North-west large tracts of land tied up by foreign corporations which are not available for settlers which remain unimproved which are held waiting until settlers improve the contiguous lands so as to bring them into value. So in the district of the country in which I lived could I point out to you hundreds of thousands of acres lying enshrouded in silence from the morning of creation down to the present time not paying taxes, unimproved, waiting until the settlement of neighbouring lands improves their value or waiting until the municipality or local government carries out improvements—awaiting local enterprises to bring their lands into value. I say that exploitation of this kind has been carried to such an extent as to prove ruinous to the credit of Canada, and no higher duty can devolve on the government of this Dominion than to prohibit in every possible way every scheme of this kind so far as it can possibly be done. Now, in conclusion, gentlemen, let me say that we have heard a great deal in regard to the responsibility of the Senate upon this question. Many threats have been made as to what the Senate should do and what will be done if it should not pursue a certain course. It is not necessary for me to say anything in regard to the functions of the Senate. My hon. friend from Richmond delivered so admirable a speech the other night upon the functions of the Senate upon the offices which it has to perform under the constitution that it would be superflous and presumptuous for me to attempt to amplify them. Suffice it to say that there is nothing clearer than the fact that those who designed our constitution, those who erected this superstructure of confederation, built it upon principles deep and firm, principles which underlie the British system of government, and they clearly designed that this Senate, while co-ordinate with the Commons, should exercise its functions freely and independently of that body. They designed that it should be a check upon all hasty legislation, and I am free to say and hon. gentlemen know right well that in the thirty years history of this Dominion there was never in the annals of that history an opportunity in which the Senate has been called upon to exercise that check to the extent as upon this occasion. We hear very much said of the independence and also of the partisanship of this body. My hon. friend the Secretary of State stated the other night that we had prejudged this bill, that we had shown a partisanship unworthy of this body, yet I appeal to hon. gentlemen present as to who are the independent members, who in both Houses of parliament have voted or are about to vote upon this bill? Are they those members who, at the crack of the party whip, have marshalled themselves into line and recorded their votes in favour of the bill, which, in their inmost conscience they know to be one of the most vicious and one of the most flagrant acts ever attempted to be put through this parliament of Canada. I say, with every degree of confidence, that as a flagrant violation of the rights of the people of this Dominion, as a flagrant alienation of those public resources which we own, there has been no parallel to this bill in the annals of the Canadian parliament. I therefore ask who are the independent members who have taken their stand upon this particular bill? Are they those whom I have indicated as obeying the party call, or are they not those who have resisted lobbying influences more powerful than any others which have been brought to bear upon the passage of any former bill? Are they not those who have laughed at the threats which have been made by a hireling section of the government press to compel the Senate to pass this measure by threatening our abolition? I say the latter class of men are the men who have pursued an independent course upon this bill and who have exercised free and independent action and who will continue to do so. It has been well said that a heavy responsibility is cast upon us, a high and important duty is to be performed. We all recognize that; we all realize too, that we are prepared to discharge that responsibility, and I say that that responsibility and that high and important duty cannot be better and more clearly discharged, consistant with the conservention of our public interests than by voting for the motion of my hon. friend from Victoria that this bill be given a siz months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I hope my hon. colleagues will give me their indulgent hearing to my attempt to speak in a language which is not mine. I would ask permission to answer some remarks which fell from the lips of the hon. member for Hastings (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) when he answered the speech I had the honour of delivering in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the Throne. The hon. gentleman, after some complimentary words to my address—for which I thank him—declared:

My limited knowledge of French is not such as to enable me to form such a correct opinion of his remarks as will his own countrymen and those who do understand the language. However, I understand sufficient to find that he, like many others who have entered this chamber, materially change their opinion and views upon the existence of a second chamber. We have observed during the past few years that this chamber has been threatened with annihilation, or at least reformation, by politicians and by newspapers.

I wish to simply remark that there had been no phrase of mine containing any such declaration as would warrant the hon. gentleman in thinking that I had altered my opinion as to the matter of reforming the Senate. Like all the members of the Liberal party, in 1893, in this very city of Ottawa, I subscribed to the programme of the Liberal party which was submitted to the people and endorsed by them on the 23rd of June, 1896. In that platform appeared one article calling for a modification of the Senate as at present constituted. That verdict means that the people of Canada consider that a second chamber should be elected direct by the people, or according to the French system, or according to the United States system by the local legislatures, and the only part of my speech which could, perhaps, have been construed as showing a change of opinion in that respect is the following which has been translated:

I have searched the reports of your debates for the past 20 years to find lessons and examples, and I have found the sound traditions and the customs which appear to have had for their foundation a constant respect for the popular will. I intend faithfully to follow the road which you have so well marked out, and in which I am certain we shall not cease to touch elbows.

These records of the Senate of Canada, from the year 1878 to 1896, I had examined, and found to my liking. I had nowhere found that this chamber had been remiss in its duties, yet at no time had I noticed a conflict between this House and the popular chamber. Full sway had been given by the Senate of Canada to the House of Commons. I noticed that the debt of $77,000,000 or thereabouts, with which we started in 1867, had increased by leaps and bounds to the enormous sum of about $300,000,000, and not once had this chamber thought proper to arrest the growing indebtedness. Land grants to the tune of 67,000,000 acres in the North-west and Manitoba to railways and ministerial favourites, covering the best part of the fertile land, have been from year to year bestowed, and not once, as I say, had the Senate of Canada thought proper to intervene and prevent the popular chamber, or the government of the day, from bestowing these grants. The effect has been what the hon. member from Calgary has just mentioned; those enormous grants are paralysing the North-west and Manitoba. Neither did I find, during those 18 years, in a single page of the history of this chamber, any check, any probing or any sifting into the way public moneys had been expended. I would recall, as a typical case, the farcical comedy which was enacted in the House of Commons when the Hon. Mr. Edgar, from his seat, accused Sir Adolphe Caron of receiving subsidies from the Temiscouata and Lake St. Johns Railways. The government of the day, with its solid majority at its back, took the accusation from the hands of the Hon. Mr. Edgar and modified it to suit itself, so that Sir Adolphe might stand his trial upon the accusation as the then government wished to submit it. And what was the consequence? Not a murmur from this House protesting against such a course when a minister of the Crown was accused of receiving, directly or indirectly, subsidies from a railway company. This serves to emphasize the fact that complete sway was given the government of the day in the administration of public affairs.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he recollects in 1886 or 1887, when the Liberals were in opposition, the motion for the six months' hoist in the case of the Pacific Railway Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I do not thoroughly catch the meaning of the interruption of my hon. colleague but I shall endeavour to answer him if I can understand him.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I ask the hon. gentleman whether he remembers the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1886 or 1887, when the Liberals were in opposition in this House, when the present hon. Secretary of State, as leader of the opposition, moved the six months' hoist?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—This is quite possible, but was not this exceptional motion on the part of a member of this chamber squelched by an immense majority? I have no doubt whatever that this vote forms part of the traditions of this House. The hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) defied any one in this House to find a contract of such magnitude as the one under discussion to-day given without tender; I will mention one. When I say of equal magnitude I am saying very little, it was a contract not to be compared with the present contract in regard to the amount involved. In 1878, after the elections of the 17th September of that year, a majority of the people had pronounced specially upon the tariff question. Generally the railway policy of the government had been discussed, but I have seen nowhere such declarations from the then leaders of the opposition as would make the people of Canada believe that within a year, or a year and a half, without tenders being called for, without the public being notified, a contract would be entered into with a syndicate, chosen specially by the government of the day, giving them the work which had already cost the country millions in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway in addition to 25 million acres of land, 25 million dollars in money, exemption from taxation for their lands for all time and a binding monoply. All this startled the Dominion of Canada, and yet this chamber did not feel justified in arresting the progress of the government in this undertaking. The government of Canada, at the time, found docile supporters in this House who thought, rightly, that the responsibility should rest where the people had put it, upon the shoulders of those who would have to render an account of their stewardship. The Senate of Canada, at the time, endorsed that contract, which represents 20 times, if not 50 times, the amount of the contract which is under discussion here, without a murmur and without protest. It will be remembered that after that contract was signed, other parties deposited $1,300,000 of money and made a far better offer to the government of Canada, but the contract had been closed; it was useless to try to go back on what had been decided; the new syndicate had to take back its $1,300,000, and the Canadian Pacific Railway contract was ratified. I find, in connection with this railway company to which I have been referring, that, later on, when the government came down and asked that $30,000,000 should be loaned them—quite an amount—this chamber again decided not to thwart the government in its desires to make that loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Is it not probable that the majority of the Senate thought it was right?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am examining the record of this chamber to see if, in the present contract, there are such things as would warrant the Senate in breaking away from its traditions and coming in conflict with the popular branch of parliament, a thing it was not wont to do between 1878 and 1896.

I would not want to be accused of seeing the Senate in a different light from that in which it is seen by others. Here is a good Conservative paper, the Montreal Star, which, as all who live in the province of Quebec will admit, is a most violent Tory paper. In former times, when it wished to ingratiate itself with the public, it used to be Tory at election times and independent between election times. Since it has become solidly established, with a large circulation, it has thrown off the mask and is Tory now all the time. I prefer that; I prefer to know where people stand, although I must say the conduct of that paper in former times did not surprise, nor did it succeed in deluding the people of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—It has got its eyes opened now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It does not seem to enjoy being in opposition; they are so eager to return to power that they have no more time to simulate independence. That paper says:

> Every assailant of the Senate for years past has charged it with being nothing more than a costly contrivance for saying "ditto" to the Commons. This has been its great sin. This weakness has been the cause of practically all the feeling against the Upper House which may exist in the country. When the government was conservative and the Senate was conservative, this charge amounted to party subserviency—grave enough, but by no means the gravest possible. So many people are tarred with the same party brush that they do not feel free to attack the Senate too strongly for the common sin.

Naturally that paper goes on to say that it is time the Senate should make a break and, after having said for 20 years yea, yea all the time, it should stand now and say nay, nay all the time.

The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Miller), and the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) recalled the numerous occasions when the Liberal opposition protested against money being paid out by Orders in Council without the assent of parliament. I will take that declaration to be true, without applying it to this present case, but can we not turn the argument against these hon. gentlemen, and ask them if on all those occasions, or on any of those occasions when the Liberal party protested against contracts being given without tender, or money being voted by Order in Council, these gentlemen sided with the Liberal opposition? I think I have found the uniform desire of this House to antagonize as little as possible the government of the day which has the confidence of the people, while at the same time fully doing its duty. This House, as the hon. member from Calgary has said, has for its first essential duty to check hasty or unmatured legislation. It considers the legislation which is submitted to it, and when exorbitant privileges are granted, curtails those privileges. It has in its committees closely investigated legislation, and I am sure that the Senate has not been remiss in its duty during those thirty years. It has done its duty as the framers of the constitution thought it should. I think the Senate, by leaving the responsibility of important measures to the government of the day, since 1878 and before that time, has done its duty. That the framers of our constitution thought this House should remain in harmony with the House of Commons is clear from the speeches made at the time of confederation. I will cite from the confederation debate what the Hon. Sir Hector Langevin said:

> I shall reply to the observation of the hon. member for Hochelaga on that subject. That hon. gentleman objects to the appointment of the legislative councillors by the central government, and adds that those councillors will be appointed by a Tory government, and will necessarily be re-elected from among the Tories. In making that assertion the hon. member did not act with that frankness which we are entitled to expect from him. (Hear, hear.) He hardly alluded, if he did so at all, to the clause in the resolutions by which the opposition in the different parts of the confederation are protected. In that clause it is provided that the central parliament in making the appointment in question, shall be careful to watch over the interests of the opposition as well as over those of the ministerial party. Now, Mr. Speaker, when a government binds itself in this way, is it reasonable and fair to believe or to suppose that it will break its word which has been so solemnly pledged? For my part I am convinced that the members of the present government, should they form part of the central government, would fulfil what has been promised, and would watch over the rights of the opposition as over those of the other party.

And Sir John Macdonald clearly explains the meaning of those words, when he says :—

So it is quite clear that should there be, on any question, a difference of opinion between the Upper and Lower Houses, the government of the day being obliged to have the confidence of the majority in the popular branch—would, for the purpose of bringing the former into accord and sympathy with the latter, fill up any vacancies that might occur with men of the same political feelings and sympathies with the government, and, consequently, with those of the majority in the popular branch ; and all the appointments of the administration would be made with the object of maintaining the sympathy and harmony between the two Houses.

This is what Sir John Macdonald said in 1867, and this has been the condition of the Senate from 1878 to 1896, during which time I have closely watched the conduct of this House. If my hon. colleagues are not to be actuated by prejudice, what is there in this contract which would lead them to change their minds and enter with a light heart into a conflict with a government which has to-day the confidence of the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific ? Why should the present chamber deviate from its traditions ?

I will examine a few of the objections, which appear to me to be most serious, which have been raised by my hon. colleagues to this bill. These objections are as to the form and as to the matter of the contract. Some of my hon. colleagues have said that undue delay had taken place before this contract was entered into by the government, and that the government should have acted upon the report of Mr. Ogilvie and asked for an appropriation before the close of last session of this parliament. This would mean that the government were supposed to be sufficiently well informed before May and June last. As a matter of fact Mr. Ogilvie's report gave but a cursory statement of the situation, and the government was aware that Mr. Ogilvie had been shut up in that part of the country for two years without knowing what had taken place in the outside world. It would have been dire folly on the part of the government to act upon the report of Mr. Ogilvie, who did not know what Europe or America would think of the discoveries made in the Yukon, and it was only during the latter part of last summer that the government realized that there was to be a rush to that region. Some hon. gentlemen have said that the government neglected its duty to obtain the necessary information as to the route to be followed. Now, I would ask in the experience of the hon. gentlemen who surround me how often have we noticed that ministers of the Crown have taken the trouble that the hon. Minister of the Interior took in travelling from Ottawa to Victoria and from Victoria to the passes and going up a certain portion of the Stikine River ?

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—How far up ?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—He went certainly past Wrangel, and as the Minister of the Interior said in the other House, how could we decide upon a route before inquiring as to the depth of water in the rivers flowing into the Pacific, or the depth of Teslin Lake and the Hootalinqua River ? How could he decide as to which was the best route without having an engineer's report ? It was only when Mr. Jennings's report was handed in on the 13th and 14th of January last that the government could safely decide upon the best route to adopt. The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) has asked why did the government jump at the Stikine route rather than take any other. Every one will admit that the farther north we go on the Pacific coast the nearer we are to Dawson City, but the government laid down, and very properly so, the principle that we should not have to cross United States territory to reach our own land. They discarded Pyramid Harbour, Dyea, Skagway, and the passes leading from them, because then we would have been in the hands of the United States government, and when Mr. Jennings's report came to hand, they found that they had a cheap and safe route that they could use in connection with the water courses and decided upon that route. The accusation has been launched against the government that not only was there undue delay, but that there was indecent haste when they decided to act, that there was no excuse for the government failing to ask for tenders. What was the situation in January last ? The government realized that there would be a rush to these gold fields, that the bonding exactions at Dyea and Skagway were intolerable. The government were convinced that the manufacturers and traders of this country wanted to have the way clear for that trade which was going into their own country, and they quite properly decided that in this case of emergency there was no use waiting. Some of my hon. colleagues say "but why rush into the contract ten days before parliament met?" If no contract had been made, if no mandate had been given to the contractors to open up a wagon or sleigh road, if no such undertaking had been agreed upon at that moment, where would we be to-day? We know very well that the two branches of parliament—I would more especially mention the popular branch—could have blocked the way of the government so that that wagon road, or sleigh road, which serves to-day for people going into the Klondike with their Canadian goods via Stikine River and Teslin Lake—as is stated in reports which are reliable — this sleigh road would not be open at this moment. The supplies and materials for the construction of this road, which must be finished by the first of September, needed to be forwarded to the Pacific coast and taken up past Wrangel, yet they would still have to be purchased and forwarded if the contract had not been signed. My hon. colleagues will say "how could all these things take place before the contract is ratified?" When the contractors took their chances, relying upon the good faith of the government of the day, and the traditions of this House, I have no doubt they were fully justified in purchasing their supplies and even forwarding them to the Pacific coast. The hon. gentleman from Calgary has repeated the statement made by some of my colleagues, that this contract had been entered into with closed doors, that the public had not been told the fact that there was such a contract to be entered into. I have heard many times statements in reference to this matter, of people who have been met in the trains and elsewhere, but I may inform my hon. colleagues who might be ignorant of it, that in the city of Montreal every contractor knew that the government of the day was about to construct a railway in order to give access to that country. Mr. Kersey had been for a month in the city of Montreal interviewing capitalists, seeing men with reference to the formation of companies; and very many railway contractors, some of whom I know, and with whom I conversed on that subject, absolutely knew of the desire of the government to construct a railway into that region. My hon. colleague from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) has spoken of the course of Mr. Hamilton Smith in making a bold offer to the government at a far lower figure than the one accepted by the government from Mackenzie & Mann. It was extraordinary that such courage should have come upon this man after such an exhibition of timidity. Before the contract was signed a citizen of Canada whispered, or mentioned en passant, to the Minister of the Interior that there was a Mr. Hamilton Smith who was to call on the minister. Mr. Hamilton Smith did not materialize; he was seen nowhere, did not approach the public buildings, sent his card to no one, and I wonder if my hon. colleagues would have expected the Minister of the Interior to advertise in the papers for that gentleman. There is no doubt that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann are first class contractors. I do not need, I suppose, to cite the opinion of Sir Charles Tupper, who has declared in press and repeated in parliament his confidence in the capacity of these men. There is no doubt, judging from the language which has fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman from Calgary, that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann are fully able to carry out that contract and are perfectly solvent to fulfil the engagements they have entered into. I would like to ask, outside of Mr. Hamilton Smith, who made an offer to the government when he knew there was no danger of it being accepted, and who went away from this country as soon as he had affixed his signature to that document—outside of Mr. Hamilton Smith, who in Canada declared or showed any willingness to enter into an undertaking?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There was no chance of doing so. There was no advertisement for tenders.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—As I have stated, a number of railway contractors, rich men that I knew personally in Montreal, were aware of the desire of the government to build that road. Mr. Kersey, who represented a number of millionaires from Great Britain, from Belgium, from Germany and France, who was backed by powerful capitalists declined to go into that undertaking, and when the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) says that he was only given two days for a decision, that it was taking that man by the throat, it does not look so when we read his letter of the 29th January, 1898:

DEAR MR. SIFTON,—With reference to our conversation of last evening, I communicated fully by cable last night both to Devonshire House and Chatsworth the ideas of the government, as I understand them, with regard to the construction of the railway between Glenora and Teslin.

Saturday, as you are aware, is a difficult day to transact business in London, but as I had already prepared my friends for the message which was sent last night, I have every hope of receiving an answer at any moment, and that I shall be able to lay before you a definite and favourable proposition for the construction of the work within a few hours.

And then follows the other letter through which he informs the government that his principals are not ready to undertake the building of that road within the time specified. It has been stated quite often before this House that the Stikine was not an all-Canadian route. At the same time, some preference has been shown for a route starting from Pyramid Harbour through the passes. The government has been asked if the bonding regulations made at Dyea and Skagway were not satisfactory, and why not construct a line of railway from Pyramid Harbour up to Teslin Lake? It is very clear that some hon. gentlemen in this room would see no objection to building from a terminus in United States territory. If we start from the United States territory we do so by tolerance. The tolerance which is exercised to-day are we sure that it will be continued to-morrow? That tolerance seems to satisfy some hon. gentlemen in this House, who, at the same time, are afraid of the Stikine route which is guaranteed by treaty. But there is more than the treaty; there is this guarantee we have against any interference by the United States government; we can always extend our railway down to Observatory Inlet and fall back on our own undisputed territory. The Americans would not be slow, I am quite sure, in helping themselves if we built from Pyramid Harbour, but they will be much slower in doing so when we use the Stikine River, because we have simply to extend that railway down to the coast in British Columbia territory. Not only has it the advantage of being an all-Canadian route—and all the miners who are to-day on the Chilkoot Pass or the White Pass will bear witness to my declaration—but it is by far the best route. We all know the situation that prevails in the passes, and the number of people who are turning their backs on the passes and going straight to Wrangel to ascend the Stikine. It simply shows that we have the easiest route, undoubtedly; because, when those 150 miles are crossed, either by sleigh road, as it is to-day, or by railroad, as it will be next September, we follow the river without having to climb the hills and risk life and limb in those terrible passes. It is all the more important that we should build that road which will bring the people of all countries to pay us tribute. The hon. member for Calgary asked a moment ago if the whole world would not be able to use the Stikine River and the railway. Undoubtedly the whole world will have the advantage of using this railway, but those who prefer, instead of paying 25 or 30 per cent duty to our customs, to purchase goods in Canada and save that duty, will enrich our country by so much. There is no doubt that when it will go to the world, through the advertisements that our transportation companies will publish, that gold seekers can reach the Klondike, there is no duty to be paid, that without being subject to any customs regulations, and by an all-through route, they will purchase their supplies in our country and our commerce will thereby be increased considerably. In fact, to-day I know of orders amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars that have been placed in Montreal because the people who have come there are convinced that it is cheapest to purchase their goods in Canada and the easiest way to reach the Klondike.

There seemed to remain, when the debate on this bill closed in the other House, but one serious objection urged against it. The other objections the discussion had cleared, and there remained practically when this discussion closed in the House of Commons, that is, but the land grant. It is admitted on all sides that those lands are solely valuable as gold-bearing lands. The first object of the company, if this contract is ratified, will be to prospect and find gold, so as to stake its claims; but when it has found gold, will it be able to choose the area it pleases; will it be able to ask for a few acres of land or a few hundred of feet? No; if the company want to secure the gold they have found they must lay down a line for 24 miles and take alternate sections of that land; they must stake it on a length of 24 miles with a width of six miles, three miles on each side of the line. There may be no gold in the second block; there may be no gold in the third, or the fourth or the fifth blocks, yet that company, in order to secure the gold it has found, will have to lay down a line 24 miles and take its chances.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is no hardship.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But it cannot be said for a certainty that gold will be found throughout the whole length of the 24 miles, neither can it be said for a certainty,—if gold is found in a creek, or in the bed of a river, — that there will be gold in the breadth of three miles—quite the contrary. It is admitted that gold has only been found within 300 feet of the shore of those rivers, so that you have not only valueless lands in the depth of the blocks of land given those people, but you have the risk that if gold is found in one block, it will not be found in the other 21 miles. There is another difficulty which these contractors will encounter; it is the fact that in a number of cases they will find that claims have been staked already, for we all know that the contractors will take no land and can take no land before the 15th June. Now, we will have many thousands of miners roaming about that land staking claims wherever they can find gold, and the company will have to meet this difficulty of having claims already taken in a number of the blocks which they will choose. It is true that the company may commence operations in quartz mining, but we all know that it takes about 90 per cent of the gold taken out in developing lodes and ledges; a powerful company will be able to develop such lodes and ledges and make the industry pay when prospectors will pass by without giving a thought to the chances; and I think that this company, instead of doing an injury to the prospector will simply help a great number of men who, after losing their all in the attempt to find placer gold will fall back upon that company for employment in quartz mining. I think it is admitted that it is not the gold that will be dug out of the Klondike that will enrich Canada; it is the trade that will be done by Canada; it is the commerce that will receive an impulse quite commensurate with the number of people that will be working there. The gold will go to 90 per cent of strangers that are flocking into this land, but the materials which they will buy and the food which they will need in order to live there and which will be drawn from this country will be the source of prosperity to the country.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is right.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—We have no doubt, from what has been said, that the commerce of Canada will be considerably increased, and will profit immensely by the discoveries that have been made. It is for the government to give a chance to the commerce of Canada, to give them the proportionate aid necessary for the purpose of taking the larger part of the commerce that will be done with this part of Canada and with the people who will go into that country. It seems to me that we have not had in the past sufficient opportunities of congratulating the government on the fact that they have made a contract for the building of a railway without spending a cent of the money of this country. Our debt, as I have said, is in the neighbourhood of three hundred million dollars, and it seems to me when the government say: "Here we will build a hundred and fifty miles of railway that will benefit the commerce of Canada and will not cost the country one cent, but will be simply built by lands which are covered with snow which are only valuable to those who will bring their own money to work it," it seems to me the parliament of Canada should hasten to congratulate the government in making such a contract, and congratulate themselves that the debt of Canada is not increased one cent by the transaction.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Why should you ruin the contractors by giving them land of that kind, if they are to be of no use to them?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. member from Marquette (Mr. Boulton) has said that the contractors will hasten to put their stock on the British market. The hon. gentleman calls issuing stock and bonds taxing the people. Well, apparently, it will not be taxing the people of Canada if that stock is to be unloaded in the London markets, but supposing those contractors obtain sufficient money to build that railway by issuing bonds and stock which would be taken up in the old country, they are doing so at their own risk, it is true, but I ask could the government build that railway on the same terms itself? It has been mentioned that it was a gamble. It is not a gamble on the part of the government. The government risks nothing and gets its railway. What does it want? 150 or 175 miles of road. It gets that without any risk, and the gamble is on the part of the contractors who may build that road with their own money, or with the proceeds of stock subscribed by European investors. Those European capitalists are already taking stock in those numerous companies presided over by some of the members of parliament of Canada. The stock of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann will, I am quite sure, be as good and, according to the statements made by some hon. gentlemen, much better than the stock of other companies. I am not alarmed at all at the prospect of the people in Europe gambling over the Klondike; if they do not gamble in the stocks of the Klondike, they will do so in mines or elsewhere. With the boom that has been given the contractors, Mackenzie & Mann, by some hon. gentlemen who have spoken, I have no doubt that the faith of those intended investors would be greater, but as a matter of fact those investors will simply have to do what other companies are doing. What are these companies to do? Send engineers and prospectors. I suppose that Mackenzie & Mann, when they will have secured a certain area of land, will send their laborers to dig for gold. The risk will be with the investors, as it has been with other investors who have taken the stock of the numerous companies that we all know of, but I do not see that the government is a party to the gamble. Everybody knows what the government gives. It gives those people 25,000 acres of land per mile.

An Hon. MEMBER—Who puts up the stake?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The government is giving land which to-day is covered with snow, which will have to be worked if goldis to be found, for gold will not be found everywhere. We all know that the people have not simply to cross to the Klondike, take their pick and shovel and work two or three days and find gold. Hundreds and thousands of them have been working in the Klondike to try and find gold for months, and some have even lost their lives in the attempt. We all know it is not an easy task. The few will succeed; the majority will fail. But it does not mean because of that that the government is deceiving any one. The government is giving those people land about which the government knows nothing, except, generally that there is gold in that region. People who would invest their money in the bonds of that company would simply take the risk they would be ready to take with any other company, and I repeat the government could not itself (its dignity would prevent it) build a road under such conditions. The contractors will do so, and there is nothing immoral about it. We have Sir Charles Tupper and the Hon. Mr. Foster and a number of gentlemen in the other House who are promoters of such companies offering their chances to investors, chances based upon the light of their prospecting, and the public will know exactly where they are when they take the bonds and stocks of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, just as much as they will when they take the bonds and stocks of the other companies in which Sir Charles Tupper and other members of parliament are interested. The hon. member from Westmoreland stated in connection with the question which I am now discussing that there was but one party to the game who held all the winning cards. The party, I am quite sure, is the government, because the winning card, the whole end to be obtained, is the building of this railroad, and it is to be built whether there be gold or no gold in the thousands of acres of land given to Mackenzie & Mann. But land will still be plentiful for the prospectors; in fact it goes without saying that, inasmuch as the alternate blocks are given to these contractors, at least as much land will remain to the government. We all know that hundreds of thousands of men can overrun that country and stake their claims for the next ten years and there would still remain enough land to deliver over to Mackenzie & Mann under their contract. I would mention in this connection the fact which has been put before this House by the hon. member for Lauzon (Mr. Bolduc) of the Beauce district suffering from the monopoly given to a gentleman in that region. He has, never theless, neglected to mention that the monopoly which paralyzed the development of the gold mines there covered tll the known gold regions of that part of Beauce; consequently, it is not a parallel case, because in the Beauce district the difficulties they encountered came from the fact that all the gold bearing lands were in one hand, while in the Klondike there will remain millions and millions acres of land when Mackenzie & Mann have served themselves. I would mention one other objection which has been urged against this contract. I simply mention it because I think it has been fully explained. There is no monopoly given to these contractors. The only end in view by the limitation put in that contract by the government is to prevent the building of lines from the United States territory. The government reserves to itself to say when such a line can be constructed, and I say nowhere is there a monopoly in favour of Mackenzie & Mann. I will admit that it is declared that Mackenzie & Mann will have the preference in the extension of the line from Telegraph Creek down to the Pacific coast, but that preference will be given under the terms that the government will fix. If Mackenzie & Mann refuse to build the road on the conditions that will be mentioned by the government, then the government can address itself to other contractors. It is simply giving a preference when the terms are fixed by the government itself, and there is no monopoly in the clause mentioned. There cannot be any monopoly in that clause. There cannot be any monopoly, because British Columbia could, of its own accord, give a charter to a railway company, so this parliament has no power to give a monopoly to Mackenzie & Mann, even if there were one in the contract, because the province of British Columbia could thwart the will of this parliament by granting charters to other companies if it saw fit.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The monopoly is from the Alaska boundary into the Yukon district. There is a monopoly in clause 4 of the contract. It is not in British Columbia at all; it is in the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is the monopoly I have spoken of—the reservation by the government of the right to allow another road to be built.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is not the Stikine River in British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Part of it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—So that the only monopoly the government could create would be from the United States line. I quite understand that the government should reserve to itself the right to say at what date it would allow the construction of a line from the United States frontier, because this contract has been made and the route has been chosen specially to avoid the United States territory so as not to be under their dictation.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—If clause 4 does not give a monopoly, then there is no clause in any Act that does give a monopoly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is a monopoly hard and fast in the government's hands. Clause 4 is the one I have just referred to, which gives no monopoly to the present contractors.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What is the use of it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—To protect the government from Mackenzie & Mann building such a line to the passes, and as the undertaking is based upon the necessity of obtaining an all-Canadian route, I quite understand that the government should take these precautions against a branch line being built from the trunk line into the United States territory. If that clause was not there the contractors might defeat the object the government had in view by building such a line, and I quite understand that the government should protect themselves by putting in such a stipulation.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is put in by the contractors.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Whenever the government chooses to build, it can do so under that clause.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The contractors told me they would not take the contract with that clause left out.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—When any one tries to make a monopoly out of that clause, it must appear in black and white. If, as I have said, prejudice and partisanship do not obscure the better judgment of some members of this House, I have no doubt the measure will pass. Yet, if I judge by remarks made during this debate by some of my hon. colleagues, I would be somewhat diffident as to the decision to be given. It has struck me that there were prejudices against the present government in the minds of some of my colleagues, and I will say that these prejudices appear more pointedly in a remark made by the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry in answer to the hon. member from Toronto. Everybody in this part of the chamber heard the remark that was made. The hon. gentleman from Toronto was just declaring: "I have been a Conservative, and I am not a deserter," and the hon. member for De Salaberry said, "It would look like it."

Hon. Mr. VILLENEUVE—When did that conversation take place?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It was a remark made by the hon. gentleman when the hon. member from Toronto said, "I am not a deserter," and the hon. senator from De Salaberry said, "It would look like it."

Hon. Mr. VILLENEUVE—I do not remember saying it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I heard the remark, and I think the hon. gentleman, who sits generally to the right of the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry, heard it very well, but it strikes me in these remarks, as well as in other remarks that have fallen from the lips of my hon. colleague, that there are some prejudices against the present government. I can cite the case of the hon. gentleman from Richmond (Mr. Miller), who declared that when he read the first article of the Globe which explained the contract in its details, he was at once seized with prejudice against the measure. It is very peculiar that at the same time that the hon. gentleman from Richmond was seized with prejudice against the measure after reading this article, the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper should be seized with prejudices in favour of the measure. The very same article produced those two different results.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is there not one member without prejudice in this House? The hon. gentleman who is speaking has no prejudice of this kind.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I cannot catch the gist of the remark by the hon. gentleman from Victoria.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It has not any gist.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Perhaps some members of this House are under the impression that the Conservative press of this country reflects the public opinion of the country to-day. I know that when people are in the habit of reading certain papers they think that the declarations of those papers represent the trend of public opinion. I will remind them that quite a change has happened in the last two years in this country, and that to-day, instead of the people being against the government, with a vast majority the government stands as popular as ever. I have stated that for 18 years this chamber has given full sway to the government of the day.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—That statement is not correct. It is only a session or two ago when a very important measure was brought before this House and had to be thrown out.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—This simply confirms what I have just said, that perhaps the present government was not as well treated in this matter as the other administrations that held power from 1878 to 1896. I was speaking of the 18 years of Conservative rule that we have had in this country, and I was referring to the constant sympathy that seemed to have existed in this chamber in favour of the government of the day, in regard to giving fair play to those administrations that were entrusted by the people with the management of public affairs. I have not a word to say against such traditions: on the contrary, the first time I spoke in this chamber, I declared that I accepted these conditions and intended to follow them, because they seemed to be based on a constant respect for public opinion. One must not forget that the present government ought to have that same measure of sympathy from this chamber that preceding administrations have had. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Boulton) mentioned the other day that the present government seemed to have lost some of its prestige if we judged by the last Ontario elections. Well, I would remind him that this side of the Rocky Mountains there is not one government to-day that is under Conservative rule. This shows pretty well the trend of ideas in this country, and the desire of the people to have a change once in a while. Eighteen years of Conservative rule, or Liberal rule, it seems to me, is quite long enough. We see in Great Britain governments changing nearly every five years, and yet it would appear by some statements which have fallen from the lips of the hon. member from Richmond (Mr. Miller) that his greatest desire to-day would be that those 18 years should have continued. Well, the people of Canada are free to choose their own governments. They have, after bestowing their confidence completely upon the Conservative party for 18 years, decided to entrust their destinies to a Liberal ministry, and to-day as I have said, there is but one House on this side of the Rocky Mountains which has a majority of Conservatives —the Senate of Canada. I am under the impression if it was elective it would not perhaps be of the same complexion. But I simply mention this fact in order that hon. gentlemen of this House should give the same measure of fair play, the same measure of sympathy, the same measure of help and good will to the present ministry that they gave former governments during 18 years of Conservative rule in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—As the hon. gentleman has referred to me, I should like to ask him if he is carrying out the policy which the Liberal party advocated when in opposition.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The present government has thought that in a case of dire emergency it could deviate from the true principles laid down and advocated by them during eighteen years in opposition, but even if they did deviate from the policy which they had themselves propounded when in opposition would it justify this chamber in contradicting itself and going back upon its constant policy pursued towards governments that were thus being assailed by the Liberals for acting at variance with this principle, and when this House, for eighteen years, had endorsed a policy adverse to the views of the Liberals.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Not always.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I say always. The exception was so infinitesimally small, and the measure was of such little consequence that I could be allowed to say always. Never has this House, since 1867, under Conservative rule, said nay to any ministerial measure of sufficient importance to be mentioned in the speech from the Throne. Does this measure compare, for instance, with the Canadian Pacific Railway project, and contain such objectionable features that this chamber should depart from its traditions and join issue with the popular House and create friction between the two chambers?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I want to ask the hon. gentleman if the Conservative party ever brought in a measure that gave away so much of the public resources and received so little for it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I suppose that the hon. member for Marquette was absent, for I mentioned the fact of 25 millions of money and 25 million acres of land being given to the Canadian Pacific Railway and millions of money spent on railway monopolies, and a land monopoly that the hon. gentleman condemns every day as existing in the North-west.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Was there not a majority of about 70 in the House of Commons at the time of the Canadian Pacific Railway measure? And did not the hon. the Secretary of State and his honour the Speaker move and second the six months' hoist to that bill which had been carried in the House of Commons by 70 majority.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They had no prejudice!

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Are not the opposition majority in this House bound by the policy they laid down at that time? They were the majority and laid down a principle. What is good for the goose should be good for the gander.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—What principle do you refer to?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The principle of approving of a contract of such magnitude, given without tender, without any notification to the public, in spite of the fact that $1,300,000 had been deposited by another syndicate, after the signing of the contract, binding the country to such an expenditure of money and such an immense land grant.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—The Canadian Pacific Railway measure was passed in the House of Commons by a majority of 70, and in that case the hon. gentleman from Ottawa (Mr. Scott) and the hon. member from Grandville

(Mr. Pelletier) did all they could to kill the bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Senate stood by the majority in the Commons.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—But you think the Senate should not upset the decision of the majority in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Apparently the only difference between the hon. gentleman and myself is the fact that Sir John Macdonald had at his back 70 of a majority in a House that had been elected not upon that question but upon the tariff question—protection or free trade. What difference does it make, when the government is backed by a sufficient majority, whether it be 40 or 70? The hon gentleman knows full well that a majority of 70 does not assist the government at the following election, and a majority of 70 or 80 may be as quickly wiped out as a majority of 20 or 30. We are governed to-day by the system of majorities, and when a majority is sufficient for the government to go on and administrate the affairs of the country without being embarrassed, the will of the people should be respected. I could quite understand that if simply the ministers holding office formed that majority by their number, the Senate might say that there was not a sufficient majority in the Commons: but it seems to me that 39 of a majority must represent the expression of the will of the people quite as much as though the majority were seventy.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—But no more.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No more. If the hon. gentleman aid down the principle that the people of this country, governed through those they elected, and the ministers to whom they confided their affairs, are not to be traversed in their desires and that in all ministerial affairs of importance this chamber should leave the responsibility where the people had placed it, I wonder if to-day, in a case of emergency, when millions of dollars of trade from the Atlantic to the Pacific can be deviated from its true channel, and sent over to a United States line—I wonder if this chamber would be justified, in view of the parallel cases I have mentioned, in thwarting the will of the present government. This is a case of very great importance, when we consider the fact that the Board of Trade of Montreal, the Corn Exchange, the Chambre de Commerce of Montreal, the Board of Trade of Victoria and Board of Trade of Vancouver have just passed resolutions asking parliament to accept this bill in order to open up an access to the Yukon district without delay. It seems to me that when the business community favours this bill, and when a majority of 40 in the popular House support the measure the Upper Chamber would be perfectly justified in supporting—more, it would be its duty to support—the bill before the House. I will read the telegram which comes from the Vancouver and Victoria Boards of Trade and which reads as follows :

Vancouver Board of Trade wired resolution to Minister of Railways to-day. The Victoria Board of Trade has also sent similar telegram reading as follows : " The British Columbia Board of Trade begs to draw your attention to the fact that unless the Lake Teslin road is built this year, untold loss will be entailed upon the merchants and shippers in this province and that if the northern trade is not directed immediately into purely Canadian channels a permanent and irretrievable loss will be sustained by the Dominion and we must enter our earnest and emphatic protest against any legislation that may retard the works now going on.

Signed, G. A. KIRK,
President.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Will the hon. gentleman read the resolution of the Edmonton Board of Trade?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I felt, while reading this telegram, that I should have said a word as to the stand taken by the hon. member for Marquette, as well as other hon. gentlemen who hail from the Northwest. I quite understand that these gentlemen are interested in their own country; I quite understand that they should strive to their utmost to open up the Edmonton route, but as the Right Hon. Wilfrid Laurier said in the Lower House, we will meet this emergency before us, and if that boom lasts, if there is gold in that region as plentifully as it appears to be, if the influx continues and there appears to be a necessity of opening up permanent communication with that country, then, undoubtedly the Edmonton route should be opened, if at all possible, through to the Klondike. This has been the ministerial declaration. I quite sympathize with my hon. friend from Marquette, who is working for his own market, for his own county, for his own district; but has not this chamber to face the present issue and say that in this emergency we must rush along and build 150 miles of railway which will connect water stretches from the Pacific up to the Yukon district more specially when it does not cost one cent to this country.

Several hon. MEMBERS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Some hon. gentlemen laugh at this declaration. I would just like to say that I wish all contracts had been given out in this way, and the heavy weight of the interest we pay yearly to lenders could be wiped out from our budget. Unfortunately, subsidies have been given in immense amounts in aid of railway enterprises, and to-day we are burdened with a debt of about $300,000,000. It seems to me that we should call a halt. The government pays nothing for this road; it forces the Yukon country to build its own road. If it is a temporary structure, then the government will not be the losers of the eight or ten million dollars it would have to expend on that road. I wonder what will be the responsibility of this chamber if this contract is thrown out? Suppose the government, feeling its own responsibility and the duty it owes to the country, decides to come down to the House and ask for four or five million dollars to build that road. We do not know if the government would have to stop there. We do not know how far this four or five millions would carry them, and you would have perhaps as large a bill to meet the following session as you would this present session. I wonder what the people of Canada would say of such results brought about by this chamber, this irresponsible chamber, which the people of Canada cannot reach; while if you leave the responsibility where it properly rests, the people of Canada can always call the government to account for its conduct.

In closing I simply say this, that the people of Canada, without seeing from day to day what work the Senate has been doing since its inception—because the people of Canada cannot sit around the committee tables here and see our work—the majority of the people of Canada will come to this conclusion, that the Conservative majority—there may be one in this House for all I know, it has been stated that there is one—a Conservative majority always said aye to a Conservative government, and always nay to a Liberal government. It seems to me that the agitation which culminated in 1893 by that article of the Liberal programme being adopted, will continue more and more. I will cite what an eminent man of Great Britain said as to the possibilities which would develop under the present constitution. John Bright, speaking of the wisdom of making a life membership of this House, in answer to the argument that the representatives of Canada wished that there should be a body irresponsible to the people; he said:

> Still, if they wish it I should not interfere and try to prevent it, but I venture to say that the clause enabling the Governor General and his cabinet to put seventy members in that council for life, inserts into the whole scheme the germ of a malady which will spread, and which before very long will require an alteration of this Act and of the constitution of this new confederation.

Now, the question presents itself: has the germ of that malady really developed, and is there to be a divorce between the Lower and the Upper House.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if the Hon. John Bright did not support the action of the House of Lords on the Home Rule Bill, and leave his party to give strength to that action. Circumstances intervened to change the Right Hon. John Bright's opinions and cause him to welcome the power of the Upper House independently exercised.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I will answer the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Boulton) that when he speaks of the Home Rule Bill, he speaks of a bill that affected the constitution of the whole country, the whole fabric of British institutions, and I quite understand that John Bright should be so respectful of public opinion in England, Scotland and Ireland as to ask that the question be deferred until the full majority in England who voted against the measure should be got to support that scheme. I quite understand that in a case like that Mr. John Bright and others should be slow to vote for such a measure which seriously modified the real foundation of the institutions as they existed—without leaving to Great Britain a certainty that British interests would not be injuriously affected thereby. But I will not compare the case mentioned by my hon. colleague with the present emergency, the building of 150 miles of road into the Yukon district. I was told by one of my hon. colleagues, with whom I was talking a few days ago of the prejudices which were perhaps permeating the minds of some members of this House: "well if you were in our place would you not do likewise?" I answered that, knowing the fallibility of our poor human nature, I hoped that if the principles I lay down and my own dignity were not strong enough to prevent me from obstructing a government having the confidence of the people, should the opportunity offer itself to me, I would wish the present constitution of this chamber to be so altered as to render me powerless to do any wrong.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I rose in my place a few days ago intending to place my views before the House, but at the same time the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Miller) rose also, and I thought that I ought to give way, convinced as I was that the hon. gentleman would favour us with one of these telling speeches which he is accustomed to make. I was not deceived. The hon. senator from Richmond on that occasion gave to this House the best speech which had been made on this question of the Yukon Railway. He was applauded to such an extent that even the Secretary of State was dissatisfied with those expressions of approbations and undertook to critize the members of this House for so applauding the speech. I was one of those who joined in the applause, and I must tell the hon. Secretary of State that the reason I did so was that the speech was a capital one, reviewing as the hon. gentleman did, the whole history of the Yukon Railway, and he deserved praise for so doing. For 5 or 6 months past I have looked into this question of the proposed Yukon Railway. I used all means at my command when I went home to make myself acquainted with that railway, to ascertain the best route to the mines, and later on, when the press made known this arrangement with Mackenzie & Mann, I studied the matter again in order to make up my mind as to whether that contract with the government was a good one. I made some notes in order to be prepared for the discussion of this question when we met after the adjourment. I observe in my notes that I had six reasons why I could not vote for the bill:

First, it was not an all-Canadian route;

Second, it was a badly located road;

Third, it was not the shortest route;

Fourth, the contract had been made in secret;

Fifth, the great wealth of Canada was given for a short road;

Sixth, it was a monopoly.

It happened that I had to give way in favour of the hon. member from Richmond, who gave us seven reasons why we should not ratify the contract. Those reasons were not given in the same words in which I have now put mine before this House, but they cover the same ground. That hon. senator has argued his case at such length that I could hardly add any more arguments to his plea, therefore I have kept silent since then, believing it would be wasting the time of the House if I were to repeat, though in other words, the arguments of that hon. member I endorse his arguments, and I am happy to do so, because they were better given than I could have given them myself, and they were more numerous than those I could have given. At present I rise for another object. I could not let the speech of the hon. gentleman from de Lorimier (Mr. Dandurand) pass without saying a few words in contradiction of his utterances. This I propose to do in a very few words, satisfied that it is only necessary for me to indicate the fallacy of his statements or the lameness of his arguments. The hon. gentleman began by denying that the contract had been given in secrecy. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should have made such an assertion. He said, in support of his assertion, that over all the country—in Montreal particularly—right and left, people were speaking of the Yukon Railway, and consequently that it could not be said that the building of this road was kept secret. This is quite true, but has the government ever asked for tenders, did they ever make known that they were prepared to negotiate for the building of this road? No, they did nothing of the kind. On the contrary, they did the very reverse. They did what they had for 25 years been accusing Conservative governments of having failed to do what they ought to have done in that respect. When asked I invariably answered that tenders would certainly be asked for. That the Liberal government of the day could not do otherwise. They surely would call for tenders. Then the hon. senator spoke of Mr. Hamilton Smith. Surely if the hon. gentleman had read the speech of Mr. Sifton, in the other House, he would have learned what he seems not to know to-day, that Mr. Sifton acknowledged that before signing the contract he had been made aware of the fact that Mr. Hamilton Smith was desirous of entering into negotiations with the government in order to take the contract. Had Mr. Sifton at that time been another man than the hon. gentleman from Brandon (Mr. Kirchhoffer) has described him, in the interests of Canada he would have met Mr. Smith, or notified him to call at his office and enter into negotiations, and this he would have done, even if he had determined not to give him the contract, but in order to be informed of what Mr. Smith knew of those surveys and of the road to be built. He must have known that Mr. Smith had passed the whole of last summer in that Yukon district looking at the mines and exploring the country in order to give a price for the building of the road. This, therefore shows, not only neglect of duty on the part of Mr. Sifton, but it even creates a strong presumption that there is something wrong underneath. If there is nothing wrong, I say he followed a course which opened the doors to suspicion. Now, the hon. gentleman for de Lorimier (Mr. Dandurand) says it is an all-Canadian route. I say that when the government gave this contract they knew it was not an all-Canadian route, because it extends from Port Wrangel, in United States territory, to Dawson City, and that surely is not an all-Canadian route. It was later on, after the discussion on the address, that the government announced that the road would be extended to Fort Simpson on Canadian territory in order to divert the attack which was being made at that time. According to the present contract, it is not even to-day an all-Canadian route. It may be made later on an all-Canadian route, but before it is so the country will have to pay in cash for its extension to Fort Simpson, a distance of some 250 miles. The hon. senator for de Lorimier (Mr. Dandurand) has stated that it was the best route. If the hon. senator thinks it is so, I must say, either he does not understand the question, or he is not exactly the sort of public man he claimed to be, always ready to endorse what was right and oppose what was wrong. I should think that every patriotic man will consider this road is one of the worst that the government could choose? Why, the ministers themselves acknowledge the fact. Did not they say the other day that there might be another better road, but that this was the best route for immediate use? So the hon. gentleman is not even in accord with his friends. Even if this road was extended to Fort Simpson, even then it would be a very bad road, a road which would give the whole of the enormous trade of the Yukon mines to the United States, and Canada while paying for the road could not be able to compete with the States for the trade in the Yukon district. How could it compete? Is not Vancouver a few miles from Washington territory? Down below Washington is Oregon and below that California. In a word, the whole of the Pacific coast belonging to the United States are in part quite near to Vancouver, the terminus of the road now under discussion, and the whole coast on the other side of the mountains with water communications with Vancouver, where they have 1,542 miles to run through to reach the mines on the other side. Canada, except British Columbia, lies on the eastern side of the Rockies, so that Calgary, the nearest town to Vancouver, on the eastern side of the mountains will have to cross the Rocky Mountains and so travel 700 miles, before they reach Vancouver, which the Americans can reach without difficulty in more or less time, while even Calgary cannot compete. It is objected that Americans would have to pay customs duties. The customs duties which the Americans will pay will be a very small compensation to us for the great trade that we will lose. It will not compensate us even for the railway freight charges on freight from Calgary over the mountains to Vancouver.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Yukon is north of British Columbia and even further west.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I know; I will come to that. Let us take a common point from the Canadian Pacific Railway from the foot of the Rockies there being no other road on Canadian territory from Halifax, Montreal, St. John or Winnipeg to the Canadian west, say Calgary. What is the distance from Calgary to the mines or Dawson City by way of Vancouver? It is 2,200 miles. What is the distance from Calgary to Dawson City or the mines via Edmonton? It is 1,500 miles.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Hon. gentlemen may say no: I defy contradiction. From Calgary to Edmonton is 199 miles, and from Edmonton to Dawson is 1,341 miles, making 1,542 in all. From Edmonton you go to Peace River, and from Peace River to Nelson River and from Nelson River to Pelly River, and then on by Pelly River you reach Dawson. The hon. gentleman (the Secretary of State) is laughing. Is not that the route described in the report of the engineers? I say it is. I defy contradiction.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Can the hon. gentleman tell us how long it would take to build such a road from Edmonton to the Klondike?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I will come to that. I say by the Edmonton route it is 1,500 miles, and by way of Vancouver it is 2,200 miles, or a difference of 700 miles in favour of the Edmonton route. Add to that those 700 miles are mountains some 4,000 or 5,000 feet high. Again in making their choice, the government selected a road where there is no cultivation. The land cannot be cultivated. But it is well known that from Edmonton to Peace River, a distance of over 300 miles, there are some of the finest arable lands in the North-west. It would be a first-class place to construct a railway, while on the other route it is money lost. That is an argument which must be a very strong one. The hon. gentleman stated that the premier said a road would be constructed on that route by and bye. Will he construct it with his own money, or will he ask the country to pay for the error the government have made? Because it is a great error. Can this House endorse that error? I say no.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It would cost the country no money.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—It is not money, but it is money's worth, and it would be robbing the public chest. The hon. leader of the House the other day in speaking of the powers of this House, said that though the present bill contained no grant of money, land grant should be considered as a grant of money. I have seen a report made by Mr. Saunders, of the Experimental Farm in Ottawa, who says that on the Edmonton route good crops have been grown in several places. Fort Providence is one of those places, it lies near Slave Lake, some 700 miles north of Winnipeg, and yet good crops have been raised there. Fort Francis, on the Edmonton route, is about on the same latitude as Slave Lake, and, therefore, I argue that good crops may be found there later. What a great advantage it would be if, at a place so near to the mines —I suppose five or six hundred miles south from Dawson—good crops could be raised. Another reason why I am greatly in favour of the Edmonton road is that a number of the labouring men who would be called to build that road, would settle there and so the desire of the hon. member for Toronto, and of all Canadian patriots, would be accomplished. They would see that part of the North-west colonized in a short time. The hon. gentleman also said that he hoped the government would favour the trade in the Yukon district. I am sorry to say that the bill which he approves of is diametrically opposed to the wishes he expressed: it would be absurd to pretend that we can compete with the United States, if the situation is as I have described it to be, and I defy contradiction. There will be over 700 miles difference between the Edmonton route and the Vancouver route for any part of Canada that is east of Calgary. The hon. gentleman said that the government ought to be congratulated on this measure. To-day the Senate is charged with opposing this project on party grounds. I should think I have been long enough in parliament to defy contradiction when I state that I have always shown that I acted with the greatest independence—so much so, that I am often called "an impossible man." In principles I am a staunch Conservative.

An Hon. MEMBER—A Tory.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—No, not a Tory, but a true French Conservative. There is a great difference between the two. In opposing the present project, I do so without considering either party, but only as to which is the best interest of this country. I have always tried to rise above party vote, so much so that prior to the last general election, if the leader of the government had done honestly, faithfully and conscientiously his duty, I would have helped him. Some thirty years ago I severed from the Conservative party because I had been, and the province of Quebec had been, deceived by Sir John Macdonald. Two years ago I found that Mr. Laurier, now Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was doing wrong, and consequently I had to refuse him my support, and stand by my own party. Determined, as I have always been, to do in this House what was right, and oppose what was wrong. In this instance I cannot congratulate the government. They have done a grave error, and I have always thought so since I have looked into this project of theirs. The hon. gentleman said that it is not the government who is gambling ; it is the contractors. Well, I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. According to the Minister of Justice, according to the Secretary of State the government are the gamblers.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—How ?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Both ministers in this House have declared ten or twelve times during this discussion that they knew not if the lands granted to the contractors are good or bad. If they do not know the value of those golden lands, then they do not know whether they are paying too much or too little for the construction of the road. They are then gambling just as much as, if not more than the contractors. But both the government and the contractors know full well that those mines are of great value. Have they not dozens of reports of explorers and gold seekers, establishing the fact ? Have they not the report of Mr. Smith, who, after he had explored the country last summer, was ready to build the road for one-fourth of the land grant they give to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann ? Have they not the report of Dr. Dawson, and, above all, have they not sent out one of their explorers, who, after having spent in the Yukon district, nearly two years, states in his report that, taking as a comparison the creeks of Bonanza and Eldorado, which he estimates will give some 70 millions of dollars, the Yukon district is of great value. Let me quote one page of this valuable report. Mr. Ogilvie writes :

Thus we may conclude with reason that all that portion of the North-east Territory westward from the easterly limit of the Yukon water system of the 141st meridian, will prove more or less gold bearing.

The westerly boundary of this region—the 141st meridian, or international boundary—is upwards of 300 miles in length ; the southern boundary—the 60th parallel of latitude—is about 500 miles long, and the north-east boundary, an irregular line from the 60th parallel to the 141st meridian, in latitude 65 degrees approximately, is upwards of 600 miles long. These three lines bound an area of about 125,000 square miles, over which gold is scattered more or less profusely.

At many of the points mentioned it will pay well for working, even under present conditions, and at many others it will pay well when we have such facilities as we expect to have during the next year for entering and developing that region. Attention may be directed to the fact that the whole of that vast district owes its now world-wide reputation to the richness of 140 claims in the Klondike divisions. One hundred of these are on Bonanza Creek, and about 40 on Eldorado. To use a mining term, many of those claims are "world-beaters," and if the indications now known are worth anything at all they are worth from 60 to 70 millions of dollars in those two creeks.

Taking this division as a whole, including the three creeks named affluent to Indian Creek, a district some 35 miles in length and 25 or more miles in width, if the indications can be relied on, there are one hundred million dollars in sight in that area. No one can guarantee this amount, but the prospects so far developed point to that sum pretty conclusively. This district is exceptionally rich. Nothing has ever been found like it heretofore in that country, in fact, in very few countries has anything been found like it, and while we cannot confidently assert that other finds as valuable as it will be made, it is altogether improbable that gold is scattered over such a vast extent, and only rich at a point which is less than the 140th part of the total area. If we add to this part of the northern area of British Columbia we increase it nearly two-fold and the comparative area of the Klondike district is much lessened.

Taken altogether we have a vast field with fair prospects, as fair it may be claimed as any other equally extensive region in the world. The natural conditions are not as favourable as in many other parts, but time and enterprise will no doubt agreeably modify many of them, and the reward may be great.

Then hon. gentlemen, it is only to-day that, reading a newspaper, I found the following despatch from Vancouver :

Vancouver, B.C., March 26.—Klondike has yielded the largest nugget ever found. Such is the report brought from Dawson by Klondikers who reached Vancouver this morning.

Mr. Goodwin went into the Klondike last July. Speaking generally of the prospects he stated that a very conservative estimate at least twenty tons of gold would be brought out in June when navigation opens.

Goodwin is returning to Los Angelos to see his wife and will then go back to Dawson early in June. He stated that claims were frequently changing hands. He himself had several and had disposed of some just before he left. Quite recently the Healy company had paid "Nigger Jim" $225,000 for three claims on Bonanza. Claims on Bear and Dominion Creeks, on Indian and Klondike River respectively had been sold as high as $20,000. On Hunker Creek $22,500 had been paid for a half interest by a man named Elliott and $40,000 for a whole claim. Mitchell, owner of No. 1 Eldorado, was buying several claims on Hunker when they left at a high figure.

Speaking of Bear Creek, Goodwin said that Dutch Kitt took out $10,000 last winter. This was from the mouth of the creek. In Dawson $60 per cord was the price of wood on the average that represented a day's work. Lasalle went to Klondike with the first rush last year from Leadville, in which district he owns several mines. He has now come out from Dawson in the interest of Alex. McDonald, the King of Bonanza Creek. McDonald is reported at Dawson to be worth several million dollars.

With all this information, is it possible for a sane man to say we have doubts. Hon. gentlemen, certainly we have such doubts as men have always in matters of this kind. It is the general rule in all matters or affairs of this world to act without a certainty, and go on relying on probable success. Any man in business, undertaking anything, is he sure of success? No. Most probably he will succeed; but there is no certainty. Nevertheless, he will go on expecting to make a fortune. Then why ask in reference to this question more certainty than you would ask on any other occasion? The hon. gentleman says the present government is popular yet; this I know not; the hon. gentleman knows more than I do as to that. What I know is this: I go home almost every week and meet a great number of people in different parts of the country whom I know, and they speak to me about what is passing here and especially upon this Yukon question. I have heard Liberals stating how proud they were to have a Senate which could give justice to the country at large. I heard Conservatives who had voted the wrong way, stating that they would never do so again. If this shows that the popularity of the government continues very well; I have no objection to it, but I hope there will be a change, I mean in the ideas of those gentlemen when they see that the Senate is decided to have sound legislation and show their vigilance in keeping down the expenses of this country. The hon. gentleman from Delorimier (Mr. Dandurand) did not deny the powers of this House; on the contrary, he seems to admit that it is the prerogative of this House to refuse its assent to any legislation, and not only legislation, but any acts of the government. They may vote against any measure; whether it is a question of money or not, makes no difference. They cannot amend money bills, but they can reject them, and that is what we are about to do. Believing that this question would come up for discussion, I have looked into some of the authorities and it is just as well to refer to them. As to the powers of the Senate I shall quote May, who is one of the best authorities on constitutional law. He says:

> The legal right of the Lord's as a co-ordinate branch of the legislature, to withhold their assent from any bill whatever to which their concurrence is desired, is unquestionable.

Then the next is Bagehot, who is a very good authority. Bagehot, in The English Constitution, has the following:

> Since the Reform Act, the House of Lords has become a revising and suspending House. It can alter bills. It can reject bills.....their veto is a sort of hypothetical veto. They say: "We reject your bill for this once, or these twice, or even these thrice, but if you keep on sending it up, at last we wont reject it."

I quote also from Todd It is well known that Todd's constitutional works are most valuable. They are the most complete resume of all the best English authorities on constitutional questions. He says:

> The province of the House of Lords appears more properly to be that of controlling, revising and amending the projects of legislation which emanate from the House of Commons. To balance and regulate the political movement of the nation—to test, by temporary resistance, the sincerity and strength of the will which demands a change, to make legislation take its stand on the good sense and ultimate judgment instead of the momentary desire of the country; and to give continuity and stability to the general policy of the nation.

Now this literature is clear and most intelligible. But in order to make it still clearer, more unobjectionable, those very same authors have cited a few cases to exemplify the whole doctrine and prevent all objections. They quote:

> 1st. The successful defence by the House of Lords in 1835 of the revenues of the Irish church.
> 2nd. Their valuable amendment to the Corporations Bill, the effect of which was the non-passing of the bill for four successive years, when the Commons accepted the amendments.
> 3rd. The Irish Electoral Act, which was rejected by the House of Lords four times.
> 4th. The protracted resistance to the introduction of Jews into parliament. It was sent seven times from the Commons and seven times the Lords rejected it.
> 5th. The steadfast maintenance of the principle of church rates, which was rejected more than seven times.

I do not know the number, but the author says more than seven times rejected after having been passed each time by the Lower House.

> 6th. Their vigorous opposition to the repeal of the paper duty.

Now, I think that such cases as those clearly establish the powers of the Upper House, that it has not only the power to revise and approve all legislation sent to them for their concurrence, but that it has also the legal and constitutional power to reject all legislation and refuse to give it their assent. But besides the constitutional law, which provides as I have just shown, could I not, if necessary, refer Your Honour to the practice in Canada for years past? Has not this Senate very often rejected, or attempted, by taking the vote, to reject government bills adopted by the Commons by large majorities? I remember some 10 or 12 years ago the leader of the then opposition, now the Secretary of State (Mr. Scott) moved the six months' hoist in the case of the Franchise Bill, a bill particularly relating to the other branch of parliament. Surely if there was a bill with which the Senate should not interfere, it was this very measure. About the same time, a few years before, the then also Liberal opposition did the same thing when the redistribution bill was moved in the Senate. This also was a bill affecting only members of the Commons, yet the six months' hoist was moved by the then Liberal opposition. Could I not also refer your honours to the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill, which met in this House the same opposition from the then leader of the opposition and his friends. It never occurred before to those gentlemen that a doubt could exist as to the power of this House to reject any legislation sent up for its assent. These are cases in point, and there were no scruples on the opposition side. They at once used their power and were right in doing so. The only difference is the Conservatives had a majority then in the Commons and the Liberals have a majority now. But the Liberals did more. The third reading was moved, and generally at the third reading members keep their seats because it is useless to make any objection. But in that case they voted against the third reading. I can remember a great many years back, a great many cases occurred where bills sent up from the other House were rejected here. And if I am not mistaken, during the time of the Mackenzie administration, between 1873 and 1878, a bill was objected to by the Senate, and it was stated that the government had appealed to the authorities in England to appoint new senators, but the request was flatly refused.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Under what administration was it that there was a bill rejected?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Mackenzie's. I have given enough evidence, I think.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Cold justice is meted out to Liberal governments.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They are in a judicial mood when there is a Liberal government in.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Since there is a discussion going on and since it appears that the majority in this House will reject the bill, I heard it often stated, not in this House but outside, by friends of the present cabinet, that the government were decided to have new senators appointed, so that I beg of the House to allow me to go on with that subject and see what their power is as far as that goes. I cannot deny that the Crown has, theoretically, such a power, with this difference that in England the Crown is not limited as to the number it may appoint, while in Canada the number is limited by the British North America Act. But while I admit that such power exists theoretically, I am bound to deny that the Crown can use such a remedy except probably in most extreme cases. I find in Todd:

> The creation of additional peers to facilitate the passing of a particular measure is an extreme proceeding which could not be approved under any circumstance. Although the right of the Crown in the exercise of this prerogative can only be restrained by consideration of public policy.

Hearn says:

> The swamping of the peers is a process which the thoughtless and ignorant speak and write with great complacency. Wise men regard it as a very dangerous but very useful instrument. I think that our constitution does not afford this assumed means for obtaining the desired object and that it does afford different means.
> This constitutional equivalent in the Lords for a dissolution of the Commons does not derive much support from precedents since such a creation of peers, for the purpose of securing a majority in the House of peers on a question on which the peers had already expressed their opinion, was seriously contemplated only on three occasions. Still less can it be justified on general principles. It is the function of the House of Lords to advise the Crown in all affairs of state. It is in times of great and perilous necessity that the wholesome councils of the peers are most needed. Yet it is in these very times that according to its supporters, this extraordinary creation of peers may be made. If the Crown could in this way, silence or prevent the House of Lords, it would remove at the very moment when the restraint was required, one of the checks which the constitution has provided against the rash or improvident action of the Crown or of the Commons. The King would no longer act by the advice and with the consent of the Lords, but with his own advice, and his own consent, or at least with an advice and consent which the law deems for the purpose insufficient, and the irresponsible action would be all the more dangerous, because it retained the pretence of responsibility. In short, if it be wrong to pack a House of Commons, it cannot be right to swamp a House of Lords.

If after full opportunity for consideration, the deliberate opinion not merely of the existing House of Commons, but of the country, be in favour of a particular measure, the peers are accustomed to follow the example which the Crown sets in the appointment of its ministers, and acquiesce, however reluctantly, in legislation which they do not approve. They are not under any legal obligation to do so, but in the exercise of a wise discretion, they are content with securing full and mature consideration of the plan.

It has been said by friends of the government, outside this chamber that should the Senate reject this bill, the government would appoint new senators in order to pass it. The government could not do such a thing. The Crown would object to take such a course except in an extreme case. The present one is not such a case. Had this project the support of the people of this country, and should the Senate persistently refuse to give its assent to the government measure, then I should think that the government might do so. Let the government dissolve parliament and submit the question to the electorate. If the government are sustained, then this House should give way and pass the bill—reluctantly no doubt, but in a country ruled by constitutional law, such as ours is, the people is supreme and I should think that as a general rule an Upper House ought to submit to the popular will clearly expressed. That is the constitutional law, which I thought I might advert to in the present instance when so much has been said inside and outside this House as to the powers of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, 29th March, 1898.

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being,—

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the second reading (Bill 6) "An Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company;" and the motion in amendment of the Hon. Mr. Macdonald (B.C.), that the said bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW said: I am giving way now to the hon. Mr. Reesor, on the understanding that I will not lose my opportunity of speaking afterwards.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I was not able to be here last night. It is very difficult for me to be out after dark, and I thank the hon. gentleman very much for allowing me to speak now. During a part of the debate, both in this House and in the other House, while reading the newspaper reports, I was inclined to think unfavourably of the contract, and unfavourably perhaps of the manner in which the government were making such large grants of land, the value of which there is no means of knowing. I have since come, however, to the conclusion that it ought to be accepted. I think if accepted and carried out in good faith, it will be beneficial for the country. It has been said in this House and elsewhere that a large swindle is being perpetrated by this deal entered into between the government and Mackenzie & Mann, and that it will enable the contractors to do a great deal of harm under the privileges given to them. My hon. friend from Shell River has given the House a great many figures, and a great deal has been said in the press about irregularities in connection with this transaction. The impression left upon the minds of the public was that the opposition might have some very strong arguments to back up their assertion. But nothing has been said to indicate that anything wrong or dishonest was being done. And now, after the matter has been discussed for several days, I do not think a single charge can be urged against the contractors, and nothing has been shown to lead any one to think that they were men who should not be trusted. On the other hand, I may tell the House that I have been in Toronto for the last few years and was there at the time the contract was made by the city of Toronto with Mackenzie & Mann to have their street railway reconstructed and extended, and to-day there is not, as far as I know, a single city on the American continent, or upon any other continent in the civilized world, that is better served for the amount of money obtained than the city of Toronto. I have lived in that city for the last 20 years, and I have noticed a remarkable improvement. The people of Toronto can obtain six tickets for four cents each, and are permitted to travel five or six miles. In the case of the working man, tickets are sold for three cents each good during certain hours. But that is not all. In addition to that, the company pay to the city about $1,000 a week out of their gross earnings—eight per cent of all they earn. There is no city in Canada, and no city in the United States, that has an equal return or better cars or better employees in charge of their cars, or better accommodation for the travelling public than the city of Toronto. That is a well known fact. So far as the railway contract is concerned, there were many privileges given to other companies, on a pretty large scale too, that have not been given to this company. This company has to submit to the government regulations of the tolls they shall charge for passengers on the road from the very start, and the government have to be satisfied that the accommodation is commensurate with the bargain. The government have the power not only of regulating the charges and tolls upon the road from the very start, but that continues for four or five years and then they have the power of reducing the fares a considerable percentage, and after six or seven years to reduce it still further, and by ten years to put it under the law of the statute which regulates railways and all the restrictions of that law. Then it has been said that that country is covered with gold, that there is a great deal of gold to be found there in placer mining. We do not know how much is to be found where rock has to be mined, and there has been a great deal of exaggeration as to what has been found in the placers. Men have been there eight or nine years mining and have come away poor. They did not all make money even at the first find, and when there was no one to interfere with them and they could pick out their claims where they choose, and many have come home poorer than when they went away. It has been, as in all other gold producing countries, the rule that it cost a dollar to make a dollar. The intrinsic value of gold to-day, for instance is the standard above all others that seems to continue in the same position. A gold dollar is a gold dollar. We do not get more value or much less value, and the gold produced in various countries has been just about sufficient to keep up with the demand for commercial purposes, and yet the dollar would buy as much to-day as it would a great many years ago, and so it will continue for a long time. Experts who have studied this question, and who have written a good deal upon the subject, say that in all countries a great deal more money is spent by individuals, on an average, in gold mining, than has been taken out. It will generally be found that the accumulation of gold in all these countries has been in a comparatively few hands, and they are generally speculators who have made money by the misfortune of others. It is not likely that this gold country will be so far an exception above all others that it should be valued very much higher than others. The chances are that hundreds and hundreds of acres are to be found there which would be of no use for men to dig at all, and the contractors are running chances, because they can only expect that a small quantity of that land will pay. It will only be a small percentage of the land that will pay more than it will cost to take out the gold. Then, as to the choosing and opening up of them, you must bear in mind that the company will have to wait some time before they can select. They have to build the whole road before they can select the whole of the land, and it will take a long time afterwards to tell just where the gold lies; in the meantime, all the placer lands or a great part of them, may be taken up by men who get in there first with licenses to mine. When all is said and done, there is only about three or three and a half per cent of land being granted, and the balance is there still. If that three and a half per cent is worth a great deal, it is worth a great deal to the people of that country to be able to get in and out of it without risking their lives, as they are doing now, and get provisions to keep them from starving without having to pay extortionate prices. A man with a few dollars will have a chance to save more of his earnings when he is not obliged to pay the immense prices prevailing there now. The company is bound to build that road in a short time to have it running in a fair and good shape by the 1st September, not to have it absolutely all ballasted, but so as to be able to take in freight and large quantities of it beyond doubt, and thus save people in that remote region from the risk of starvation. The fact that they have to prepare to do that means that they will take in thousands of tons of freight where they now take in ten, and they will take in just as large a proportion of persons, and a large amount of money will be expended there. Men will come from all parts of the earth; you will find people there from Germany, France, England, the United States and other parts of the world as soon as they can get in by railroad. If we cannot maintain a proper force there to keep them in order and to have the law respected, what will be the effect? So much immigration will take place from all parts of the world, as occurred in California, that there may be a little rebellion. The foreign element may take the authority of the law themselves and do anything they pleased. The difficulty is to get a force in there, and if we have that railway we will be able to maintain our authority. There is no time to be lost and this is the only short line by which we can get in. This railway, in connection with Teslin Lake and Hootalinqua River, on which there is open navigation for four or five months of the year for boats of considerable size, will render it possible to take in an immense amount of freight and a great many people. Now, is it justifiable to let the matter drop? No. The government should get the bill passed, or something similar to it, to open up that country and within the time limited as near as possible. Thus we might avoid a little war or the expense of putting down a rebellion. We cannot tell what we may expect from the large number of foreigners congregating in that country, in a place so difficult of access. We have had two rebellions in the North-west already, and they certainly cost us six or seven million dollars. That ought to be a warning to us not by any neglect to permit a repetition of those occurrences. We should also consider the demand that the manufacturers of this country make upon us to get a market for their products. All these things demand that it should be treated as an emergency bill. I believe that the citizens of Montreal through their Board of Trade, and of Toronto through their Board of Trade, and I do not know but others in Canada also are now backing up the government and calling on parliament to pass the bill for the general interests of the country. It cannot be expected that men who take a contract like this in a new country will not be paid something extra. They require some extra inducements. It would be a different thing if the company could take their time. They might do it under the circumstances without a subsidy of any kind. It is very possible—it is one of the contingencies that might arise—that we might lose that territory for all time, or require to wage a war to recover it. Taking these circumstances into account, I think it is necessary, in the emergency, that the government should be allowed to go on and carry out that contract with the parties who have taken it in good faith subject to the ratification of parliament and hold the government responsible for the effect. There need be no suspicion of corruption. We have seen enough of the ill-doings of politicians, and in that way have learned that those who have mixed jobbery with politics are worse off in the end. We are assured that Mackenzie & Mann will carry out the contract and make it a success. We can rely on the good judgment of Mackenzie & Mann, because we know that they are enterprising, and they would injure themselves by playing false in this contract. If this railway is constructed the country will reap the benefit of it. Of course, we know that politicians are predicting that certain things will happen, but predictions have been made in certain cases which we know have turned out not to be correct. We were assured that before 1890 the output of wheat and other grains from Manitoba and the North-west was something like 240,000,000 bushels. The predictions that were made in respect of that matter were very far from being correct and the predictions made with reference to this contract may be just as far astray. The peculiar position in which the Senate is placed to some extent should make it very cautious in dealing with this bill, and we should consider the matter carefully before throwing it out. The Senate have no control of the finances of the country, but if we reject this bill we are destroying the chances that the government have of making money shortly to pay for the building of that road. If this road is constructed it will furnish ingress and egress to the Klondike region to such an extent as to shut out completely all possible chance of any one suffering or starving by being locked up in there. Those are two points. And another thing, these men cannot open up that country without at the same time benefiting the trade of Canada, it will bring a great amount of trade to Canada from which we ought to reap some benefit. It is said that too much land is being given to these contractors, but it must be remembered that nearly 80,000,000 acres of good land will be left. The government can let this contract and obtain a great advantage, as well as make money out of it, and if we refuse to pass this measure we deprive them of the power of making money in that way. It would take too much time to go fully into the matter so I will close.

Hon. Mr. FISET (in French)—Being unfamiliar with the English language, I ask permission to address the House in French. After all the remarkable speeches which have been delivered in this chamber, as well as in the House of Commons, there remains very few points to be raised on this important measure which has been submitted to us. I shall endeavour briefly to reply to the principal objections which have been raised to this bill :

First.—The government should have undertaken the construction of the road itself.

Second.—The land grant is larger than should be given for the construction of the road.

Third.—The privileges accorded to the company constitute a dangerous monopoly.

Fourth.—Finally the government should have called for tenders before letting the contract.

Other objections have been raised, but I believe that these are the principal ones, and I shall confine my remarks to them. It is held that the government should have constructed the road itself rather than give the mineral lands for its construction. It is generally admitted that all work, all enterprises undertaken by the government are always more costly than when constructed by a private company. Now, supposing we were to give to the contractors for the construction of a road running from Glenora to Teslin Lake four or five million of dollars, the government, if undertaking to construct the road itself, would be obliged to expend seven or eight millions. Now, the eastern provinces after having spent enormous sums already for the development of the west, are tired of seeing new demands for contributions in the same direction from day to day —everything is for the west, they say, and nothing for the east, and there is reason in this view to a certain extent. Quebec has asked for a number of years for a bridge over the St. Lawrence. A company has contributed towards the construction of that bridge, but notwithstanding promises of aid from the Dominion, nothing has yet been done. In the division which I have the honour to represent, all the trans-Atlantic steamship companies, the Chambers of Commerce, the Pilots' Corporation, have demanded and still demand that a deep water wharf be constructed at Pointe au Père, in the interest of navigation, but in vain. In the same district again, a petition has been presented to the three branches of the legislature to obtain the construction of a branch railway from a point on the Intercolonial Railway to extend towards Gaspé, which would bring us considerably nearer to England, a work much needed in the interest of local trade. Again in this case our demands have not been granted. On the contrary, the government are exerting themselves to diminish the distance which separates us from British Columbia, and millions have been voted for the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. They exert themselves to extend the extreme limits of the Dominion to the west by a railroad in these unknown regions. Happily this time the government are expending no money, and are merely granting lands. This manner of building a railway is opposed by the hon. members of the opposition, but I repeat the eastern provinces prefer to see lands given rather than to pay money. I am also under the impression, and say without wishing to wound the feelings of hon. members who oppose the project, that if the government had brought down a proposition to construct the road by an expenditure of money, these hon. gentlemen would have opposed still more violently that proposition than they now oppose the bill which has been submitted to us. The government has preferred to give lands, and the hon. gentlemen opposite forget that for eighteen years that was the policy of their friends, with this difference, that the present administration does not add money to the grant. It is contended that the government are giving a monopoly to this company in prohibiting the construction of any other road for five years, and that the company will thus make considerable profits from the traffic—sufficient, according to some hon. members, to pay the cost of its construction.

It should be remembered that it is the Governor in Council who has the right to fix the maximum tariff for the transport of passengers and freight, and that these rates are to be modified after some years. Further, in order to show that it is not to be a monopoly that is accorded this company, in not authorizing the construction of any other road for five years, I cannot do better than read clause 4 of the contract, and the explanation given of it by the hon. Minister of the Interior :

4. For five years from the first of September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal or thereabouts or from any point at or near the international boundary between Canada and Alaska into the Yukon district, and for five years from said date no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors and the contractors' company to assist in building any such railway.

The House will see that this clause does not say that any aid in land or money shall be granted to the contractors or the contractors' company ; but it says that nobody else shall be permitted to build there. Now, the reading of that clause will at once dissipate the idea that there has been any monopoly granted to this company. There is no monopoly whatever. This company gets a charter to build from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake. There is no monopoly in that charter. The legislature of British Columbia can give another charter to-morrow, or this House could give another charter. We do not bind ourselves not to give another charter ; we do not say anything about it, and, by the way, there is another charter in existence at the present time, namely, the Cassiar Central. This latter charter does not specifically name this route, but it is wide enough, as any lawyer in this House who reads the charter will agree with me, to justify any one else taking that charter, and going on, and building over the same route. There is nothing in this clause which, by any possible stretch of imagination, can be called a monopoly.

As will be seen, this was a patriotic idea which inspired the insertion of this clause in the contract. The interests of Canadians are given the preference over those of our United States neighbours. Further, by clause 20 it is stipulated that the contractors shall sell to settlers in good faith, and at prices fixed by the Governor in Council, all arable lands which they may be able to find in the lands granted to them. Can that be termed a monopoly ? It is pretended further that the government are giving to the contractors a larger area of land than the contract warrants. There are many things to be considered in this connection. Common sense should tell us that the more collosal the enterprise the larger should be the expenditure for its construction. Here is a collosal enterprise surrounded by many difficulties which have to be surmounted before it is completed. We have first of all an enormous distance to traverse to reach the place where the line is to be built and by most difficult and dangerous routes. The cost of transporting materials will be considerable, and, as some one has said, the cost of transport of a ton of merchandise will cost $50. How much in that case will it cost to transport the rails alone and all the materials necessary for the construction of the road ? The labourers and workingmen must also be transported to the works at great cost, and must be paid higher wages in consequence of the rigorous climate which they will have to endure and the hardships that they will have to encounter. If the government should decide to double the military forces which they are sending to that region, it is quite natural to suppose that the contractors will also be obliged to do the same for their workingmen. It should also be borne in mind, and that is a very important fact, that the time for the completion of the work is actually limited. The contractors are required to have the road ready for operation by the first of September, and, as a security for the execution of their contract, they are obliged to deposit $250,000. If the road is not built by that time they expose themselves to a confiscation of their deposit. Now, will this Klondike boom last ? Is it not to be feared that the boom may collapse as the Winnipeg land boom collapsed, with disastrous effects to speculators ? Where then will be the profits from the traffic on this railway ? The contractors run, then, a great risk and expose themselves to serious loss. In consideration of these risks, and of the difficulties of transport of materials and men, and of the high wages for the workingmen, and knowing the enormous expenses which the contractors will be obliged to pay before they can get a solitary penny, the government have given them 3,750,000 acres of land in blocks of three miles by six, alternately with these which are reserved by the government. " But," say some, " these lands are of incalculable value." Now, we know nothing of this except from whatever speculative estimates we may form. They may be worth a great deal, but again they may be worth little. On paper 3,750,000 acres appears to us a fabulous amount, but the space which they occupy compared on the map with the entire surface of the Yukon region is but a small part of that mountainous territory. These lands, it is true, may be taken by different parties in that country and in the Northwest to extend from the Mackenzie River in the east to the Liard River in the south, but we must not forget that the contractors are obliged to choose a piece of land in each base line to take at least four blocks of three miles each which alternate with the blocks reserved by the government. The length of each base line is 24 miles. That is the least which they have the right to take when they make any selection. The contractors are not at liberty to choose indifferently a mile here and a mile there. A fact which will considerably diminish the value of these lands given to the contractors in this sense, that if the block contains gold and the contractors wish to take it they are also obliged to take three others which may not contain gold or possess any value. I doubt not that we shall find hereafter, in consequence of this provision, that more than three-fourths of that stretch of land will possess no value for the contractors. Further we should not forget here that the first ten miles of road must be completed before they have the right to take any lands in that part of the country, and from the moment that they conform to the rules and this thing above all others, the gold seekers in that country will be many and the best places will be located. For these different considerations it will be seen that the contractors have assumed considerable risks, and that the area of land which has been given them is not greater in proportion than the risks which they run. Further, if those lands should prove to be valuable, the blocks reserved by the government will also possess a corresponding value. Contractors will be interested in exploring and advertising these lands, and as the government reserve each alternate block for every block that enriches the company, the neighbouring block will enrich the nation. The government are also reproached for not having called for tenders. Conservatives reproached us for that though during all the years that they were in power, they had not themselves called for tenders when aiding in the construction of railways by subsidies of land. In the case before us there was the plea of urgency, the object being to give our own people the benefit of the traffic which our neighbours are trying to procure for themselves to our detriment. Nothing has been spared to accomplish that object. The Minister of the Interior was not afraid to embark in the perilous voyage to those distant regions to learn for himself and to inform the government as to what was best to be done in the interest of the country, and also in the interest of humanity. We all know that he prepared an expedition to go to the aid of a number of suffering miners who risked all to go to these distant and inhospitable regions and he decided to construct a railway as soon as possible. Under these circumstances two remarkable men, known by all business men for their ability, their solvency, their great experience in the construction of railways, possessing unlimited credit, Canadian above all, made the government an offer to construct this railway and that within a few months without asking a cent from the government, but only a land grant. Hon. gentlemen it has rarely happened in this country that men like Mackenzie & Mann have been in a position to make such an offer to any government and furnish, at the same time, a guarantee for the due execution of their contract. The government after getting information, after taking all the precautions to prevent any loss to the country by the transaction, entered into the contract with these gentlemen which we are now discussing. Hon. gentlemen we may not approve of all the clauses of the bill. It may be rejected, but I shall be none the less convinced that the country will be satisfied that the government of the day have done their duty under the circumstances. I thank you hon. gentlemen for the kind attention with which you have listened to my remarks.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—After listening to the hon. gentlemen who preceded me, especially to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, the feeling with which I am filled is one of sympathy for the unfortunate contractors of this road. It would almost appear as if the Senate were going to take advantage of the innocence and good nature of these gentlemen. I am glad, as a professional friend of the hon. gentleman from Rimouski to be able to congratulate him on the tenderness he has evinced and which the long practice of his profession has not hardened. In rising to make a few remarks I shall not detain the House more than ten minutes. I would say at once that it occurs to me that it is the duty of the Senate to afford, so far as it is possible, to the government of the day, whatever may be its political complexion, every facility to carry out all needful legislation without hindrance and without factious opposition. Certainly that is my desire, and I think I am not mistaken when I say it is the desire of the hon. gentlemen I have had the opportunity of speaking to. And here I shall pay a tribute to the extremely delicate manner in which I myself have been treated by the leader of the opposition. I have met him several times and I do not yet know his views. Directly or indirectly, neither he, nor any member of the government acting in sympathy with him has endeavoured to influence me in any way whatever as to what I have to say or as to how I am to vote. I could have wishes that both Houses might have proposed a measure with broad lines within which the House of Commons and the Senate could have framed a bill which would be just and fair, and even generous—as generous as it could be—to those who were willing and competent to undertake the work. But how is it with us to-day? We have here submitted to us a bill prepared with great care by gentlemen on one side. It is complete, and fashioned in all its parts, and we are told, in plain terms, we are not permitted to touch it; we have simply to accept it as it is, or reject it in toto. I contend that is not putting us in the position we should be in. I am strongly in favour of legislation to provide railway facilities for the Yukon country, but not in the manner in which we are permitted to have those facilities seemingly secured by the bill under consideration. I say that it is our duty to avoid friction with the House of Commons so far as it is possible, but are we simply to ignore and put aside our oath of office, and swallow a bill, a very partial bill in the shape in which it is offered to us here? What are the chief things in it to which I object? First, the terminals are ribbed in ice for about seven months of the year. That is the average period during which the Stikine River and Teslin Lake are closed. When the Stikine River is open, we are told by one engineer, the navigation is not what is desirable. The current at some places runs seven to eight miles an hour, and snags and so forth make navigation hazardous. It is true that the expenditure of a certain sum of money will remove those snags, but it will not diminish the current. What does a velocity of seven or eight miles an hour mean? We have a current of seven miles at St. Mary's at Montreal. When our steamers were first constructed it took oxen—I do not know how many yoke—to haul them up that current which, as I have said, is more than seven miles an hour. But here is a current of seven to eight miles, yet we are assured by one hon. gentleman that vessels can go up against that current without difficulty. A second objection I have to the bill is that the proposed route passes through a territory that is not exclusively our own. As a Canadian, I strongly object to a route which may expose us to little petty annoyances, and, perhaps, at times, to great inconveniences. I have every confidence in the honour of our neighbours on the south side of the line, but let me ask: when it comes to any negotiation, arbitration or dispute as to territory, who comes out best? When there is a gold field of incalculable value beyond a line which is not yet definitely established will it aid us in getting that line established on a fair and equitable basis? I think we will find the difficulty enormously increased. As has been well pointed out by the hon. member from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) we do not know what length this road will be. It is spoken of as a road of 150 miles, but the road is from the navigable portion of the river, and that navigable portion of the river may be made to commence much nearer the mouth of the Stikine than Glenora. Instead of having a road of 150 miles, it may be 200 miles long or more, and instead of getting 3,750,000 acres of land, those gentlemen may get something nearer 6,000,000, which would be by far the larger part of the gold-bearing portion of the Klondike. Another very serious objection is as to the base line. That clause is constructed with an ingenuity, on the one side, which is admirable; but I must say that those who on the part of that country have appended their names to the contract were not quite so keen sighted. I have looked into this base line question not a little. It may proceed in any direction. It may be the centre of a creek or river, laid at right angles to the three mile limit on either side, it may take additional blocks of three miles each from new base lines running along the outer fringe of the block already chosen by the contractors or which may be left for the public—provided the cardinal points are adhered to. It may start at one place and go due north, at another go due south, at another east and another west. If one takes a solid block of three by six miles, and commences at one point and go off at right angles to that, establish a new base line, taking the same quantity, and doing the same on the other side, one will get a large block of land which will hedge in other blocks of land. Of course it is true that the terminals are not to be extended, but that is a matter of no moment. When one has obtained the number of miles, three times eight, one has gone about as far in one direction as one would wish to go. Another objection is that one would paralyze the miners' efforts, so far as their connection with the Klondike country is concerned. The miner, if this contract becomes law, will find it to be to his interest to deal with the contractors, rather than with the government. He is not going to pay 10 per cent to the government when he can pay a little over one per cent to the contractors. Then, again, what will be the nature of the population? Is it an agricultural, peace-loving population, such as we have, particularly in the province of Quebec, requiring no police to look after them? No. The men who go there discard readily that admirable advice we get in scripture "Make not haste to be rich." They go there to get rich at all hazards and in any way they can to make money. That is the kind of population that will soon be found there. If English capital will go in there, English miners will go in too, and the English miner goes in with a determination to preserve his rights at all hazards. Suppose he is mining there and encroaches, or is told he encroaches upon one of those parallel lines, do you suppose that any number of men can keep him and his associates from continuing to mine there? And if you cannot have him protected, what will English capitalists cry out, and with reason? "We put our money into that country; our miners have gone out and yet you do not give them that protection to which they are entitled." If we lay down parallel lines, wherever it may suit the interest of contractors to lay them all over this frozen region, we undertake to give peaceable possession to the contractor or the miner, as the case may be, and I contend it is impossible to give either of them protection under the circumstances. I shall only say, in reply to both hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, that if this measure carries I shall, as a senator, be very glad to avail myself of the privilege which is not denied me as a senator, but which is denied to members of the House of Commons, the privilege of having a part or an interest in the undertaking. I should consider a small share in this enterprise the best asset I could have, and better certainly than any I have at present. I believe that the amount of gold in that region is beyond our conception. It is enormous. It is to be met with here and there. It is not distributed evenly, but large quantities will be met with here and small quantities there and larger quantities in other places. And it is for this reason, chiefly, that I object to so large a quantity of land, which may be of priceless value, being given for so small an amount of work as that implied in the construction of this primitive railway. It is but fair to add: I have nothing to say with regard to Mr. Sifton. He may be, and no doubt is a clear headed shrewd business man; but were he many times as shrewd and clever, he could not possibly cope with contractors. Contractors are still more shrewd and clever, and in their contracts with the government they always get the best of it. It is their business, and the minister, who has a thousand things to attend to, and can only attend to one thing at a time, invariably comes out at the small end.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—He has in this case.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—Yes, he has, seemingly, in this case. It occurs to me that we should do as other business men do. Let us suppose we are buying a piece of land. We are told in the contract or deed of sale that it is bounded in such and such a way; then we go and see the land in order to ascertain for ourselves, and we state that we are content therewith, having seen and viewed the same. The only informed men upon this question are the contractors. I should think no men better informed except, perhaps, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. They have had men up there seven or eight months, and they have shown their confidence if not in the gold scheme at least in the traffic by having two magnificent steamers built, and eleven or twelve river boats to carry the traffic to and fron that country, and they speak with connaissance de cause. They know the future and evidently think it a bright one. I say in conclusion let us not give away something the extent of which we cannot at the present moment estimate for work which can be readily done by contract for a moderate amount of money which the country is willing and able to pay.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before making any remarks on the subject before the House, I should like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to one of the paragraphs in the agreement between Canada and the English government when the purchase of the Hudson Bay Company's rights in the North-west was effected. The 8th paragraph, as signed by Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir George Cartier and William Macdougall reads:

It is understood that any claim of Indians for compensation for lands required for purpose of settlement shall be disposed of by the Canadian government in communication with the Imperial government and that the government shall be relieved of all responsibility in respect to the same.

I should like to ask whether any steps have been taken to quiet the claims of the Indians in the Yukon district. I am aware the number is not very large, but notwithstanding that fact, their rights are just as dear to them as to the larger numbers in the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Whenever the Indians make a claim the government will be prepared to consider that claim, and to consider it in a generous spirit, but no such claim has ever been made.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I cannot but express my surprise at the answer which has been given by the Minister of Justice. Having been the Minister of the Interior in the administration of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, he knows that his duty was, before sending settlers into the North-west Territories, or conceding lands to any company for any purpose, or granting lands to bona fide settlers or to speculators, first to settle the rights of the Indians in that particular locality in which they placed the lands in the market. No policy in the past has justified the waiting for an application on the part of the natives of the country claiming their rights, whatever they may be, to the lands or to the territory in which they live. The hon. gentleman evidently, in this matter, with the government of which he is a member, has paid as little attention to the constitution which governs the acquisition of that territory, and which enables them to dispose of it, as they did to the treaties which governed England, her Colonies and foreign countries, and just as much attention apparently has been paid to this important point as they paid to the Berne convention, when, on the eve of an election it was announced to the world that a great reduction in foreign postage would take place. On each and every occasion when the government has attempted to do anything in the way of advancing the trade or improving the postal facilities, as in this case, they have apparently paid no attention whatever to the provisions of the constitution which governs this country. Whether it is due to recklessness in their mode of procedure, or to utter ignorance of the existence of the treaty to which I refer, I must leave it to the people of the country to judge. Perhaps the Premier, as leader, will have the opportunity of shouldering his musket, and instead of going to the Saskatchewan in defence of the rights of the Metis, which were supposed to be invaded, he may have to go to the Yukon. However, be that as it may, I leave it with the hon. gentleman and his colleagues to decide, with the sincere hope that whatever may occur in the future, that there may be no difficulty or bloodshed arising from interference with the rights of the aborigines. Before addressing myself to the question before the House, as I propose to do as briefly as possible, I may say that I read the speech of the gentleman who is principally responsible for the bill now before the House, a speech occupying over five hours of time; and I confess, I found, I should judge that one-half or four-fifths of the whole speech was devoted to an attack upon the leader of the opposition in the Lower House, Sir Charles Tupper, in trying to convict him of inconsistency arising out of expressions which he had used before parliament met, and that about fifty minutes was devoted to the subject before the House, or in explaining why he gave out a contract to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. My hon. friend that sits opposite me spoke for a little over one hour and a half, and I think I might repeat what I heard a gentleman say in commenting on that speech, that one hour of that hour and a half was devoted to pointing out "the obvious and incontestably proving the indisputable," which might have been delivered with profit and instruction to a class of students on constitutional law in some of the universities of the country. One thing is certain: it had nothing whatever to do with the question before the House further than to inform the senators that they had no right under any circumstances to change, alter or amend the bill, but as the hon. gentleman who preceded me said, we must swallow it holus bolus or reject it altogether. Whether that has been the policy pursued in the past by the party with which he is connected, and more particularly with the former leader of the opposition in this House, I shall endeavour to show. When we look at the style in which they indulge in dealing with this matter, it must be sufficient to deter any ordinary individual from attempting to give expression to his opinion. We have been called the hired men of certain people, by the organs of the party; we have been called old, decrepit, imbecile, and almost every other expression, not only of contempt but of derision that the English language provides has been hurled at us. We may be old; I do not know that that is our fault. We may be decrepit; if so nature has done that for us. Whether we be imbeciles or not, I hope we shall be able to show to the world when we cast our votes on this worst of all kinds of bills ever presented to a legislative body. I notice, also, that while many of these leading newspapers are condemning the senate in the most virulent manner for daring to express an opinion, and claiming the construction of this road for the purpose of securing the entire trade with the Yukon districts, they are at the same time urging in the strongest possible manner, the building of railways in other sections of the country supporting bills which are now before the Lower House, which have for their whole and sole object the taking off raw material out of Canada into the United States where the ore would be smelted, towns built up, smelters erected, and employment given to those who desire employment in that section of the country. It struck me, in reading these different comments, more particularly those in the journal which is supposed to represent public opinion in Ontario, but I should rather be inclined to say represents the individual opinions of ministers, and not those of the people at the present time; and which, in this matter of the Kettle River Railway Bill, might well be designated the organ of the gentlemen who have the longest purses in this country, and in the United States. What we have to consider is how far in the first place these attacks upon the Senate are justified. My hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Miller) pointed out in a statesmanlike and masterly manner the peculiar powers and functions of the Senate, and the causes for its establishment and what are its duties. I shall endeavour to prove by the records that the Senate has not been of that character described more particularly by the hon. gentleman who spoke last night; and that upon all occasions they have not been actuated solely and wholly by partisan feelings. Before doing that, however, let me ask my hon. friend who sits opposite me (Mr. Mills) what he meant by saying that he did not want, and this country did not want, men to go to Washington to influence Congress to legislate against the interests of this country? Did I understand him to mean that any party or person connected with the opposition in this House, or with the opposition in this country, had been in Washington pursuing the course which he indicated by insinuation, if not by direct charge? If he does, his duty to the Senate and to the country is to let us know who they are. I know of no missions to Washington on business of that kind, except by gentlemen belonging to his own party. I have a distinct recollection of a member of the Lower House visiting Washington when the McKinley tariff was being framed and passed by that legislature, to point out how it could be so worded as to prevent the possibility of Canada taking a certain course in relation to our lumbering interest, without meeting with retribution on the part of the United States. Only the other day I had occasion to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to a statement made by Mr. Farrer before a committee of congress, in which he pointed out to them, when they were discussing the famous bill which has been passed by Congress refusing the bonding and other privileges at Wrangel, and other ports on the Pacific, unless Canada makes concessions of a certain character to the people of the United States on the Atlantic. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) said that Mr. Farrer did not go there on their instructions; but he did this, he told that committee that he had reason to believe that concessions would be made by the government of Canada, and I am under the impression that when he went there he must have gone, not only with the consent, but with certain secret instructions from those who are governing the country at the present moment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My reason for believing that and making the statement, is the fact that Mr. Farrer was in confidential communication with that party when they were in opposition, that he wrote the famous letters, stating how they could coerce Canada into making certain concessions by adopting the principle of unrestricted reciprocity, or commercial union. We also know that he was not only in confidential communication, but that he has, during the last year, been on the most intimate terms with the gentlemen who are now governing Canada, and the country had a right to assume that when he made a statement of that kind before so important a body as a committee of the United States Congress, he had some authority for doing so. It must have been a matter of great pleasure to members of the Conservative party, and those who sympathize with the Conservative policy, to hear the loyal sentiments and anti-Yankee utterances from gentlemen opposite who for years have been advocating closer commercial intercourse and more friendly relations with the people to the south of us. How often have we been condemned, when every step that was honourable in its character had been taken to bring about closer trade relations with our neighbours, as adopting a certain policy and taking a certain course by which we irritated our neighbours, and that therefore they would never make any concessions to that party, but that the sunny ways of the hon. gentlemen opposite were to bring about the millenium as soon as they attained to power. It is true the elections were scarcely over and they had scarcely assumed the responsibility of office, before they had begun to visit Washington, and the result was just what had been predicted over and over again—that on no occasion would our neighbours surrender anything unless they could get one hundred per cent or two hundred per cent advantage in privileges in our markets therefor. It is not so long ago that the members of the present government declared their preference for trade relations with the United States. We all know that the present Minister of Trade and Commerce told the people in Boston that this whole northern continent would be, under unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, the northern states of that union, and the seaboard at Boston would be the emporium for the receipt of all the trade that would flow from the northern part of this country, for saying which he was designated by one gentleman at that public demonstration as the United States senator for Canada. Now, forsooth, I have actually heard insinuations and inuendos thrown out against the party of which I am a very humble member, of trying to play into the hands of the Americans.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend says hear, hear. I should like to contrast his position at the present moment, with that of 25 years ago. He has advanced rapidly, and I congratulate him on the reform of his opinions in reference to our relations with the United States and foreign countries compared with what they were when he first came into parliament. He forgets the diatribes and abuse that came from this chair, when my hon. friend, the Secretary of State occupied it because we tried (and under the treaty we had a perfect right) to direct the trade of the St. Lawrence from the great west down to Montreal. We were accused of violating the treaty though we applied the same rule and the same penalties to every Canadian vessel that was applied to the United States. That was denounced not only as an attempt to coerce the United States, but as a flagrant abuse of the laws of the country. All that has changed; and if the country has any one thing more than another to congratulate itself upon, it is the changed tone of those gentlemen since they attained to office. It has had a marvellous effect upon each one of them, and for that reason, if for no other, I think it is a good thing that they have been permitted to attain to the positions which they now hold, and will for a short time at least. Let me look at the charge which has been made against the Conservative party for acting exclusively from party motives when dealing with questions coming from the Lower House. I shall not, however—this may be a little divergent—devote any particular time to the remarks of my young friend who spoke last night when he thought proper, referring to the action of the Lower House, to allude to certain negotiations and the whitewashing, as he termed it, of Sir Adolphe Caron. I might retort, with a good deal of force, that I might travel down to his own province and expose some of the rascalities of which some of the friends of the party to which my hon. friend belongs, had been guilty. However, I might point out to my young and verdant friend——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is he verdant?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not parliamentary and I withdraw the remark.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I do not complain of the epithet.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What I intended to imply was, that the hon. gentleman was speaking without a knowledge of the facts as they appear upon the records. If my hon. friend will study the history of the Senate from confederation, he will find that at the very first when the Senate was not so strongly Conservative as it became afterwards, that Sir John Macdonald's government consolidated the criminal laws of the different provinces so as to bring them into unison as near as possible, the bill came to this House at a period in which the senators thought they could not give it that attention that so important a matter deserves. My hon. friend on my left (Mr. Allan), who certainly will not be accused of any antagonism to Sir John Macdonald or to his government, was one of the first parties to say to the Commons: "Unless you are prepared to send to this House important measures of that kind at a period when we shall have not only sufficient time to investigate but to consider them, we refuse to consider them at all, and the result was they rejected the whole consolidation of the laws, compelling the House of Commons at the next session to commence de novo upon that question. Then we find on going a little further, that during the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie's regime the Senate rejected what was termed the Esquimalt Railway Bill, and my hon friend stated last night most distinctly and positively that they did it from party motives. Let us analyse the vote and see how far that charge against the Senate is justified. My hon. friend Mr. Aikins moved, seconded by Mr. Alexander, to leave out the word "now," "this day six months." That motion was carried by 24 to 21—only three majority. Among the Liberals who voted for that measure were Messrs. Benson, Dever, Dumouchel, Flint, McClelan, McMaster, Penny and Seymour.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Was not Mr. Dever on your side.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Mr. Dever claimed then to be Liberal, and I think you will find him so to-day. My hon. friend will not say that Mr. McClelan, the present governor of New Brunswick, was on our side at any time; nor will he say that the late Mr. McMaster or Mr. Penny, the editor and proprietor of the Montreal Herald was a Conservative at that time. And there was Mr. Seymour, formerly a Conservative, but a supporter of the Mackenzie government. So that you have among those twenty-four, seven Liberals who voted for the rejection of that bill.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—And defeated it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—How did my hon, friend vote at that time?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was not aware that I was in the Senate in 1875. What has that to do with the question at issue? I was in the Commons and I voted with my party—I voted against the bill?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the Commons very soon voted in favour of it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, the hon. gentleman is now dealing with an interval of some ten or fifteen years. It was only a short time before Sir John Macdonald died that the bill to which he refers was passed, the circumstances being altogether different. But supposing that were true, supposing I was inconsistent in all the votes I ever gave, or that I never voted at all, or that I voted on the other side, what has that to do with the independence of this House in rejecting a measure, when seven Liberals voted for a motion for the rejection of the bill brought down by the government against which there was only three majority?

I should like to know what the interruption of the hon. gentleman means when he asked how I voted. Then look at the other side; I find Mr. Skead, Mr. Montgomery, Mr. Muirhead, Mr. Howlan, Mr. Carroll, Mr. McDonald (B.C.), Mr. Miller and Mr. Cornwall, all Conservatives, voted with the government. So that this bill was rejected by the votes of the Liberal party against the government of which they were supporters; and yet my hon. friend says that that is an exhibition of party prejudice of the Senate, being actuated by no other motive than partyism.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—My hon. colleague may allow me to correct an impression he has taken from my declaration. I did not mention the objection to that bill as showing any prejudice on the part of this House against the popular branch. It was, on the contrary, objected to me by one of my hon. colleagues, I think the member for Marquette, that this chamber had shown its independence once in its existence by rejecting that bill, and I said was the bill introduced by a Liberal administration. He remarked that it was. I did not impute any motives to the hon. gentleman, who on that occasion voted against it, but it happened to be when this chamber had a fit of independence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think I misunderstood the hon. gentleman, nor has his explanation made the matter any better. If the measure was rejected it was, he said, rejected in a fit of independence; if so, it was on the part of the party to which my hon. friend belongs. Had his party voted as a unit, the Mackenzie bill would not have been thrown out. Then let me give another case where the Senate proved its independence; and this, too, in connection with a money bill. There was what was termed the Short Line or Salisbury and Harvey Railway. A contract had been entered into by Sir John Macdonald's government with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the construction of what is known as the Short Line running through Maine. It was divided into three separate and distinct sections. The first part and the third part were operated from Montreal until it reached a certain point, and then went to St. John; but the second section of the contract was to run from Harvey to Salisbury, in order to have a short connecting link with the Intercolonial Railway, so as to make the trip to Halifax shorter than it would be by going via St. John. The Hon. Mr. Miller, a supporter of the government and a Conservative, moved the six months' hoist to that bill, a bill granting the subsidy we had agreed to pay to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the construction of this short line. There was a Conservative senator exhibiting that independence which always characterized the party when matters came before the House that they thought were not right. Notwithstanding the strenuous efforts which were made by the government of that day to have that bill passed, he moved the six months' hoist. The vote for the rejection of that bill in this strongly Conservative house at that time, more so than at the present moment, was 22 against 11, and among the yeas were Mr. Baillargeon, Mr. Dever, Mr. Flint, Mr. Grant, Mr. McInnes (B.C.), Mr. O'Donohoe and Mr. Reesor—my hon. friend who has just delivered us a very quiet, calm and dignified address, in which he pointed out the impropriety of this House ever voting against a measure appropriating money for any purpose. When he was making that speech I thought I had a recollection of what had occurred in the past, and on turning up the vote, I see my hon friend has forgotten his past record, and lectures us now on our duty, while he pursued precisely the same course in the year 1889, that he condemns to-day. The nays on that occasion were only eleven, and I must say, looking over the list, that I think they were all Conservatives. That is another evidence in which the Senate had a fit—as my hon. friend calls it—of independence. Last session they had another fit of independence when they rejected what is known as the Drummond County Railway Bill. What the result ultimately of the action of the Senate will be, remains altogether in the future, but we have this gratifying fact before us, that in the investigation which has been going on by the committee of the House of Commons, Mr. Blair himself stated that he could, at the present time, purchase that road at $1,600,000, while the bargain a year ago, when we rejected it, would have cost the country about $2,200,000, so that there is $600,000, if not merely a million of money, actually saved; and probably before we get through the investigation we may save a few more thousand dollars. And now we all have a recollection of a matter in which my hon. friend the Secretary of State and the hon. gentleman (not present) from Halifax opposed the Dauphin Lake Railway Bill at the session in which I had the honour of leading the House on the opposite side; so determined were they to defeat it, knowing that the Governor General had been notified to come down to the House and prorogue it at three o'clock, he moved the six months' hoist, and kept up the discussion until after three o'clock in the afternoon, until I found it incumbent on myself to inform His Excellency, through his aide-de-camp, that parliament could not be prorogued that day; and I informed the House that until a vote was taken upon that question, parliament would not be prorogued, if it took a week or a month. That was another instance in which the hon. gentleman attempted to frustrate the will of at least a large majority in the House of Commons. Now I shall run over as rapidly as possible, the course pursued by my hon. friend, the present Secretary of State, when in opposition. He was then the leader of the opposition in this House. In 1880 the Hon. Mr. Scott divided the House on the Esquimalt Dock Bill, a bill to grant a certain amount of money for the construction of the Esquimalt dock. It is true he was defeated. In 1880 the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill passed by no less than two-thirds of a majority in the House of Commons and yet my hon. friend, who was then leading the opposition in the Senate, moved the six months' hoist, taking the course that they now condemn as being unconstitutional. I am not finding fault with them; I am only pointing out the difference between the position they occupy to-day and that which they held when they were on this side of the House. In 1885 we had the Franchise Bill before us. We shall have another Franchise Bill here in a very short time, and my hon. friend, the leader of the House, the Minister of Justice, will I am sure, in that solemn way in which he has of addressing us, tell us that that is a question with which we have nothing whatever to do. My hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Scott) moved the six months' hoist to that Franchise Bill. I suppose we have the same right when it comes here; whether we exercise it or not will be another question. My hon. friend who spoke last night, said, Oh, if they did not carry that it was because they had not a majority of the vote. That was a little information that was somewhat superfluous to give.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I beg my hon. colleague's pardon. I have never made such a declaration. I know that a measure is lost when there is not a majority for it. I said those votes only indicated the sentiment of the majority of this House, and I did not think they would permit it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Prejudice!

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The prejudice of the Conservatives and the partisanship of the senators was so great that they would not permit the hon. leader of the opposition to thwart the will of the representatives of the people in the Lower House. That is what my hon. friend contended in this case, that as this measure had by 39 votes been carried in the affirmative by the Lower House, therefore this Senate had no right to reject it, that is the point I desire to make against my hon. friend. Then, in 1886, there was a Subsidy Bill for the railway on Vancouver Island to which my hon. friend moved the six months' hoist. I have already called attention to the Harvey-Salisbury road, and also to the action of the party in connection with the Hudson Bay road, and the Winnipeg and Great Northern road. I think I have shown quite sufficient in that respect to prove that members of this House, irrespective of party, have upon all occasions, when great questions came before them, exercised an independent judgment in the recording of their votes.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Will the hon. gentleman permit me to point out another occasion, also when the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie was in power and the Lower House passed a bill abolishing cable monopoly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is just the reverse. The bill repealed the Act under which the cable company had a monopoly.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And it was rejected by the Senate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The case to which I am about to refer is one in which I personally and the government of which I was a member was interested. I brought before this House in 1894 a bill of the most important character, one affecting the whole commerical interests of the Dominion—the Bankruptcy Bill. I carried it through the Senate that session, but it did not pass through the Lower House for want of time. I re-introduced it at the next session of parliament. It received its first reading, but the independent thought of this House was such as to induce the members of the Senate to inform me very quietly that if it was pushed to a second reading the government would be defeated, and considering that discretion, under the circumstances, was the better part of valour, I never moved the second reading, for the reason that the Senate was strongly opposed to an Insolvent Act at the time. The government was strong in the Lower House, and if my hon. friend's contention was true, equally strong in this House ; but the independent members of the Senate forgot party, as they have done on many important occasions, and distinctly but quietly said to the government of the day, you cannot place on the statute-book a bill of that character. That was in the face of a demand from the whole commercial community of this Dominion, backed by the request—when I speak of the commercial world I mean the merchants and traders' particularly the wholesale traders—backed by all the influence that could be brought to bear from the wholesale merchants of England, Ireland and Scotland,

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I know that my hon. friend wants to be reported correctly. The hon. gentleman says the bill was not read the second time. I know it was not, but the hon. gentleman moved the second reading of the bill, but found the feeling of the Senate was so strongly against it that he had to withdraw the bill. He did his whole duty, but when he found that he was going to be defeated he did not press it. That is the way the case stands.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My explanation for pursuing was that, discretion being the better part of valour, I withdrew the bill rather than be defeated, and it would be well if others followed the same course. I have occupied more time on this subject than perhaps it deserves, but so much has been said of the want of independence of senators and subserviency to party, that I deem it my duty to the hon. gentlemen who occupy seats in this House to say that I have searched the records with a view to dissipating the idea, if it prevailed among any portion of the people. I shall devote a little time, and endeavour to occupy as short a time as possible, to the bill now before the House. I confess frankly that the more I have read the speeches in defence of the measure, the more I have been convinced of the impropriety of having it become law, and for this reason : they have proved beyond a doubt, if the statements made are to be relied upon, that the trade of that portion of the country and the traffic over that 150 miles of railway will be so enormous that it must pay for itself without any subsidy or assistance from the government. My hon. friend from Westmoreland, (Mr. Wood) called attention to the building of railways in western Australia, amplifying what I said when addressing the House on the speech from the throne. I have also read to-day this important statement, that the Slocan road, of which this is a counterpart, a thirty mile road, cost $600,000. It is built in one of the most mountainous parts of British Columbia. It is closed for five to six months of the year with snow and ice, and for other reasons ; and yet in three years time it has paid for the full cost of the construction, the passenger fare being seven cents per mile. Now we are told by the organs of the party who are supporting this measure that there is over one hundred millions of freight in sight ; that some hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand people will go into that country during the next year. Even taking the low rate upon the Slocan road for freight it will more than pay for itself ; and if the road in western Australia could be built for about $2,500 per mile and the right of collecting tolls from passengers and freight for about fifteen months, could more than pay for the cost of construction and allow the contractors to retire with a comfortable competency, what would this 150 miles of tramway pay to the contractors if one-tenth part of the freight and passengers go over it that the hon. gentlemen opposite themselves say are to be taken into that country ? Then we are told, as a defence for that, that it is a matter of urgency. My hon. friend who last addressed the House spoke upon that point and tried to impress it upon our attention. One would suppose, to read these speeches and to hear the statements made by the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State, that the gold producing character of this country had never been heard of before. I find a despatch was sent as long ago as 1878 by Mr. Thornton, the then minister at Washington, to Lord Derby, pointing out the necessity of settling the boundary. Why? Because gold had been discovered in that country and trouble might arise by the influx of people to that part of the continent. Now, coming down to our own time we find that Bishop Bompas, in 1894, called the attention of the then government to the necessity for adopting some means by which peace could be preserved in the Yukon district. And we find also that action was taken by the then government, that an Order in Council was passed in 1894 authorizing an inspector and non-commissioned officer of police to go and examine into the statements made by the Reverend Bishop and to report to the government. That was on the 6th of June, 1894; and that after making inquiries upon all the subjects he left the non-commissioned officer at Fort Cudahy for the winter and returned to Ottawa. In the spring of 1895 orders were issued for a detachment of two officers, surgeon and seventeen men, while I was president of the council, to go to that country in order to preserve peace in the Yukon. They went there from Seattle.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Was anything being done at that time in the way of mining?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, they were mining at that time, and it was for that reason that this body of men was sent out to preserve peace, if necessary, in that country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the Indian title was not extinguished then?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We did not sell any lands. Not only were there no lands sold, but no regulations were issued and consequently no control was taken by the government of the day, nor was there any interference on our part with the stray miners who were in that country, so that my hon. friend's interruption has very little force. In the spring of 1895, twenty new men were sent out and the government decided to increase the strength as my hon. friend knows, but at that time there was no means of reaching that country except by taking a steamer at Seattle, sailing to St. Michael's and going up the Yukon. That was the only available entrance into that country. It was well known, therefore, that mining was going on and that there was likely to be a development of that region, and that the government of the day was aware of the fact, that it was necessary to look after the interests of those who were in that country. Then we find that Mr. Blair, the Minister of Railways, in a speech made in the House at the close of the session stated that a number of representations had been made to the government in reference to the necessity of paying more attention to that country. His language was:

> Hon. members of this House will recollect quiet plainly that before the close of last session evidence was pouring in upon us of the immense discovery of gold that was taking place in the Yukon district, and returning parties from that remote region were bringing the most fabulous accounts of its mineral deposits. No one who was at all interested in public affairs could fail to realize that very important questions were likely to arise in connection with the question of the great gold discovery.

They had at that time received reports from agents and those who had been sent to that country to report. That fact is established by this little incident, that Mr. Lister, one of the members of the Lower House, received a copy of the report in June or July, immediately after, or about the time of the prorogation of parliament, showing clearly that at that early period they knew all that they pretend to have discovered at a later day, and that if it was requisite to enter so suddenly into a secret bargain with Mackenzie & Mann in the latter part of the year, they are culpable for not having taken action at an earlier period, when they knew the necessity that existed for looking after the peace of the country. I shall not read these different reports, because I read the other night the dates at which they were received. If you will look at the estimates of 1896, you will find that there was an item placed in the Supply Bill of $6,000 for the purpose of surveying and ascertaining the feasibility of the navigation of the Stikine River. I should like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, or the hon. Secretary of State, whether that $6,000 was ever expended? I see no charge of it in the public accounts. Was it put in as a blind, or was it another evidence of gross and most culpable negligence in connection with the management of that country? There is ample evidence that they had sufficient knowledge before the time they entered into the secret agreement with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. It has been stated—and I desire not to repeat what has been said so often further than is absolutely necessary—that they had no other offer, that the only men with whom they could deal were Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. Mr. Blair himself said, in his speech the other day, that not only Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, but others also, called upon the government. The question was asked who did call, and his reply was:

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We had quite a few people. I was not in Ottawa much at that time, and if I am not as well informed with respect to those minute particulars and details as is my hon. friend Mr. Sifton, he will take occasion to enlighten the House fully on the matter. I know there were others. There were others who felt they represented large amounts of capital and had untold means behind them, and were willing to talk railway. But none of these large capitalists ever materialized.

The hon. gentleman nods. I think I will prove to him in a few minutes that they did materialize and put in the hands of Mr. Sifton evidence of their bona fides and capability of doing what they proposed to carry out. Mr. Blair continued :

and, as far as I know, we did not get our eye on any of the credentials which went to establish how solid and capable these people were of carrying out the undertaking.

Then he adds this :

I believe they made overtures to my hon. friend as to the construction of this railway, or, to be correct, perhaps I should say, not as to the construction of this railway, but as to the construction of another railway, namely the Chilkat Pass Railway which naturally business men would much prefer to construct rather than the other. The result of their approaching the government and of the negotiations which took place between us, was, that they were induced to drop their Chilkat enterprise and to take up with the Teslin line.

Now mark this admission in this sentence of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. He says these parties approached him for the purpose of constructing a railway which business men of the country would naturally prefer to the Teslin route. Why should they prefer any other route unless it were easier of construction, and would enable them to carry on the commerce of the country at lower rates of freight and furnish a shorter route to reach their destination? I know what my hon. friend will say. He will say that it was a proposal to build a line to a United States port. I admit that Skagway, Dyea and Pyramid Harbour are at present claimed as United States territory; but I state with equal frankness, and with more positiveness, that Wrangel is more of a United States port than either of the other three places; and for this reason, no matter what the decision of any arbitrators or commission appointed to determine the boundary between the two countries, may be, Wrangel will never be a British possession. It is on an island and is recognized as United States territory; every line that has been run places it within the bounds of the United States. Is that so with either of the other places? I do not say that arbitrators will give us Pyramid Harbour or Skagway or Dyea, I am inclined to think they will not, for many reasons which I might, but which I will not, advance. This fact stares us in the face, that if the contention of the Imperial government be correct, then Skagway and Dyea and Pyramid Harbour are in Canada, and under no circumstances will Wrangel ever be in Canada. My hon. friend will say that while Wrangel is a United States port it is near the mouth of the Stikine River, and being near the Stikine River we have treaty rights which enable us to navigate those waters without let or hindrance. That is a proposition I deny. It is laid down clearly in the books which my hon. friend, if he replies to me, will read, that the free navigation of a water gives the right to land under stress of weather and certain other circumstances. But it does not give the right to set aside all customs regulations.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not all customs regulations, but it does give the right to set aside customs duties.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps my hon. friend can import some extraneous matter into the discussion in order to meet his point.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not extraneous.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I quite admit that no treaty regulations will set aside the tariff of any country unless it be stated in the treaty itself that the articles are to be free. But I am not aware that that has anything whatever to do with the question I am now discussing. On the 2nd April, 1874, this question of the right to navigate the Stikine was under discussion. The Collector of Customs at Sitka, Alaska, writing to the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington uses this language :

I learn that it is the intention of certain masters of foreign vessels to clear direct from Victoria, B.C., for Buck Bar, B.C., without making entry at the Port of Wrangel. This is in direct conflict with Article 1, page 10, of the regulations, &c., and in case it is permitted by our government, foreign goods and liquors can be landed with impunity on any of the small islands in American territory without payment of duty. The department will bear in mind that the mouth of the Stikine is about six miles from Wrangel, and if foreign boats are not required to land at Wrangel I would respectfully recommend that an inspector be appointed and stationed at the mouth of the river with a boat and crew for the purpose of intercepting and inspecting all foreign vessels, and satisfying himself that their cargoes agree with their manifests.

This collector of customs evidently knew his duty. While they were exempt from payment of duty they were not exempt from the observation of these customs regulations which are necessary in all countries for the protection of the revenue, and if any evidence of that is required you have it in the treaty itself. The treaty of Washington makes this provision :

The navigation of the River Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine ascending and descending from, to, and into the sea shall for ever remain free and open, for the purpose of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, and to the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of either country, British or American, within its territory, not inconsistent with such privileges of free navigation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS — Collecting duties would be inconsistent with that right.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— What duties ?

Hon Mr. MILLS—Customs duties.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— Why drag that point in continually ? I never contended that they had or had not to pay duty. I never said anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has a good many supporters that have been saying so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not responsible for what my supporters say. I would request my hon friend to confine his objections to the statements that I make myself. When a statement is made inconsistent with common sense, my hon. friend tries to attribute it to me, and when he cannot do that, he says it is made by those with whom I am acting. I could repeat a good many nonsensical statements which have been made by those acting with my hon. friend, which I am sure he would not care to have attributed to him. Now, the same language is used precisely in connection with the free navigation of the St. Lawrence to the Americans. Will my hon. friend tell me that a United States vessel coming from the sea up the St. Lawrence would be permitted to pass the different ports on her way to Oswego or Buffalo without proper supervision on the part of the customs of Canada ? If he does, he will excuse me when I say he knows very little of the operations of the customs and coasting laws. As it is on the St. Lawrence River, so it is on the Stikine. I have heard many of his own friends say, and I think he himself stated a few days ago, that a vessel could leave Port Simpson and go up the Stikine River without calling at Wrangel at all, and go to the border and pass in the goods. I tell him that under the laws of all nations and under all customs regulations, no such privilege would ever be conceded or granted to any country, A vessel without reporting her goods and being placed in bond, on passing the point at which an inspector should be stationed in order to supervise the cargo of that vessel could land liquors or goods of any kind on the shores, through the whole of Alaska without paying duty. No country would ever allow a thing of that kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No one is arguing that. My hon. friend is contending for a proposition which no one is denying. The question is whether the Americans would impose a duty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— No ; no such question was ever discussed by any men possessing a grain of sense. Though Wrangel is a United States port, and the free navigation of the Stikine is open to British subjects without let or hindrance, my contention was, when we discussed the subject before, that the regulation which would apply to Skagway or to Pyramid Harbour (which is now claimed to be in the United States), would apply to Wrangel also. It is true they might, by arbitrary laws, prevent you from going from Pyramid Harbour into the Yukon district, but it would be just as reasonable to suppose that they would prevent some of the eastern townships people from crossing the line into the state of Maine. I think I am in accord with my hon. friend when I say I do not believe that the provisions of the law which has been adopted by Congress are constitutional; neither do I believe that the President of the United States would ever sanction such arbitrary legislation; and if he did sanction it, layman though I am, I believe the Supreme Court of the United States would set it aside as ultra vires, being in direct opposition to the terms of that treaty.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend shakes his head; perhaps I am wrong, but I do not think so, notwithstanding that very wise shake of that very wise head. The fact that they have the right to make regulations, I repeat, applies with as much force to the one port as to the other, and unless the people of the United States would prevent the bonding of goods and the supervision of the transport of goods from Pyramid Harbour, or these other port to the border, that is just as good a port for us as Wrangel. It is complained that the United States officials charge an enormous fee, or, as somebody has said, five per cent upon the value of the goods going through the strip of territory claimed by the United States. Supposing that is true; is it anything new? That principle has been in vogue for the last 18 or 20 years, since I entered the Customs Department; and almost every year questions arose as to granting permission for the transportation of goods through Canada by pack trails in British Coulmbia in order to reach some of the mining district in Montana or Washington territory; and the permission was granted on condition of their paying the expense of the officer who would accompany them to see that the goods were not sold and distributed in Canada. There is this much I can say, we never charged them as much as the United States charged our people under similar circumstances. The United States used to charge us a much higher rate; there were also similar cases in regard to our miners on the border where miners were engaged in that mining country; and in getting back to the Upper Kootenay they used to charge our people three dollars a day for the men who accompanied them. Now at the Stikine, where the wages are a dollar an hour, I do not know that nine or ten dollars a day for an officer to accompany goods passing through that country, is more than three dollars in the eastern part of the country. This is held to be an imposition upon the trade of this country that has never existed before, when in fact it has been in existence ever since the necessity arose of passing from one country into another where there are no customs officials.

At six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Resumed. He said: At six o'clock I had pointed out what offers had been made to the government for the construction of the railway, I had first quoted from the speeches made by the ministers in the House of Commons, where they acknowledged having received offers from other parties besides Mackenzie & Mann. It was also stated, at the time, in reply to a remark, by Mr. Blair that they knew little of the bona fides of the parties who had made these offers, intimating that they had no knowledge of their financial ability or standing in the money markets of the world, and consequently were not in a position to consider their offers. I will now point out clearly what the offer really was, and what the negotiations of Mr. Kersey were some time before entering into the contract with Messrs Mackenzie & Mann. Those who have followed the debates in the Lower House will remember that Mr. Sifton, the Minister of the Interior, acknowledged having had an interview with Mr. Kersey and his representatives, when the question of the building of a railway to the Klondike was discussed. The facts as I have gleaned them are as follows: the statement made by the Minister of the Interior in reference to proposals by a company for the building of the Teslin Railway, represented by Mr. Maitland Kersey were not, I venture to affirm, strictly correct. Let us see how far that statement is correct. The facts, as I understand them, are, that a letter was addressed to Mr. Sifton on the 10th December, after an interview had by Mr. Kersey with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in which he offered, on behalf of his company, to build the road for $6,000 per mile, from the Dominion government, presupposing that he came to an agreement with the government of British Columbia for further assistance; which government was asked $4,000 per mile, but was afterwards amended to $2,250, together with 10,000 acres of land on the same basis as the grant made by the British Columbia government to the Cassiar Central Railway. After that interview Mr. Kersey went to London to arrange details for the quick construction of the railway, and leaving in Ottawa a representative to negotiate with the government for him. Cables passed during Mr. Kersey's stay in London, in which his agents here stated that the government would give no cash subsidy, but were prepared to receive an alternative proposal, and although Kersey's agent repeatedly visited Mr. Sifton and endeavoured to extract some information from him as to about what the government would grant, and in what territory the land would be taken from, he was utterly unable to obtain any information in the premises. On Mr. Kersey's arrival in Canada, on 21st January, he was advised that a contract was closed with Mackenzie & Mann, and was only awaiting signature, that all the details had been agreed to, except that Mackenzie & Mann desired the further assistance of a cash bonus, which the government declined to pay. On the Friday afternoon, 21st January, Mr. Kersey called on Mr. Sifton, and endeavoured to glean some information on which to base a further tender, but was unable to obtain any. On the Friday evening of the same day, Hon. Mr. Dobell and Mr. Borden, who, with other ministers, had insisted that Mr. Kersey's company should have fair play, took Mr. Kersey to Mr. Sifton. Mr. Sifton then said that he wanted an answer on the following day, or at the very latest by 10 o'clock on the Monday morning, as to what Mr. Kersey's proposals were. Mr. Kersey then for the first time ascertained from him that a land grant was to be given out of the whole Yukon territory, but no mention was made of the extent of the acreage, nor of any fact relating to the carrying mineral rights. Mr. Kersey was asked who were his supporters, and he handed a strictly confidential document so marked to Mr. Sifton, giving in confidence the names of subscribers to his syndicate. Mr. Kersey also was prepared to put up the necessary guarantee, but in the short space of time that was left to him to complete these important matters he was unable to communicate properly with London, or to receive an answer at 10 o'clock Monday morning. At that hour the expected answer not having been received, Mr. Kersey handed to Mr. Sifton a letter stating that he was unable to guarantee the completion of the road by September 1st without a cash bonus. On Monday afternoon a message was received from London and was at once sent in to Mr. Tarte, whom Mr. Kersey had seen in the morning, and whow as then at a council meeting.

Mr. Kersey's syndicate would have been fully prepared to undertake the construction of the railway for a very much less grant than that given to Mackenzie & Mann if they had in the first place been given any time to properly negotiate; and if, in the second place Mr. Kersey or his agent had been advised by Mr. Sifton, as were the present contractors, of the terms of the government, and how much they would grant. Now let me ask was not Mr. Kersey's proposal as originally made to the government, namely, of six thousand dollars, with a further grant of the British Columbia government of twenty-two hundred and fifty dollars and ten thousand acres of land from the British Columbia government, on the basis of the Cassiar Central lines, a far more advantageous basis of agreement to the government of Canada than the one entered into? The answer is so obvious that it were useless to discuss it further.

These are the facts as I gleaned them, and I noted them down so as to be as succinct as possible and to adhere strictly to the facts in the case, to show that the terms which were offered were better than the terms which the government accepted. What must strike any man who has given any attention to this point in particular, is, that Mr. Sifton studiously avoided having any intercourse or interview with any other persons than Mackenzie & Mann, who were willing to enter into a contract for the construction of a railway by the Stikine River route, which must lead to the conclusion that there was a predetermination that the contract should be given to these two gentlemen, and that all others should be cut out. Why should that be? Why was not the ordinary course of asking for tenders resorted to? There was no time, is the answer. Then, if there was not time to advertise for tenders, the propositions which had been made by these other parties, Mr. Maitland Kersey on the one part, and Mr. Hamilton Smith on the other, ought at least to have been considered. Under ordinary circumstances a man making a bargain on his own account for the construction of a house, or the building of a road, would take every possible advantage of any proposition which might be made to him. "Oh," says Mr. Sifton, and those defending the measure, "it was not my duty to run after these people: they should have come to me." This statement shows distinctly that, had it not been for the intervention of the Hon. Mr. Dobell and the Minister of Militia, Mr. Sifton would scarcely have given Mr. Kersey an interview, much less discuss the question of the terms of the construction of the railway over the very route that they say is the only one that should be opened up in the interests of Canada. That is, so far as Mr. Kersey is concerned. It is scarcely necessary that I should enter upon the question of Mr. Hamilton Smith's offer. That offer was made early in the season, and Mr. Smith also made an offer after the contract had been entered into. I know that the defence of the government is that the contract having been signed before the last offer of Mr. Smith was made, it was impossible to accede either to his terms or to consent to the proposition which he made. We know, however, that in the past that was not the doctrine laid down by the gentlemen when they were in opposition, particularly when the contract for the Canadian Pacific Railway was before parliament. Their contention then was that a second offer; even though the contract had been signed by the other parties, should have been accepted. I have an extract from a speech delivered in the House of Commons by the hon. Premier of the present day, in which he laid down this doctrine: that if an offer had been made to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway at a lower price than that which the government were paying to the parties with whom they had been negotiating and with whom they had entered into a contract, the opposition deserved greater credit at the hands of the people then they otherwise would be entitled to if they could compel the government to accept it. Here is what the Hon. Mr. Laurier said:

It is stated that the offer is not seriously made, that it is a political dodge got up by the Opposition. Mr. Speaker, if the Opposition have organized this scheme they will have still another claim to the gratitude of the country, for whatever may have been the motives that induced these capitalists to make the Government this new offer, these motives are of little consequence, provided that we obtain the result, and the result is that the new company now offers more advantageous terms than those we have now before us.

How does this comport with the doctrine now preached by these gentlemen? But, said my hon. friend who spoke last night, when referring to the fact that a second tender to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway was rejected by the government of that day; and then, if I did not misunderstand him, he made the statement that the present government was in precisely the same position—that the question of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway had not been made an issue at the election which preceded the entering into contract. My hon. friend was just as much at fault upon that point as he was in his reference to the alleged partisanship of the Senators of Canada. It is well known that the question of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway led to the resignation of Sir John Macdonald on the 5th November, 1873. It is well known that that was one of the main issues at the election of 1874, when Mr. Mackenzie went to the people. It is also well known that, during that period, the government of Mr. Mackenzie advertised all over the world asking for tenders for the construction of that road, and that they could find no one with whom they could enter into a contract, or who would take the responsibility of the construction of that road, it being of such magnitude as to frighten almost every capitalist in the world. It is also well known that Mr. Mackenzie and his government proposed to utilize the water stretches, and was constructing certain portions of railway between water stretches to furnish railway communication with Manitoba and the North-west Territories. It is also known that in the election of 1878, the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was a distinct and positive issue before the electors, and that the government of Sir John Macdonald in 1878 advertised, not only in this country but also in England and other parts of the world, for tenders to construct the road. It is also known that parliament authorized the government of the day to enter into a contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, subject to the approval of parliament. It is further known that it was only after a failure to obtain any tenders from contractors that they entered into a contract in London with George Stephen (now Lord Mount Stephen) and his associates, so that it is absurd to attempt to establish any analogy between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the railway from Telegraph Harbour to the mouth of Teslin Lake. Every one will see that the two cases are neither directly nor indirectly analagous. In the one case attempts had been made for years all over the world, without success, to obtain contractors to enter upon the construction of a work of greater magnitude and failed; and it was only with the utmost exertion—I might almost say that it was with superhuman exertions that Sir John Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper and the late Hon. John Henry Pope, when in London induced these parties to take the contract. Contrast that with this case which we have before us. The government, in a hurried way, entered into a secret arrangement with two contractors with whom we have every reason to believe they had been in communication from the time Mr. Sifton landed in Victoria after his visit to a portion of Alaska. There is every reason to believe that then and there these arrangements were made, not perhaps to the fullest extent, but to the extent that they could have the construction of the road. The first intimation that anybody in Canada had of the fact that a contract had been entered into was given in the Toronto Globe in a three or four column article after the visit of the principal editor of the paper to Ottawa, where I have no doubt he had been summoned in order to receive the information which he imparted afterwards to his readers. The transaction at first met the approval of a number of gentlemen who read it, from the fact that the whole facts were not given to the public. I do not say that the editor who wrote that article designedly kept from the public the information which afterwards came to light. It is just possible that he published all the information given to him and that that information was of such a character as led many to give their adhesion to the agreement. Now there is the difference between the two cases, and it is a question for the Senate and the country to decide whether any government, under the circumstances, were justified in taking the course that the present government have pursued. I now come to the contract itself—and I am not going to waste the time of this House by quoting from its provisions at any length. I should like to ask the minister who leads this House how it is that the government, which has been denouncing for many years monopolies in railways, should insist upon creating a monopoly? One would have supposed that the contractors would ask for, and insist upon having, a monopoly of trade, and a promise and declaration that no other road should be built. Now am I to understand that that is the fact in connection with this contract? Did Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann insist upon having a provision of that kind in the contract, or did the government, on the other hand, insist upon having a clause placed in the contract pledging themselves that they would not permit competition? Upon whom rests the responsibility? Is it the government or is it Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann? My hon. friend is silent on that point.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will answer my hon. friend when I speak. I do not wish to interrupt him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If my hon. friend had practised that virtue this afternoon, probably I should not have taken up so much time. This is a fair question to ask of a minister, whether the terms of the contract were insisted upon by the government or by the contractors. If by the government I know what the defence is; that it was to secure the trade by what is termed an all-Canadian route. Now, my hon. friend knows, and no one better, that trade will find its own level no matter when and where it may be created. It is also well known that the construction of that road will be just as much to the advantage of the traders on the Pacific, whose vessels ply between Seattle, San Francisco, Tacoma and Wrangel, as it will to the vessels that sail from Victoria and Vancouver. Does any one suppose that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann would refuse freight from any portion of the United States? It is absurd to consider the proposition for a moment. The only difference between the one that is Canadian and the other, is simply this: If the people of San Francisco, for I take it that is where the largest proportion of the freight would be obtained, except the food sent into that country, that they having had the trade and having been carrying it by their transport company for the last half century, they will go on competing just as strongly, and even more vigorously than they ever did in the past; and if goods can be purchased in any United States port and taken to Wrangel and shipped via the Stikine River and thence by the railway from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake as cheap, plus the duty, as the Canadian goods, they will go in just the same in the future as they have gone in the past, and no power can prevent it. When we consider that a large proportion of the freight from the United States to that country and from Canada, is mining machinery, all of which is free, except imported machinery which competes with machinery made in Canada—and there is a very large proportion that is not made in this country—then the United States manufacturers of these particular articles which are in use by the miners more than anything else, except food and raiment, will send them in, because they can be taken cheaper by water from the great manufacturing centres on the Pacific coast, than they can be sent across the Rocky Mountains from the east where the great manufacturing industries of Canada exist, with the exception of a couple of large establishments on the coast, one in Vancouver and another in Victoria.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is a clause forbidding discrimination.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I argue apart from that provision of the contract altogether. I was arguing from the general principle of the trend of trade—unless you have prohibitory duties and unless you lay down the principle that foreign goods shall not be taken over a Canadian railway, then it will find its level whether this prohibition clause prevents discrimination or not. Then we have the fact before us to-night of the government forcing upon the contractors a monopoly clause which Mr. Blair says that they themselves did not want, for his language is this:

> But the government felt that they could not reasonably expect a responsible company to take on the Teslin Lake route if they were to be met with competition at the hands of a company who should own the route from Lynn Canal, and the clause was for this reason chiefly inserted in the contract.

And then he says again:

> That they insisted upon its being placed in the contract, and that the contractors did not ask for it.

Now this same hon. gentleman only to-day, as you will see in the reports of the newspapers to-night, supported with all the vigour of his intellect and power of language a charter to a company upon the grounds of it giving competition to the people in the Kootenay district, that competition being, it is alleged, in taking of ores of the Kootenay mines into the United States to be there crushed and smelted. So that we have a monopoly forced upon one contractor by the same government—for I suppose they are all responsible for the action of one minister—as absolutely necessary for the benefit of Canadian trade, while in the Kootenay district competition is stimulated to carry trade away from the country. Reconcile the two if you can; I confess I am unable to do so. Will not dis advantages arise from this monopoly clause in the Yukon Bill. It is a monopoly clause, so far as the government can possibly make it a monopoly. They will tell you that it is not a monopoly, because parliament chartered two other roads to run from the head of Lynn Canal, at Pyramid Harbour or Skagway, one through the White Pass and another through one of the other passes. If the road were built from a Canadian point directly east of the Rocky Mountains then I could understand a market being created, and an almost inexhaustable one, for those who produce the food of the people. We all know that British Columbia is not only fertile, but that it is as productive as any other part of Canada. We also know that the great majority of its people are engaged in commerce and in mining, and have not in the past produced food enough for their own use. They may be doing so now, but I doubt it, because there is a great influx of people from other parts of the world to the mining districts and they obtain their supply of food to a very large extent from Washington Territory. When I was there a year or two ago, visiting the farm of His Excellency the Governor General, in the Okanagan district, I found that wheat was being brought from Montana at 17 to 20 cents per bushel, paying the freight and duty and competing successfully in the mining districts with British Columbia wheat, splendid though it was, and beginning to be raised in great quantities, in the magnificent Okanagan valley. If they want wheat and corn they will get it in the states of Washington and Oregon, and will ship it from seaports direct to the Yukon in competition with the wheat products of Manitoba and the great North-west. The past has shown that railway freights militate against the food products east of the Rockies to the extent of rendering it almost impossible to compete with the products of Washington and Oregon. It proved itself in the time of the great failure of the crops in Australia, when they shipped from Canada over and over again hundreds of thousands of bushels of wheat. It was carried from the east side of the Rockies to Vancouver and placed in the Australian ships, but the Washington and Oregon wheat could compete successfully with it and the result was that, instead of supplying the Australian colonies with Canadian wheat altogether, a large portion of it came from the United States. It is so with meats. The last time I examined the trade and navigation returns, I found that there was over half a million pounds of mutton imported from Washington for home consumption in the province of British Columbia. Whether that importation goes on to the same extent as it did at that time, I am not prepared to say, but I know I took the trouble to point out to the owners of sheep ranches in the North-west Territories that they should make immediate arrangements with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to enable them to compete with the Washington mutton. It was a better quality of meat, but they could not compete in prices. The quality was so superior that in Vancouver and Victoria they could find a market, but not in the mining camps. I point that out to show that no matter what road you build, or what competition you obstruct, or what kind of a monopoly you give, a large proportion of the trade will continue to flow from the Pacific coast cities as it has done in the past. The only way to prevent it successfully would be to build a road either from Edmonton or Prince Albert; or, if you will, from Ashcroft, which would open up all that mining district. It is almost useless to waste time in discussing the question. There is no man in the Senate who understands the trend of trade and the effect of tariffs, or the opening up of competition, better than my hon. friend opposite, and I question very much whether we shall hear the same arguments from him as were advanced in the House of Commons from the government side upon this question I know that telegrams have been sent from all over the country urging the construction of this road. One was read last night from the Victoria Board of Trade—that is, it purported to come from the Victoria Board of Trade. I do not say of my own knowledge that it did not, but I am informed that no meeting of the Board of Trade took place, and that it was simply the emanation of a few gentlemen who got together. I do not say that what I am stating is strictly true, but I am giving the information as I got it. If you will notice, even in this Victoria telegram this route is not endorsed. The telegram is as follows :

> The British Columbia Board of Trade begs to draw your attention to the fact that unless the Lake Teslin road is built this year untold loss will be entailed upon the merchants and shippers of this province, and that if the northern trade is not directed immediately into purely Canadian channels, a permanent and irretrievable loss would be sustained by the Dominion, and we must enter our earnest and emphatic protest against any legislation that may retard the works now going on.

It has been sufficiently established before the House that this bill is not a proposition to open up a purely Canadian route. It is only just to the House that I should read a telegram which I received to day from Vancouver. It is signed by W. Godfrey, president of the Vancouver Board of Trade, and is as follows :—

> Whereas the opening of communication with the Yukon district is of vital importance in the mercantile and manufacturing interests of the country; and whereas such communication is, in the opinion of this Council, to be obtained by the construction of the railway between Teslin Lake and some Canadian port, therefore, be it resolved, that the Vancouver Board of Trade hereby prays the parliament of Canada to legislate for the immediate construction of a railway in Canadian territory between Teslin Lake and the port which may be found to be most suitable on the coast of British Columbia, and to provide that the portion of the line between Teslin Lake and Glenora shall be completed by September 1st of this year.

Both these telegrams—and this last one in particular—urge the construction of a road to a Canadian port, and if this road from Glenora to Teslin Lake is to be constructed, that it should terminate at some Canadian port in British Columbia. I scarcely think there is a gentleman in this House who objects to a proposition of that kind. I wish to have it distinctly understood that, so far as I am concerned—and I believe so far as those on whose behalf I speak are concerned—we are prepared to assist the government in any scheme which will accomplish the object that telegram has in view. We have no desire whatever to prevent the construction of a road, upon fair and equitable terms, which will open up that country and give, beyond peradventure, all the advantages that can be derived by starting from a Canadian port. That, I believe, is the position we take in this House, and the objection we have to the present scheme is that you build 150 miles of a tramway for which you give 3,750,000 acres of land, with all the mines and minerals and wood that there is upon it—something unusual in the legislation of this or any other country in the past, and that, too, for a tram which does not furnish an all-Canadian route. Now, the British Columbia government seem to have a better idea of what they should do in legislating upon a question of this kind. When they granted a charter to the railway from Stikine River to Dease Lake, they gave a lease to the company for 35 years. The first clause opens the surface to pre-emption and sale in the terms of the Land Act of 1896, and compels the company to pay $5 per acre for town sites, one-fourth to go to the government. So that if they establish a town site in any part of the land which has been given to this company they compel the company to pay $5 per acre for the land, and then they are to give one-quarter of the sale of all the lots to the government, but that is not in addition, because I think the $5 is remitted back to them. Then the company cannot mine until they have located and recorded their claims according to the mining laws, the claims to be subject to the same laws and charges—that is, a royalty one-half per cent, $50 a year rent, $100 for each transfer, no matter how many there may be, and then they have to pay, in addition to that, a royalty on the timber. In this case there was only 10,240 acres per mile given, in all 700,000 acres. Then there is this important clause "Free miners may locate on lands demised to the company."

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And free miners are entitled to the Crown reversion. Now compare these terms with the terms given in the concession of this large grant of land in the gold area of the Klondike.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is common sense in the one case and nonsense in the other.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is common sense in the one case and giving away the country in the other.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Is that the Cassiar Central contract?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes; the Cassiar contract, I think—Stikine River to Dease Lake.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The hon. gentleman might go on and explain on what conditions the free miners were permitted to take up claims.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know the conditions. My hon. friend, coming from British Columbia, no doubt will know them. In the one case there are severe restrictions protecting the government and giving them a revenue under all circumstances, and a tenure of the revenue so long as it is worked. Perhaps my hon. friend, who has just interrupted me, will have a better idea of the views which are taken of this concession when I read him a short article which appears in a journal called the Victoria Times, published, I believe, in Victoria, whose proprietor and editor is a Mr. Templeman.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I cannot say whether he is the hon. gentleman who sits opposite me and interrupted me, but it is the same name.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is very much like him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—On the 23rd April, 1897, the Times, commenting upon the concession of this grant to this company, says:

> The Turner government must be congratulated on its ability to strike out on a new line once in a while at least. After trying all sorts of games with the public domain they have devised an entirely new sort of scheme in connection with the proposal to grant aid to the Cassiar Central Railway. The company to which that railway franchise has been given is to be handed over the privilege of gobbling up not only lands in the electoral district of Cassiar but all the minerals "precious or base, therein and thereunder." For each mile of railway built 10,240 acres of land in a block is to go under the control of a company, and any free miner who finds a promising location within that area will be forced to hand over a half interest to the company. Prospective townsites are to go to the company in fee simple on payment to the government of five dollars per acre.

I suppose that is the answer which I could give to the hon. gentleman. The article continues :

And provisions are made for the payment to the government of certain royalties and taxes on mining claims. There is fortunately some ground for hope that the House, which has shown some spirit of independence within the last few days will not agree to this outrageous bill.

Then the Victoria Times of April 29th, 1897, has an article headed "The Cassiar Outrage," in which the following appears :

How they (the Turner government) can count on getting any support for so outrageous a scheme is hard to conceive. Any member of the House has but to ask himself how he would like to see a similar piece of legislation applied to his own district in order to see the iniquity of the Cassiar proposal.

Here is a bill with restrictions placed upon the miner called by those who ought to know and who represent—I believe the paper represents the Liberal element of Victoria and claims—I was going to say arrogates, to itself, but I will not say that—the leadership of the party in British Columbia, denouncing this as an outrageous bill although the government protects itself to the extent to which I have called the attention of the Senate ; at the same time, we find the Liberal party, and a portion of them also in the province of British Columbia, supporting this bill which I suppose is not outrageous in its character, because it only gives away all the land in fee simple, coal, wood and everything that is necessary for the carrying on successfully of mining operations in the country. However, we shall be better able to judge how far this scheme meets the views of the hon. gentleman from British Columbia when we hear him speak. I propose to close my remarks by referring to this Stikine River route. I have received from nearly all parts of the country letters commenting upon it. I will take the liberty of reading such portions of them as bear upon the contract and the Teslin Lake route. The first is a letter dated Victoria, B.C., February 7.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Who is the writer ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He was one of the most prominent men, occupying the highest position that a man could occupy, in Victoria. I do not think I would be justified in giving the name here, but I have no objection to give the name to the hon. gentleman, and to the hon. Minister of Justice so as to justify the statement I make as to the letter and the character of its author. This letter was written to me and marked private. I wrote to the gentleman immediately after its receipt, telling him that it contained such important information upon a grave question which was coming before the parliament of Canada, that I should take the liberty of reading his arguments to the Senate when I spoke, but that I would not give his name. He acknowledged receipt of that letter, and made no objection to my proposition. I make this explanation in justice to the gentleman who wrote that letter and also as a reason why I think it advisable not to give his name publicly. The letter is dated February 7th, Victoria, B.C., and is as follows :—

My Dear Sir Mackenzie,—Trusting to our friendly relations of the past, I venture to write you regarding the subject upon which both sides of the House, or the leaders at least seem to be unanimous, it is nevertheless one of the most awful public crimes ever proposed to be carried out by the government of any country, and will hold that of Canada up to the scorn of the entire world, if permitted to go into effect—I allude to the proposed Yukon concession for building the railroad from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake, a distance now pretty well admitted to be less than 120 miles. In its aid the newspapers seem to have with singular unanimity resolved upon a "conspiracy of silence," and it looks as if this awful deal were going through the House without a kick. I do not know what your views of the matter are, but if favourable, I still venture to say a friendly word of remonstrance against an action you will regret to the day of your death. In the first place the railroad is not needed for this year : and moreover by the exercise of whatever expedition cannot be in running order in time to be of any use this year ; that is to say that the country will be all frozen up before the railroad can be running. If the road then is not to be of any service this year, why not give until next year to complete it—by adopting which course the road can be built like other roads, at a moderate cost, say $10,000 per mile, which the government had better themselves spend than exploit the whole region as they are proposing to do. All that is wanted this year to move all the traffic that will go over that route is a wagon road, and the keeping traffic open for mules and foot passengers until the wagon road can be constructed. My brother arrived from that country only yesterday. He has been twice over the road from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake during the last few months, and he tells me there is already an excellent winter road between the two places, over which several hundreds of men have already passed, and over which the machinery for the steamboat and saw-mill, and supplies connected therewith are now in transit to Teslin Lake. This is the Yorke expedition which went up the Stikine River last summer, and will have their steamboat and sawmill in running order by the end of May. My brother tells me that a force of one hundred men can keep that roadway open after the snow is off the ground, so that all freight and passengers can go over it for the summer. In the first part of the journey there is no difficulty, but for fifty miles or so on the Teslin Lake end the land is swampy and boggy and considerable corduroying must be done, but the force of one hundred men can accomplish all this and kee the crowd moving. In the meantime the wagon road can be under construction. Now so far as a railroad is concerned it will be more of an obstruction during its building than an aid. We all know this fact from practical experience.

Now as to the grant to be given this company for building this unnecessary road, it seems to me to mean practically giving them the remainder of the mines in the country. They are to take 3,750,000 acres, and mineral rights pertaining thereto in blocks I presume of 25,000 acres and to pick it wherever they like. The right accorded the free miner and prospecting and holding claims in the meantime amounts to nothing in aid of the public. It merely makes the freeminer and prospector the jackal for the company. The jackal discovers the location, and perhaps secures one claim for himself: the company immediately swoop down, and say "we'll take the balance." One of the Victoria papers this morning (and a Conservative organ too, save the mark) said that the three or four million acres was insignificant because there were over 180,000,000 more territory yet, belonging to the government. What a misleading though specious argument—although 180,000,000 acres of land how much of this vast territory will eventually have proved gold producing. Not 2,000,000 acres of it I venture to say. "Gold is where you find it" and the privilege the company is to have is to take the gold, within the 2,000,000 acres, scattered all over the country "as the free-miner finds it." In other words as I said before the free-miner is to be the jackal to find the lion his prey.

These considerations show that what is proposed, is the giving the whole country away. Like Esau selling his birthright for a mess of pottage, and a mess that we don't require.

What is carefully kept from the eyes of the people is that 98 per cent of the area of this country is and always will be a mere waste, a wilderness, and that in the remaining 2 per cent only, will the riches be found, after unheard of fatigue and toil by the prospector, and it is this 2 per cent, the right to select it, after the prospector has discovered it, that the government is giving away to this railroad. In other words giving away the entire country.

If this grant really becomes law the government have no idea of the contract they will have on hand to maintain it. A few mounted policemen will not do it. They will have an insurrection in the country they never dreamt of. The Riel rebellion will not be a circumstance to it, and this will not be a rebellion of Indian braves and Half-breeds but of an entire population suffering under, what they consider, the defrauding of the reward of their toil. Akin to this subject is the proposal of the government to reserve alternate claims. I do not suppose this holds as against the railway grant, but the proposal anyway is the most ridiculous ever proposed in a mining country. Such a thing was never dreamt of in Australia, California, Mexico, Africa or anywhere else in the globe. It remained for Canada to formulate such a scheme.

I have not time to write you more to-night, but will write you again to-morrow.

Your faithful friend,

P.S.—There is no limit as to the length of this road. But the contractors are to get 25,000 acres per mile, and to build the railway without filing plans. The real length is perhaps 130 miles, but as they are unlimited, they can make it 175 miles or 200 miles, and so, if they chose, get so much more subsidy.

It was stated in the House that the Rothschild's representative dropped the scheme, and would have nothing to do with it without a cash subsidy. This representative was (presumably Maitland Kersey) but was he ever informed, or did the government ever hint to him that they were prepared to make anything like the concession they are giving? It would be interesting to know just what transpired with Kersey, and what made him drop.

The only way of doing this work so quickly is by taking the men off Crow's Nest Pass road. It would seem therefore as if the stipulation of the 1st of September was made, so that only those who had the Crow's Nest Pass in hand could offer for it.

One other thing is regarding the White pass route—44 miles of railway from the head of Lynn Canal will bring to navigable water and there following the the Marsh trail to the Hootalinqua is about 30 milles over which a tramway is being built. This is far shorter than the Stickine route, and is more of an all-British route than the Stickine route, for the head of Lynn Canal although claimed by the United States is disputed territory and probably belongs to Canada.

P. S.—I have mailed you this evening a Seattle newspaper which has an interesting article on this subject (i.e. the proposed Teslin railroad) on the first nd second pages.

Then, on the 10th February, he wrote as follows:—

My Dear Sir Mackenzie,—I see that Mr. Blair, in introducing the Yukon Railway bill, said that it was to be constructed without a dollar of expense to the people of Canada.

Surely this is a singular argument—a distinction between money and money's worth. If the government really wanted to find out how much this concession is worth in money let them take and offer it on the London market, and they can get $50,000,000 for it. The pick of the entire Klondike, the present wonder of the world. There was another syndicate seeking the same charter that of Maitland Kersey, and they offered the local government here to build the road in the same time as the present contractors here for a subsidy of $2,250 a mile and a land grant of 10,000 acres per mile—not one acre of which would have been in the Yukon or the North-west Territories but all in British Columbia, in addition to this he asked the Canadian government $6,000 per mile and yet Maitland Kersey would have been content to go to London with this franchise, and assures me that he could have sold it in England for a very large sum, in fact, had the money subscribed on that basis, and had arranged his syndicate of the very best men in England to take it up. How much then is the other concession of 2½ times the land and power to pick it anywhere, and at any time, worth? The plea of urgency is a mere myth. As I explained in my last letter so far as the summer and spring traffic into the Klondike is concerned—the railway will retard instead of facilitating it—for this season. But then it is said the main object of the railway this year is to get next seasons supplies, and the winter supplies in, this year, over an all-British route. In fact, it means that the entire provisioning of the immense army of men going into Klondike will come from Canada, and over this route. But this argument proves too much for if it be the case that the road is going to take all the traffic, it will pay for itself without any subsidy at all.

The parties advancing this argument, however, know very well, that no such thing will happen as that all the trade, or any considerable portion of it will go over that road this year at all events, and if it is going to be not of much service this year, why not give a few more months for its construction and let it be done cheaply, and reasonably, which considering the class of railroad, could be done if reasonable time be given, for about $10,000 a mile, or $1,300,000. The distance from Telegraph to Teslin is not over 130 miles. My brother who has just come down from there and who has been over the trail twice, within the last few months, walked over it, assured me it is not over 130 miles, and he believes not over 120 miles. Those in the east who say otherwise, surveyors although they may be, are either incompetent, or have some sinister motive in representing it as more. Now what I want to demonstrate to you is that this getting of the whole winter and next season's supply over the proposed Telegraph and Teslin Lake Railway is nonsense, sheer nonsense to those who know the facts. The proposed railway covers only 130 miles of a travel of some 600 or 700 miles all of which is frozen solid, after, at very latest the 31st October. In fact it is safe to say no steamer can get down the Hootalinqua after the 15th October, if then. Now, the most sanguine expectations for this railway are that it is to be completed so as to carry freight by the 1st September. How much time then does this leave to carry the thousands of tons of freight over the railway, to tranship them at Teslin, and to take them down the river? Less than six weeks or at most two months. How many steamers will they have at Teslin Lake? How many can they get there, seeing that they have all got to be built on the lake, and the machinery taken over the road somehow between Telegraph and Teslin? It's no use waiting until 1st September to ship this heavy machinery over, for they want the steamboats all in running order by then. The machinery then has to be shipped over the trail on mules' backs. A mule at best will carry 300 lbs. The machinery for a steamer weighs—what? 40 tons. A mule going loaded with 300 lbs. would not make 10 miles a day, or more than that, or the trip in 13 days, and 8 days to come back, 21 days the round trip. The machinery shipped up the Stikine River by the first boat will not reach Telegraph Creek before 25th May. Less than 15 weeks before they've got to freight it all over the portage, and build the boats into the bargain. Where would 1,000 mules be carting this enormous outfit, besides provisions, grub and what else? The thing is utterly out of the question. But then, perhaps, the boats will come round by the Yukon. Well, seeing that no boats got through last year except one or two, there is no certainty that any will get through this year; and besides the boats will have all the freight they can handle there, without going up to Teslin Lake. You may be certain that, railroad or no railroad, there will be little or no freight taken into Dawson City by way of Telegraph Creek and Teslin Lake this year. The railroad, therefore, is useless for freight carrying purposes this year. I have shown that it is but a stumbling-block to passengers and their outfits. The conclusion then is that this cry for urgency for the building the road is a mere bugbear and an excuse of desperate men to get through an infamous deal. Of course you must have been struck with the apathy with which most of the leading newspapers deal with this subject. Some of them warmly commend it. Well, so far as British Columbia is concerned, that is easily explained. The place is small, and the best patrons of papers are those who hope to be benefited by the patronage of the contractors.

I was puzzled by Sir Charles Tupper's advocacy of the scheme, for I knew him to be above any personal considerations, yet sometimes a suspicion did cross my mind that his connection with the Klondike Trading Company might have biassed his judgment, but even that suspicion is removed by the opposition he is now giving the project. The editor of the Colonist is a director in the same company. I inclose you his leading article of this morning. The Yorke Company that he speaks of there went into the country last August, and took up their machinery and outfit with them for building a steamboat and a saw-mill. They have only arrived with their stuff at Teslin now, and they have been no sluggards. They expect to have their steamboat built by 1st June, not before, and their saw-mill in running order a month or two before then. How will these people fare who are starting up only now? Some of them hope to get up the river on the ice, but hauling scores of tons up on the ice is a problematical question. However, supposing they succeed. How long is it going to take them to get to Teslin Lake? And how long afrerwards to cruise their timber (which is very scarce there), convert it into lumber, season it, and then build their boats? Will they be much ahead of those who go up the Stikine after navigation opens? I think not.

So much, then, for the urgency of this road for this year, which is a lie, a delusion and a fraud.

As you will see by the Colonist article which I inclose, so far as a winter road is concerned, they already have it in the road which the Yorke party have made for the transportation of thir own stuff. The portion of the contract therefore with Mackenzie & Mann calling for a winter road is unnecessary. The present one may, of course, be improved or shortened, but that is not much of a job.

What is wanted, and wanted for this season, is a good wagon road. If undertaken speedily it can be completed early in the summer, in plenty of time to send lots of freight over it this year. Th country is the easiest in the world for making a road. A wagon road to do it quickly would cost $250,000. Lots of reliable companies would contract to do it for that, and a wagon road for this year would be of far more service than a railroad, and would secure the trade. A wagon road could be built without cost to the country at all, directly, and that would be by giving a franchise to collect tolls over it for a limited time.

I see that Mr. Mills stated that there were state reasons which could not be disclosed for building this railroad in the manner proposed. I have no doubt that he has been led to think so, by some one, but it looks too much like a confidence trick, to go down with any sensible man. One can hardly understand why, if any such reasons exist they should not be disclosed, and why if they do exist, the government should not build the road themselves, rather than give the country away to do so. If state reasons do exist, they are reasons pointing to our losing control of this country, but the control of the country is valuable only as a field for reward, the industrious and enterprising men of our country, and it will be of little use keeping control of the country, whilst its wealth is alienated to capitalists who can sell it to the United States or any one else.

Yours very truly,

Another gentleman in business in Victoria, writing on Feb. 22nd, says :—

DEAR SIR MACKENZIE,—We are watching here with much interest the proceedings in parliament in respect to the Mackenzie & Mann contract. It was unfortunate that so many Conservative and independent newspapers should, at the first mention of the scheme, have endorsed it so unreservedly. Since then I have noticed they have withdrawn from that position and in some cases have even condemned the agreement.

When the first items about the contract were telegraphed out here, I at once realized the character of the monopoly in traffic and of the immense value of the land grant. Since then the details which have been received confirm the view I took and I cannot see how any one, desirous of protecting the interests of the country, can hesitate to denounce the proposed contract.

The traffic receipts of the railway will, under the most unfavourable conditions, be so large that it would not be a bad speculation for private individuals to give a handsome sum for such a concession as the government proposes to give Mackenzie & Mann, without any land grant. Here the people would favour the ownership by the government of this little piece of road, if any public assistance is to be given to it. Better give Mackenzie & Mann a large sum for their construction of the road on behalf of the government if it cannot be done without the supervision of them or men like them, and then let the government lease the road on certain conditions or even operate it themselves. The road is so short, and the conditions for operation so simple and so insignificant, that the government ownership and operation of the line would present none of the drawbacks, complications or difficulties found in the Intercolonial and other large railways.

But the general view is that if the government does not decide to build the line, that there should be an exclusive concession for its construction given to any one company, but that it should be left to private enterprise which we feel will not be long in seizing an opportunity which presents extraordinary chances for profitable results.

The estimates made by Mr. Jennings of the probable results of the operation of the road, although extraordinarily favourable as compared with the results of other roads, are regarded here as absurdly low. He estimates the fare as only 5 cents a mile, a rate which is exceeded by some local railways under ordinary conditions. Ten, 15 or even 20 cents a mile (and proportionately high rates of freight) would be accepted without demur. Jennings also only estimates 12,000 passengers for the yearly traffic, both northward and southward. As a matter of fact, that number has already gone northward since the fame of the gold fields went abroad, and yet the rush has not yet fairly begun. Fifty thousand people is certainly not an extravagant estimate, and with higher rates and larger freight tonnage than Jennings has named, you will see what a bonanza the ownership of such a road will be to those who have it.

Believe me, faithfully yours,

Another gentleman writes from Halifax, on February 17th, as follows :—

DEAR SIR MACKENZIE,—Forgive a short note to say that in this part of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, a feeling of alarm is beginning to arise, founded on the growing belief that the less worthy half of the present administration is the governing half, that the cabinet is throwing itself into the arms of the railway corporation, and to the Senate we look for the country's safety. More power to your elbow.

I am, faithfully yours,

The following from Charlottetown, dated 17th February, gives some information as to the character of the contract :

Sir Mackenzie Bowell,
Ottawa.

DEAR SIR,—I take the liberty of writing you a few lines to show the feeling on the Yukon Railway deal and the hopes entertained that the Senate will reject the whole thing or if not that it will make such alterations as to preserve to the Dominion the valuable gold fields so liberally given away by the government. I have paid considerable attention to the discussion in the Houses and in the press, and fail to conceive what possible phase of insanity possesses the government unless in the supposition that whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad.

My second eldest son has spent eighteeen years in the civil engineering service of India (at present home on furlough), his experience is large in government contracts embracing grants of lands, he has gone carefully over the contract as laid before the House of Commons and he characterizes the whole thing as scandalous and iniquitous, the quantity of lands granted in the first place and their opportunity of selection in the second, and particularly the last section of the contract. You will please excuse my bothering you, hoping the thing will be thrown out by the Senate.

Yours very sincerely,

* * * *

Here is a gentleman engaged in engineering who looks on the contract as indefensible. I read these letters to show the feeling of the people who have considered this question, from the Pacific to the Atlantic. I shall now read a letter from a leading Liberal at Rossland. He does not mark it private, and I give it for the benefit of the government. It is dated Rossland, 23rd March, and is as follows :—

SIR MACKENZIE BOWELL,
Senate Chamber,
Ottawa, Can.

DEAR SIR MACKENZIE,—It is now being said that the senators will pass the Stikine River, Teslin Lake Railway deal. As a lifelong Liberal I hope the rumour is incorrect. If there was ever a time when the Senate should assert itself as a deterrent of hasty, improvident or corrupt legislation surely this is the time. You can rest assured that a large minority of Liberals are openly opposed to this looting of western territory and were Sir Wilfrid to test the country on the action of the Senate in giving this infamous bill its quietus he would find himself defeated.

In rejecting the measure it would put the Senate right with the country to suggest a course of action or reasonable cash aid that would without any unnecessary delay give Canada easy access to these wonderful gold fields.

I think it may be safely said that $1,000,000 will build and equip the kind of road proposed to be built by Mackenzie & Mann. If $11,000,000 of gold were taken out of these 4,000,000 acres, the loss in royalty to Canada between the rate charged prospectors and the rate to be charged these contractors would alone pay for it. There should be no monopoly of route, rates or royalty. I hope you and your followers will rise to the occasion and do your duty to your country and posterity, uninfluenced by any person or corporation and reject this disgraceful bill.

Other Liberals and myself have written Mr. Hewitt Bostock, M.P., urging him to oppose the bill but he has supported it ; the majority of his constituents do not approve of his action.

Yours sincerely,

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Did you not say you would give us the name of the Rossland Liberal ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No ; but in this case I will as the letter is not marked private. It is from Mr. Smith Curtis, barrister and solicitor, notary public, 26½ Columbian Avenue. I do not know the gentleman; perhaps my hon. friend does.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Has the hon. gentleman any objection to giving the author of the letter from Victoria?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When I commenced reading those letters I told the hon. gentleman I had no objection to giving the name to the leader of the House, if he desires to know it, as the best evidence of the bonâ fides of the letter. I have the original here, and my hon. friend no doubt will recognize the handwriting. I can assure my hon. friend that he was one of the most respected men on the Pacific coast. The hon. Minister of Justice and, as I understood the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State—I did not hear the whole of them—and also the hon. gentleman from Halifax, said that most of the land to be given to these contractors does not contain gold, and that it is to be found only to a limited extent in certain areas, and therefore it matters very little how much we give them. All of us who have ever visited mining regions know that quartz mines lie in veins, and that you might have a thousand acres or ten thousand acres of land and find only one auriferous vein, and yet it would pay to work it. Then, again, the placer mines are generally confined to the beds of streams or rivers; consequently they are in limited number. Now it must strike the ordinary mind that if that be true, the greater the quantity of land the contractors have, the greater will be the opportunity of securing those narrow belts in the mountains or in the placer mining sections, and particularly when we know that by the terms of the contract they can commence a base line at any place they like and thereby secure the mines which may be in any locality. Further, they have the right to follow the windings and sinuosities of the streams so that if there be any placer mining down those creeks, they can, by so arranging their base lines, secure the greater quantity if not the whole mining region within the present known area where gold is found. There is another point to which I call the attention of the House; if the Americans put obstacles in the way of our getting into that country, we would have a right to exercise the same power in keeping them out of a portion of their territory where gold has been discovered very lately. It is necessary for them, in order to reach a portion of Alaska, to pass over Canadian territory, but I do not anticipate anything of that kind, because we are relatively in the same position to each other, and if they put the restriction which has been indicated by some hon. gentlemen on the trade of Canada, we can retaliate by placing the same restrictions upon the food and other supplies passing through our territory into Alaska. Now, I have no fear of the dire predictions of rebellion in that country. If anything would lead to that more than another, it would be the restrictions placed on the miners by giving a monopoly to one company of half the gold area of that country. For the reasons which I have given, I certainly believe that the House will reject this measure, and in saying that, I am equally convinced that if any equitable proposition be brought before the parliament of Canada, and more particularly before the Senate, they would be willing to go a long way towards assisting the government in opening up that country, providing they are not going to ask for the surrender of the whole territory to one monopoly.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I do not rise after the leader of the opposition with a view to replying to what he has said, because it would be presumptuous on the part of a new member, speaking for the first time in this House, to attempt a reply to the long and very argumentative and excellent speech that has just fallen from the leader of the opposition. I would not have spoken on this question, and I had not intended doing so until I listened to the speech of the hon. gentleman from Victoria. I feel strengthened in my resolve to-night in consequence of the closing remarks of the leader of the opposition, in which he tried to explain to this House that the feeling on the Pacific coast, especially in the city of Victoria, was not unanimously in favour of this Telegraph Creek-Teslin Lake Railway. I am quite sure that nothing that I could say at this very late stage of the discussion could add anything to what has already been said, but I do not think I would be representing the people of the Pacific province, from which I hail, if I did not place myself on record as against the views expressed at all events by those two hon. gentlemen. Now, I may not apprehend what is the duty of a Senate. Possibly we do not represent to the same extent and in the same manner the views of the public as the members in the Lower House do, but it seems to me that it is the duty of the members of this House to expound and to stand up for the opinions and views of their constituents —if I may use that word in connection with the people that we are supposed to represent —they should represent the views of the sections of the community from which they come. Now that is, in my opinion, exactly what the hon. gentleman from Vancouver Island does not do. I do not propose to go over all the ground that has been traversed. I speak as a representative of the province of British Columbia, and it is as such that I express my regret that the duty of moving the six months hoist should have fallen to an hon. gentleman from that province, especially from the city of Victoria. Public opinion in Victoria and Vancouver, and for that matter throughout the entire province is overwhelmingly in favour of this route. I venture to say that, apart from the gentlemen who, unfortunately, I think, for the city of Victoria, represent that city in this and the other branch of the legislature, and with the exception possibly of the fictitious—that is probably not the right word—anonymous writer of the letter to the leader of the opposition, there are not half a dozen prominent men in Victoria or Vancouver who are opposed to the Teslin Lake-Telegraph Creek Railway. I say that, and I challenge the statement of the hon. gentleman to the contrary. Why, hon. gentlemen, when this Klondike boom struck us, what was the position of affairs in the city of Victoria, say about midsummer last? Ninety per cent of the people going into that country were Americans—ninety per cent of the goods going into that country was from the United States. Our merchants were unprepared for the great influx of people, but they bestirred themselves as quickly as they could and made a tremendous fight to secure the trade of that country. Our merchants got together and appointed committees and advertised Victoria as a trading point and made a great fight to capture some portion of the trade. Desperate efforts were put forth by the merchants of Seattle to secure the trade for themselves. Obstacles were put in the way of parties outfitted in Canada at Dyea and Skagway, a charge of $9 a day was made for each customs official accompanying such parties across the alleged United States strip of territory. Now, at that stage of the game, late last fall, when we thought that the entire trade that should have been Canada's was being captured by the United States, what did the people of Victoria do? The Board of Trade and public meetings importuned this government to close the passes at Dyea and Skagway, remove the customs officers and open up the Stikine route. The members of parliament in the Lower House and Sir Hibbert Tupper, telegraphed to Ottawa, demanding that the passes be closed. Telegram after telegram was sent to Ottawa. Every person—the Lieutenant Governor, the Conservative local Premier and every Conservative member of the Board of Trade joined in insisting that the public interest demanded that the Stikine route be adopted as the Canadian route to the Canadian gold fields. I joined with the rest in pressing the advantages of that route upon the attention of the government. There is no person in Canada, outside the government themselves, and there is no constituency in Canada, more responsible for having brought their influence to bear on the government to obtain the Stikine route than the city of Victoria; and it is humiliating to think that the representatives of that city should vote against this measure, one of them going so far as to move the six months hoist in order to attempt to defeat a measure framed in the very best interests of his province.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What was the public opinion of Victoria about the grant of 4,000,000 acres of mining land to this company?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I will try to come to what public opinion is in Victoria, because I have not left that subject. I was saying that the government, influenced by the people of Victoria, and no doubt guided by knowledge derived from other channels, proposed this railway to Teslin Lake. The proposition was well received in British Columbia, and when it became apparent that the policy of obstruction that ruled at Skagway might be transferred to Wrangel, and when this section 13 was passed in the United States Senate, the people of Victoria called a public meeting to further consider the situation. And what did they say at that meeting? Did they counsel, as the Conservative members of the House of Commons and the Conservative member in this House counsel, the withdrawal of this agreement? Not at all. In my opinion the Conservatives of the city of Victoria were more honourable men, if that is not putting it too strong—and I do not want to say anything wrong—but I was going to say that they are more honourable men, more consistent anyway, than the men they sent down to Ottawa to represent them. At this meeting the mayor presided—and I wish to make that point. My hon. friend asked me what was the public opinion in Victoria as to the land grant. At the public meeting, convened for the purpose of discussing this very question, there were present Messrs. T. Earle, M.P., H. D. Helmcken, M.P.P., the Hon. Robert Beaven, Aldermen Candless, G. A. Kirk, D. R. Ker, R. Seabrook, F. Elworthy and Simon Leiser—all prominent Conservatives and leading citizens. These gentlemen were all present and supported this resolution:

Whereas the discovery of gold in the Canadian Yukon has resulted in an unexpected rush of miners to that country, and will in all probability continue for years to come; and whereas the trade attendant on this influx of population amounts to many million dollars per annum; and whereas it is at present impracticable to reach the gold-bearing region without passing through Alaskan territory; and whereas the United States government's customs and coasting regulations interfere with and harass the trade of our Canadian merchants, which trade reasonably belongs to the Dominion of Canada; and whereas a fair share of the northern trade can be secured to Canada by the opening up of an all-Canadian route, such as a railway from some port in British Columbia to connect with the Stikine-Teslin Railway; and whereas the building of such a line would open up for settlement the northern portion of British Columbia, which contains agricultural, grazing and rich mineral lands sufficient to sustain a very large population, and which would be particularly suitable for the thousands of miners returning from the country further north; and whereas northern trade will be very valuable for all time and will be removed beyond the sphere of foreign competition by the building of the aforesaid railway:

Therefore be it resolved that the Dominion and provincial governments be urged to grant such assistance as may be necessary to secure the construction of a railroad from a British Columbia port to the Stikine River simultaneously with that between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake. Resolved further that a copy of this resolution be telegraphed to the hon. Minister of Railways at Ottawa, and copies mailed to all ministers and to the representatives of British Columbia and a copy be forwarded to the hon. the premier of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is that all?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—That is all.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is not a word there about the land grant to pay for the road.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—They were dealing with the question as a whole. There is nothing about the land grant, because it is a portion of the question they were considering. They knew perfectly well what it is.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is no objection to the road if you did not give four million acres of land for it.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Everybody knows perfectly well there are three million seven hundred and fifty acres of land to be given for the construction of this road.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if the provincial government gave a land grant for a railway to cover the same ground?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Do they not propose to withdraw that land grant, now that the Dominion government is giving Northwest land?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN — Unfortunately, I am not in the confidence of that government. There was a charter granted Mr. Begg for a railway over this same route a year ago. He got a small land grant—I forget how much.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He did not build that road.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Have not Mackenzie & Mann purchased that charter from Mr. Begg?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I do not know.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think I can say they have.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I have heard it said that Mackenzie & Mann control that charter. I might say that at that meeting the Hon. Robert Beavin was present and moved an amendment disapproving of this agreement, asking the government to withdraw it and build a road as a government work. The amendment of the Hon. Robert Beavin received three votes, and this resolution which I have read was carried unanimously by the meeting at which all the prominent citizens of Victoria, with the exception possibly of the anonymous letter writer, were peesent.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is nothing in that.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The facts I have stated go to prove that Victoria, at least, and Vancouver, I believe, are unanimously in favour of the Stikine route—and why should they not be? The Stikine is not a new route, as some hon. gentlemen seem to think. It has been in use ever since the Cassiar days. Boats have been running on the Stikine River every year, I suppose for the last 25 or 30 years, making periodical trips. The steamers running there of recent years have been owned by the Hudson Bay Company, and they would only send their steamers when it was necessary to forward supplies up there. There is no doubt—and the hon. gentleman who moved the six months' hoist knows it perfectly well—that the Stikine River is navigable at least five months in the year, and there is no danger in the navigation of that river. There is no record of any accident to life by steamboat on that river. Certainly, during my residence in Victoria, the Stikine River has been as familiar and as well known to the business men of that city as the upper Ottawa is to the citizens of Ottawa, and the Stikine River is just as valuable in its way to the western coast, to northern British Columbia, relatively speaking at all events, as the Ottawa River is to the people of Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Can steamboats go all the way to Telegraph Creek?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—What is the depth of water?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—It varies, of course, but at low water possibly from three to four feet.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Has the hon. gentleman ever seen the Stikine River?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Has the hon. gentleman from Victoria ever seen the Stikine River?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There has been no navigation on it for 20 years until now.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—My hon. friend may have seen the Stikine River, but I do not think he has seen it in the last 20 years.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—In the Cassiar days it was used.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—A man doing business in Victoria does not require to see the Stikine River to know there is such a river. I know, as a fact, that what I have stated is true, that the river is navigated annually by boats owned by the Hudson Bay Company, and it has been so since the Cassiar days. There have not been steamers regularly plying on that river, because there was no travel. The Cassiar mining boom died out ten or fifteen years ago or more, and there have been very few people in Cassiar the last few years, and there has been no regular means of communication for the simple reason that there has been no traffic. The river is there and it is navigable. There is no question about it. I am really astonished that one of the objections urged against the bill is that the Stikine River is not navigable.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not for long periods.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The St. Lawrence is not navigable for a very long period. I have not thought it necessary to provide myself with data, but I do not know that the St. Lawrence is navigable for a great deal longer period than the Stikine River. It cannot be very many months more, at all events, and when hon. gentlemen say that it is a summer route and only navigable five months in the year, they should remember that none of the rivers in these northern latitudes are navigable for a much longer period than five or six months in the year.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—How is the railroad going to run then?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It will be frozen up!

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The hon. gentleman asked me how the railroad is going to run. I do not think any person has pretended to say that the railway will be of much use in the winter season until it is built down to the coast, which is a part of the policy of the government, and then I am bound to say that if it is built to the coast for the purpose of getting to the Klondike and Dawson City, it cannot be very much used in winter. We all know 600 miles of transportation on the ice on the Yukon River is simply impracticable, but it will be of great use for the upper Yukon. In discussing this question of what is required for the purpose of getting people and goods to Dawson City, an alternative scheme has been seriously proposed, not by the leader of the opposition but by a number of speakers who have preceded him, to build from Pyramid Harbour over the Dalton trail down to Fort Selkirk, and we have been told it is a better commercial route. It would be a commercial route for Dawson City, assuming always that Dyea or Skagway are in Canadian territory and that the city to be built up there would be a Canadian city. There is no question at all that this House and country would approve of the adoption of that route, but I am free to confess that with the terminus on the ocean being in United States territory I would take the present route with the land subsidy in preference to the Dalton trail route without any subsidy at all. If that Yukon country is of any great value, there must be large mining districts far south of Dawson City on the upper waters of the Yukon, and in discussing this railway scheme and its benefit to the country and to that Yukon district, we must consider the enormous benefit it will be to the Upper Yukon, I do not know that I need say anything about other routes. Hon. gentlemen have said that this is not an all-Canadian route. Well there is no all-Canadian route, if this is not one, excepting from Edmonton or Ashcroft. But is there any hon. gentleman in this House who seriously proposes to build a road from Edmonton or from Ashcroft to Dawson City. Why if the government of the day proposed such a wild scheme as that they would not have received the support of one hon. gentleman opposite, and they would not certainly have secured the support of the country. Yet, for a purpose, the leader of the opposition in the Commons, and the leader of the opposition in this House, make all the capital they can out of it, and point to the Edmonton and Ashcroft routes, but they do not seriously mean what they say. There is no question at all—and I think we are all agreed on that point—that for the purpose of developing the great Peace River country some means of communication should be opened up from Edmonton northward, and the same with the Ashcroft and the Cariboo country. There are about 400 miles of excellent roadway in the Cariboo and Ashcroft district. But hon. gentlemen do not seriously contemplate anything of that kind, and I honestly think they do not seriously contemplate the building of a railway from the head of Lynn Canal down to the Yukon. I do not think, if hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, that they would put forward any project or scheme which meant the building up of a city in United States territory living entirely upon the resources of the Canadian Yukon.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Does the hon. gentleman propose giving a charter to that route? There is a bill before the House to grant a charter to that route from Pyramid Harbour. Would the hon. gentleman oppose it?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Most unquestionably I would.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You would not let anybody build there?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I would not. I was pointing out the enormous benefit of this trade to the city of Victoria. I would just like to mention one or two things. The imports into the city of Victoria during January and February of 1897 were $280,-324. In the same months of 1898 they were $560,561, an increase of 100 per cent. The same large increase is shown in the city of Vancouver. That includes all goods imported into the country. For the purpose of arriving at what might be brought in from eastern Canada over the Canadian Pacific Railway, I wrote Mr. Shaughnessy and received the following telegram:

Tonnage from points in the east to Vancouver during the period February 1st to March 15th, 1898, shows an increase of 140 per cent over the same period in 1897.

Here we have an increase of importations into those two cities in the one case of 100 per cent, and of Canadian goods over the Canadian Pacific Railway 140 per cent. I will assume the importations by other means, the Great Northern and Northern Pacific, would possibly show quite as large an increase. There is no doubt that the cities of British Columbia are deriving an enormous benefit from this increased trade. As the hon. gentleman from Calgary said, on the coast all the iron works and ship yards are busy constructing ships. There has not been—probably the hon. gentleman from Victoria would bear me out in this—such a great business activity on the Pacific coast since the days of the Cariboo boom, and that is before my recollection. It is clearly the duty of representatives from that province, if they can do so conscientiously, to support this bill. Just a word as to the argument of some hon. gentlemen in respect to the monopoly created under the contract. It has been said by the hon. leader of the opposition, and by, I think, the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) and the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) that because the government would not aid any other railway for five years, that it is practically a monopoly of the carrying trade for that district. I disagree with that entirely. I do not think there is any monopoly, and as far as that clause in the contract is concerned, it might just as well be eliminated altogether. It has been stated, I think, by the leader of the opposition, that a charter has been granted by this House for which a subsidy was given for a railway over the White Pass. There is, in addition to this, a charter for a railway granted by this House and also by the provincial government, from Taku Inlet to Teslin Lake, running from Taku to the same lake as this railroad is to touch. That company has been subsidized by the province of British Columbia with 5,120 acres of land per mile. Then there is the charter of the Cassiar Central, to which the hon. leader of the opposition refers, from a point on the Stikine River up to Dease Lake. The provisions of that charter are:

> The company may build and operate a railroad with one or more tracks of a standard or narrow gauge from some point on the Stikine River to some point in the vicinity of Dease Lake Cassiar, and also extensions to the northern and eastern boundaries of the province, and also branch lines to be located by the company from time to time.

Under that charter there is no doubt that the company can run a line to Teslin Lake. But in addition to all that, this railway line is entirely in the province of British Columbia. It is within the right of the legislature of British Columbia to grant a charter to-morrow, paralleling the line to be built by Mackenzie & Mann. They have a perfect right to do it. Mr. Beavin and other politicians out there are aware of the fact that this right exists. While I am speaking about the Cassiar Central; my hon. friend the leader of the opposition referred to the terms granted by the British Columbia legislature to a company known as the Cassiar Central, and only partly explained its provisions, and read an extract from a paper with which I am connected to show, possibly, that in supporting the bill before the House I was inconsistent. The Cassiar Central road was to commence construction within three years of the passing of the Act and has five years to complete the work, and receives 10,240 acres per mile, or 700,000 acres in all, in blocks of four miles square. They had five years to pick out the land, and they have to pay one-half per cent royalty. They obtained a lease for thirty-five years, and every person knows a lease of mineral lands for thirty-five years is practically a sale of the land, as far as the minerals are concerned, because all the minerals will be extracted from the land in far less time than that. Free miners may enter and stake claims, but he did not say that the railway company could immediately step in and take half their claim. The railway company is to have one-half of the claim and the miner the other. In six months the miner may offer his half for sale to the railway company, and they may take it or refuse it, and if they refuse he has two years to sell it. The company and the free miner are practically partners in the operation of the mine. It is quite true the newspaper with which I am connected opposed that proposition. Something was said about the appearance of a United States gentleman named Livernash in Room No. 8, who undertook to lecture hon. senators upon their duty in respect to this bill. I do not know that I should refer to the matter at any length, and I do not intend doing so, but I have reason to believe that this Mr. Livernash is more than a miners' delegate. I believe that he is here in the interests of the Alaska

Commercial Company, that he is the agent of the Alaska Commercial Company, who have every interest in seeing this Teslin Lake scheme defeated. Mr. Livernash made a very excellent speech from his standpoint. He is a fluent speaker and I went there and listened to him and was very much impressed indeed. He has, of course, such knowledge of the country as could be gained by less than three months in Dawson City.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Then he is worth listening to?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Yes, I think any good speaker is worth listening to even if I cannot agree with him. I have been advised, on what I believe to be excellent authority, that Mr. Livernash is the agent of the Alaska Company. He is nominally the representative of the miners, or that class of miners who mine in Dawson City. I believe Mr. Livernash is working in the interest of the cities of Seattle and San Francisco, and also the Alaska Commercial Company. I am informed on good authority that he received $18,000 for coming to the city of Ottawa. How much he receives from the Alaska Commercial Company I cannot say.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Could you tell us something about Mr. Slavin?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does the hon. gentleman know that his own newspaper, in Victoria, is accused of the very same thing—working in the interests of Seattle and Tacoma?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Who accuses the paper?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Another newspaper.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Accused by a rival newspaper?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They accused us of working for the Yankees.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is because we condemn the Stikine route.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Mr. Livernash advocated the improvement of the lower Yukon River. He advocated that a canal should be dug through the sand bar and, if I remember rightly, he advocated that both countries join in improving the lower Yukon River. The hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Almon) has asked me about Slavin. I do not know about him. He has issued a circular. He is a very hard hitter I believe.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the best hit you have made to-night.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Slavin may be an American for all I know.

An hon. MEMBER—No, an Australian.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Mr. Slavin did not come down as a miner's delegate, but he declined the position, through modesty shall I say? It was really modesty.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Was that before or after his conversion?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—A gentleman has arrived from Dawson City named Mr. O'Brien.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is that whisky O'Brien?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman is making his maiden speech in the House. I think it is exceedingly ungenerous and contrary to order to interrupt him in this way.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—He can take care of himself.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The hon. gentleman from Victoria asks if this is whisky O'Brien. Mr. O'Brien I know is a Canadian and a most respectable citizen. He had been in the Klondike country as a miner and trader for 11 years. He is a trader, and whether he has taken whisky into that country or not I do not know; but very respectable traders, such as the Alaska Commercial Company and the other company have taken whisky in there. Possibly Mr. O'Brien has done the same thing. It is not fair, and it is not right for hon. gentlemen to throw a reproach upon respectable men like Mr. O'Brien by asking in that flippant manner if he is "whisky O'Brien." Mr. O'Brien is a most respectable citizen. He has authorized me to present this statement which he made to me as the true state of affairs with respect to the appointment of this man Livernash, and with respect to the views and opinions of the miners on transportation and railway questions. The statement reads as follows :—

The meeting that appointed Messrs. Livernash, Wills and Landreville was composed of the floating population of Dawson, less than one-half of whom were mine-owners or miners—saloon men, gamblers and dancehouse men being in the majority. At that meeting a committee of ten was selected, who were to choose from their number three delegates to go to Ottawa to present the miners' grievances. That committee of ten chose Livernash, Wills and Landreville. The selection of Livernash was strongly objected to by the representative Canadians, and a movement was set on foot to have his selection cancelled. He was objected to because he was not a citizen, was only a few months in the country, knew nothing about mining and was believed to be in the pay of the Alaska Commercial Copany. Hearing of the dissatisfaction at his appointment Livernash suddenly started on his journey, thus defeating the wish of the Canadian residents to replace him on the committee with a man who had the confidence of the community. The committee, of which Livernash is the head, were supplied with a fund of $18,000 subscribed by the miners. Livernash first appeared in Dawson about the 20th of August and left about 1st December, being therefore a resident of the Klondike for three months. He represented the San Francisco Examiner as a correspondent ; he never prospected or mined in the country. He was not authorized to make any representations to the government in respect to roads of any kind. If he has opposed the government policy of building a railway from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake, he has acted against the interest of the miners and against the development of the country. The miners of the Klondike district would, in my opinion—and I know them well—approve of the construction of the Stikine road and would not object to the concession of land to the company for the purpose of building that road. The river from the boundary line to St. Michael's is practically under the control of the Alaska Commercial Company, who, owing to their posts being established on the river for many years, their absolute control of the Indian pilots, and the control of the wood along the river, can bid defiance to competition. It is in their interest to kill any other routes, and in opposing the Yukon railway, Mr. Livernash is the agent of the Alaska Commercial Company. It would be worth from half a million to a million dollars to the Alaska Commercial Company, during the year 1898 alone, to retain the transportation business of the Yukon and shut out Canadian competition from the south.

I was staggered at the enormity of the figures, and I asked Mr. O'Brien to go into the calculation. He did so and showed to my satisfaction that he was not exaggerating when he said that if the Alaska Commercial Company, with its six or seven steamers, making two or three trips a year, could monopolize the transportation of all the goods into that company for next summer they would make over $1,000,000 in transportation profits alone for that year, besides having a monopoly of the retail trade of the district. He continues :

In my opinion the government is making a better bargain by giving 3,750,000 acres of land to the contractors than they would be if they gave one million dollars in cash, for I do not believe the company would ever ake a million dollars—over the expense of working the ground—out of any 3,750,000 acres that it could select under the contract. I have been in that country eleven years and have travelled and prospected, with hundreds of others, from its source to its mouth, and many of the tributary streams. A large area has thus been prospected and it has been demonstrated—to the satisfaction of the experienced miner at least—that there are very few rich places and these are now all taken up.

The American companies have a monopoly of the lower Yukon route ; the passes into the upper Yukon are now blocked and will remain so for most of the summer, consequently no Canadian goods will get into the country if the Stikine route is not opened and Vancouver and Victoria merchants, having stocked up very heavily on that line of goods, will be unable to sell and with the wholesalers in the east who are supplying them, will be heavy losers. That is the true situation in the opinion of a Canadian resident of the Yukon and it ought to be seriously considered by parliament before voting to kill the bill now under consideration.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When, may I ask, did Mr. O'Brien make that statement ?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—He made it about the day after he came to the city of Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend how he reconciles the statement he has just read with the statement circulated in this House yesterday, at the instance of Mr. O'Brien presumably (because I find his name annexed to it) in which he states most emphatically that the three gentlemen in question were not authorized by the miners of Dawson to come to Ottawa to represent them as delegates. Whereas in the statement just read he states the contrary, that they were authorized ; and will my hon. friend also explain, as he seems to be familiar with those gentlemen, how it comes that Mr. O'Brien, in this statement, says that they were not authorized to represent the miners while his friend, Mr. Slavin, has circulated in this House a similar circular in which he states that they were authorized. It seems to me these gentiemen should revise their statements before issuing circulars of this description.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I have not seen the statement where Mr. O'Brien sets out what the hon. gentleman has just stated.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then I shall read it to my hon. friend :

I was very much surprised to hear that Mr. Livernash and his associates discussed Yukon affairs officially, as they were not authorized by the miners of that country to come here in any capacity.

And if my hon. friend will also look at Mr. Slavin's circular he will find this statement:

> At a subsequent meeting, held in the month of November, Messrs. Wills, Landreville and Livernash were deputed to come to Ottawa and explain to the government the objections the miners had to the royalty and the reduction in the length of claims.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I did not read Mr. Slavin's circular.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And as to Mr. O'Brien's second statement?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I did not read Mr. O'Brien's second statement. I had previously received from Mr. O'Brien, myself, this statement. I wrote it out at Mr. O'Brien's dictation. I have every reason to believe Mr. O'Brien, as he has presented the facts here; he has stated how these three gentlemen came to be appointed, that Mr. Livernash did not represent the miners, that they represented very largely that class of people who are assembled in the city of Dawson rather than the miners who were working out at the mines.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentlemen from Calgary interrupted the hon. gentleman from British Columbia and told that hon. gentleman—

Several Hon. MEMBERS—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to discuss the question of order. The hon. gentleman from Calgary interrupted the hon. gentleman from British Columbia and told that hon. gentleman that a statement signed by Mr. O'Brien had said that Mr. Livernash and his associates were not sent here by the miners of the Yukon. Now, will the House be surprised to learn that there is no such assertion in the statement published by Mr. O'Brien? Mr. O'Brien says in the first paragraph of his statement:

> I am very much surprised to hear that Mr. Livernash and his associates discussed Yukon affairs here officially as they were not authorized by the miners of that country to come here in any capacity.

And he says in the next paragraph, you may rest assured that Canadian miners would not send United States newspaper men here to represent them.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Tell us what the point of order is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The point has been made now.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I am extremely well pleased that my hon. friends opposite have so much solicitude for me. I understood that, having permitted an opponent to interject remarks and he was not called to order, when a friend should come, as it were, to my rescue and make a point in my behalf that hon. gentlemen opposite should shout order, order. I do not think that is quite fair. The point I tried to make was that Mr. Livernash was, in my opinion, working in the interests of the Alaska Commercial Company. Mr. O'Brien is here as a representative of the Pioneer Society, the men who have been in the Klondike for five years and upwards. I do not think that any credence should be given or any weight attached to the arguments of gentlemen such as Mr. Livernash, and when I bring testimony such as Mr. O'Brien has given, I do not think it is reasonable, fair or right that hon. gentlemen should try to discredit Mr. O'Brien's evidence by making unfair and unworthy insinuations as to his calling and his profession. Now I have detained the House long enough. As I said before, I shall not refer to the land grant or the matter of its selection, or the royalty. These subjects have been discussed so fully and so ably that it would be waste of time for me to go over the same ground. I will say frankly, and this may be some consolation to some hon. gentlemen opposite, that I would have preferred the contract if there had been a smaller grant, and I would have preferred it still more if there had been no grant at all, but that is impossible; it would have meant a large cash subsidy which this House would not have voted for. Hon. gentlemen who have spoken against this bill, I have no doubt, would have used even stronger language against the government if they had proposed a money vote to build this railway. As to the question of urgency, the position of the government on this point has not been successfully assailed, and that being so, it follows that the wholesome practice of calling for tenders under normal conditions could not be followed in this case. I have tried to come to a conclusion on the question uninfluenced by party bias. We have all been party men, but if there is any place in this country where party views should have no effect, where men can be above partisanship, it is within the four walls of this House. I have listened to the arguments for and against the bill and I am convinced that on the whole it is in the interests of Canadian trade that it should be ratified, and that above all it is pre-eminently in the interests of the great province of the Pacific coast from which I come; and it is for these reasons I propose to give my vote against the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Victoria.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The question now before the House has been considered under different aspects. Discussions have arisen as to whether we have the constitutianal right to deal with it. We have been told what the result would be with the government if the Senate should reject this bill. We know also, from what we have heard and read, what the consequences will be with the country if we should pass this bill. Now, hon. gentlemen, I propose that we pause a little and see what the consequences may be with the Senate as a body and with us individually, whether we pass this bill or whether we reject it. The warning has been given to the Senate in the other chamber by an hon. minister of the Crown, in the very elaborate speech that he made in seconding the question. You have also read, hon. gentlemen, what the press of the English speaking papers in Ontario and Quebec and other provinces have had to say, but of what the French press thinks of the situation the majority in this Senate is not aware, and my object is to make you acquainted with what the French press think and intend to do with us in case we reject this bill. I shall not quote any English papers; you have read them, and I wish to repeat as little as I can. I shall not either deal with the small fry of the French press; I will take the government organ, an organ that has been bought by the money of the party, if we are to believe the statement made in the other House by the Hon. Mr. Tarte, an organ that has been bought by the sons of Mr. Tarte himself, if we are to believe the sworn statement of Mr. Greenshields. Mr. Greenshields is an honourable man, and so is Mr. Tarte. I will take the version of the hon. gentleman as a declaration made in the other House, is certainly equivalent to an oath, and I will read to you a few extracts from several articles, translating them at the same time for the edification of this House. Here is what this paper says under date of February 24th:—

> On what would the Senate base itself to thus thwart the Laurier government policy? It has received no direct mandate from the people, it represents in no manner of way the sentiment of the masses; it has no public responsibility, its power is nothing but an arbitrary one; its senile caprices are sovereign, and the sixty Tories who were shelved there during the twenty years of a nefarious regime were deposited in that upper chamber as a hospital where they could nurse their impotency and their uselessness.

Then, on the same date:

> The Senate represents nothing, and is nothing.

Again:

> If the senators take upon themselves to annul the Mackenzie and Mann contract let them be prepared to assume the responsibility and the calamities that will result from their action. As to the Laurier government it will have no effect upon it, but to determine it to commence at an earlier date the solving of the problem of the reform of the Senate.

Then, under the date of February the 25th, this paper says:

> The Senate is a hospital of invalids, a body of absolutism, an arbitrary chamber, a body of impotence and invalids. The Tory government selected them generally from broken politicians, from among members who could not show their faces in their own counties and from among party ruins. The people and their direct representatives are at the mercy of the whim, of the tart temper, crossness, and of the contrary, narrow, obtuse spirit of a set of old fakirs. It is a House composed mostly of nullities who are in the enjoyment of unlimited powers.

Then on the 26th February:

> Up to the accession of Sir Wilfrid Laurier to power it was the custom that the government would choose senators from among the lame and dejected politically, from among the wounded of the lists, from among the insignificance, the impotence of the party and the selection was never based upon merit and valour.

Then on the 28th February, there is the following:

> If we turn our glances towards Ottawa we see there composing the high chamber a selection of invalids, of octogenarians, a poor political infirmary where Toryism has, during 18 years, relegated its sick men, its wounded, its cripple seated in a wooden bowl, nay its very beggars.
> If the Senate rejects the bill Laurier will have to reform it.

Then on the 1st March the paper bought by Mr. Tarte's sons, although it was of public notoriety that Mr. Tarte or his sons apparently had no money at the time, in whatever pecuniary position they may be now, I do not know—that paper went on and said :

The Canadian Senate is a chamber of irresponsibles, a cabinet of decadents, a hospital of irremovables, a vulgar senatorial infirmary. It is, in fact, a body too much beneath notice to enjoy public confidence. It was heretical to thus create an immovable legislative body.

Then on the 2nd March it had a long article from which I excerpt the following sentences :

Those people hold a mandate to which not even moral obligations attach. It is a federal infirmary.

And on the 3rd March :

The senators are conspirators.

On the 4th March :

The Senate is a Tory hospital, it is an unbudgeable and irresponsible Senate, destined, as Sir A. A. Dorion predicted it, to become a chamber of courtiers, something in the nature of a black cabinet in the service of the Tories.

The article ends with dire threats against this body. In an article on the 5th March it says :

The Senate has degenerated into a mere conservative machine, a sanitorium for the cripples of Toryism since 1877, into a detestable hospital, where the infirm who still can do something, are entrusted with the business of Tupper & Co.

Meaning the leader of the opposition. On the same day it had another article from which I quote this :

Our Senate is so essentially a hospital that we see therein almost nothing but quivering old ruins, mossy craniums, limbless bodies, old dads who are unable to walk and are wheelbarrowed into their upper chamber in small invalid vehicles.

Have any of you, hon. gentlemen, a Billingsgate dictionary? As I am not familiar with English slang, I am unable to continue quoting from the articles published by the paper controlled by Mr. Tarte, a minister of the Crown, concerning the Senate. This, hon. gentlemen, gives us the view that some members of the government take of the situation and of us. Now, we are aware of the calamities that will befall us if we reject this bill: we know that we will be abolished. But what will become of us if we do not reject the bill? There we are again. I believe that the sentiment of the country, if we do not reject this bill, will in its turn demand our annihilation, so that in in whatever way we go, however we may vote we are destined to abolition. Such being the case, I propose now that we shall ook into the question and, if die we must, let us try to die virtuously as condemned men looking forward to a better future life, or at least dying with dignity. Is this Yukon bill worth our while rejecting in view of the arrangement that has been made between the company and the government? The leader of this House is of opinion that the gold in the Yukon district will not more than pay for the taking of it out of the ground, that when the balance sheet is made up, there will be but little profit for those who go there and develop the mines. On the other hand, the hon. Secretary of State said that not more than one per cent of that land was of any value and that it is doubtful if one-fourth of one per cent could be considered valuable. Therefore, from the ministerial standpoint, the Yukon district is of very little consequence. Let us see now if those statements which have been made to this House are in accord with the facts that we can gather from other sources. On what authority those hon. ministers have based their statements they have not revealed to us, but undoubtedly those assertions could not have been made to mislead us. It has been known throughout this Dominion for a year and more that the Yukon district, especially the Klondike, abounds in wealth. We have had letters from men who have gone out there, written to their friends and published in the press, showing the extraordinary wealth of that country. I have seen persons in Montreal and other places who have returned from that country bringing with them enormous sums of money and stating that the Klondike district possesses extraordinary richness. We have to corroborate those statements, the report of Mr. Ogilvie who says that :

Bonanza Creek and tributaries are increasing in richness and extent until now it is certain that millions will be taken out of the district in the next few years. On some of the claims prospected the pay dirt is of great extent and very rich. One man told me yesterday that he had washed out a single pan of dirt on one of the claims on Bonanza and found $14.25. Of course that may be an exceptionally rich pan, but $5 to $7 per pan is the average on that claim, it is reported, with five feet of pay dirt and the width yet undetermined, but it is known to be thirty feet. Even at that figure the result at nine to ten pans to the cubic foot, and 500 feet long—nearly $4,000,000 at $5 per pan. One-fourth of this would be enormous. Another claim has been prospected to such an extent that it is known there is about five feet pay dirt averaging $2 per pan, and width not less than 30 feet. Enough prospecting has been done to show that there are at least fifteen miles of this extraordinary richness, and the indications are that we will have three or four time that extent, of not all equal to the above, at least very rich.

Again I read that :

Last summer the total yield in the Klondike district was well within $1,500,000.

The winter work for the season 1897-98 will not yield more than $6,000,000. Probably $5,000,000 will prove nearer the output.

Mr. Alexander McDonald, the principal individual mine of the Klondike, and the best authority there on the wealth of that district, estimates that when Eldorado and Bonanza and their tributaries are exhausted rim to rim and summit to base, their aggregate yield will have been about $50,000,000. No estimate of the wealth of other creeks of the Klondike and Indian Divisions could have any value. Too little is known of them to enable estimates to be made.

These are reports of persons who have reason to know, and they are in direct contradiction to the statements of the hon. ministers of the Crown in this House. But if the testimony of our Canadian experts is not sufficient to show the wealth of this country, I will read from the reports of United States experts who take a different view altogether from the hon. leader of the House. Director Walcott, of the United States Geological Survey, says :

The gold resources of Alaska appear to be practically inexhaustible. The miners who are attacking the placers in the Yukon valley are gathering the gold sorted out of the debris washed down from the mountains during many centuries. In that region there is a belt of gold bearing rocks five hundred miles long not touched as yet by pick or blast. Geologists who have examined the deposits are of the opinion that they may surpass the wonderful gold mines of South Africa in productiveness.

I could cite some other United States authorities to show that the prospects are good for extraordinary richness in those regions ; but the Globe, in a late issue, has also contradicted the statements made in this House by the hon. leader. Commenting upon the possibilities of gold in the Klondike region, the Globe says that it is exceedingly rich, and is likely to prove exceedingly rich. Those are the words of the Globe, I believe, that it is possible that the claim given to Mackenzie & Mann is worth $4,000,000 ; that it might be worth $4,000,000,000 ; or be worth $4,000,000,000,000. Now, four millions of dollars is more than the cost of building the road according to the government estimates. By the estimate of Mr. Jennings, it would build nearly double that length of road. $4,000,000,000 is more than the whole amount of gold bullion of Great Britain, and $4,000,000,000,000 is more than the whole amount of gold in circulation in the world. I place these facts before this House, and the hon leaders. If they do not accept the reports of our experts and the reports of the United States geologists surely they will not discredit the Globe, which should be an authority with them at least. Such being the possibilities of the case, we are, I am convinced, in duty bound not to take any hurried step in this matter. We are here to protect the country, and see that its wealth is not given away, and although the exact amount of wealth in that country is not exactly proved, there are sufficient probabilities concerning it to warrant us in being very guarded before giving those rich lands away. In what I have read concerning the riches of the Klondike I have only mentioned the placer deposits. I have not mentioned the quartz, and it is the opinion of geologists that the gold has been deposited there by the glaciers, or before the glacial period, and that rich lodes will before long be found in those very regions. As a proof of that, we knew there has been taken from the vicinity of Juneau $12,000,000 from quartz mining, and that quartz mining is developing rapidly, and that the chances are that on that belt of the Cordilleras immense discoveries of gold will be made. Therefore, hon. gentlemen, I repeat we would not be warranted in giving away those riches before we know more about them. When making his very elaborate speech, the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) was asked by the hon. leader of the House, or the hon. Secretary of State, what he thought the Americans would do if we were to adopt the Dyea and Skagway route. That is a question that should have been asked, not of a member of this House, but of the United States government. There was an opportunity, a grand opportunity for us to work hand in hand with our neighbours to the south of us. That road from Dyea to Dawson is shorter by 200 miles than the Mackenzie & Mann route. When miners have to come to the Pacific Ocean they naturally prefer to take the shortest route, and there was a grand opportunity of entering into the arrangement with the United States government and have them come with us, if not to help us to build that branch road, at all events to make some permanent arrangement which would preclude any trouble hereafter, which we are very likely now to meet with. The government were in a position, for example, to promise that United States miners should be on an equal footing with ours; as they are now—we could promise a continuation of that privilege.

It would not have been necessary then, as is now proposed by the Hansbury Bill in Washington, to give as an equivalent our fisheries or any advantage we possess on the Atlantic; but it would have been promising them advantages which we will continue to give them, and which would have been satisfactory to them, no doubt, and on the promise of which we would, likely have been granted permanently bonding privileges through Dyea, Skagway and Lynn Canal. It would have settled this question, which promises to be anything but a pleasant one in the near future. I read in a United States newspaper that at a meeting of capitalists interested in the construction of a railway to the Yukon territory:

W. C. Alberger presented a report based upon recent explorations and from observations made during an exhaustive surveying trip to Alaska and showing that a route up Copper River was not only feasible, but practicable. It was decided to organize a party of surveyors which is to start as soon as weather conditions will permit, probably by May 15. The programme is to start for Orca and proceed up Copper River to its head and thence across to the Yukon to its junction with the American boundary line.

Showing gentlemen, that the United States people are just as interested as we are in the building of a road, and that would have been the proper policy for this government to have approached the United States government on that subject and made arrangements which, I believe, could have then been easily made, and thus save us from the difficulties we are in and in which we will continue to be. I have been looking into this contract, and the more I see of it, the more I am convinced that such a contract should not be ratified. The privileges that are given Mackenzie & Mann are such as will put into the hands of themselves and their friends, practically the whole of the Yukon district, and will also prevent the further development of those mines. Clause 18 reads:

So soon as any ten continuous miles of said railway between Stikine River and Teslin Lake have been completed and in running order, and certified so to be by an officer named by the Minister of Railways in that behalf, the contractors may select ninety-two thousand one hundred and sixty acres, or two blocks of land, hereunder and thereupon such blocks shall be reserved by the government from sale, or location, or free miners' claims, and upon the completion from time to time, in a similar way, of any other ten miles, the contractors shall have a similar right to select ninety-two thousand one hundred and sixty acres, or two blocks, which shall thereupon be similarly reserved, and upon the completion of the said railway, and acceptance thereof by the government as completed, the blocks so reserved shall be granted to the contractors.

What will be the result of this? So soon as ten miles of this railway is built, and it has been said that those ten miles can be built in the month of June, Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann will have the privilege of selecting 92,000 acres of land. They will practically be able to take at once all the available land in the Klondike district. That Klondike district extends now, as it stands, from Dawson south to the Indian River, about 36 miles, from the Yukon easterly about 45 miles, aggregating altogether less than a million acres of land. Five or six creeks have been surveyed to a limited extent—the Klondike, the Bonanza, the Too Much Gold, the All Gold, and the Indian River—and none of these rivers have been explored more than 20 or 30 miles. The government have reserved in those rivers the alternate claims. These alternate claims are now lying there. As soon as Mackenzie & Mann have built ten miles of the railway they can take those alternate claims, which are now kept from the miners and left open for Mackenzie & Mann to take. What will those alternate claims represent? We have the statement of Mr. Ogilvie that in that very district there is in sight, on the claims that have been actually taken, between 50 and 60 millions. That statement is from a competent man. The government have reserved these alternate claims. As soon as these ten miles are built, Mackenzie and Mann will swoop down on the intermediate claims, taking for their benefit what is said by Mr. Ogilvie to be equal to 50 or 60 million dollars. But that is not the worst feature of the case. They are allowed to take one-half of their claims in three years, and the other half of their four millions of acres, in six years. That looks very innocent, but it is misleading. That is the worst feature of the whole clause. The mining in the Yukon and that district, is not like the mining in South Africa, or California, or in Australia. There the miner goes to the location and can see at once if the ground is good, and can register his claim. But not so with us. Our miners have to go there in summer and select their claims. They can only work in winter. It is a slow process. They have to thaw out the ground they select, digging a few inches per day, and it is only after they have toiled at that for six months that they are in a position to take their claim, because they have only the privilege of taking one claim in one district, and they want to make a sure thing of it. There will be next year, according to the leader of this House, no less than 100,000 miners in the whole district. They will scatter about. What will be the result? Those courageous free miners, who go there for the purpose of making money, they have sold perhaps their household as some of them have, or borrowed the money, or have money given them by friends, go there for the purpose of selecting claims, and doing it intelligently. Say there are a thousand men in the new unexplored districts. There is, as I said before a small piece of the gold region, that has been now explored, 36 by 45 miles; all the rest of the region is unexplored, and we know from geologists that the whole tract is auriferous. There is no doubt of that. Other new locations will be made. Of a thousand miners, one or two or three go a little faster than the others, and find a claim. What will be the result? Mackenzie & Mann are there, watching, through their agents, what is going on in the whole region. All they have to do is to go and lay their posts there. They scoop the whole thing except those two or three claims that have been taken, and the 500 or 1,000 miners that are there, who have dug down 15 or 20 feet, but are not ready to register, and have not registered actually, will lose the benefit of the toil, and all the advantage enures to Mackenzie & Mann. Now just imagine, hon. gentlemen, what a howl, what a cry will rise to Heaven when these men find out that they are to be despoiled of the fruits of their labour and toil, and all for the benefit of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, who have already in the Yukon district, according to Mr. Ogilvie's testimony, in sight, ready to be taken up so soon as the first ten miles of that railroad are built, fifty or sixty millions, who are given a bonus by the British Columbia government, who have land subsidies and the whole quartz mining and the wood of those regions, in fact who have all the mines of that district, because you will agree with me that 4,000,000 acres which they have six years to select, will give them the choicest of the mineral lands. Every miner that goes to work there will be a prospector for Mackenzie & Mann, and these will be hovering like a bird of prey over them, watching until a rich location is struck and then they will come down and take the whole of it, the Government reserving the alternate claims. Who will go from the eastern provinces under those conditions and risk their lives, spend their money and undermine their health, looking for mines for the benefit of Mackenzie & Mann and their associates. It will paralyze that bountiful district, which is perhaps in one way the richest in God's creation? In that Arctic climate, the work will be slow, while in Australia, in the Transvaal and in California, the work can go on speedily. In the Yukon it will be slow work, because all the ground, as you know, is frozen, is as hard as rock. Propositions have been made and will be likely to be carried out, to deal with that frozen ground as quartz is dealt with now; instead of washing them, ultimately to crush them. The result will be that if one-tenth of the riches that are supposed to exist there do actually exist, the exploiting will last for years and years, and if, as the hon. gentleman said here, there is no profit in the extraction of gold itself, there is profit for Canada in supplying those people that will be there to the number of one or two hundred thousand a year working continually. The riches will come to Canada in the way of supplies if the road is built for us and not for the people of the United States. But if the road is not properly located, we will have but a small share of the trade of that region. Do you know what a Seattle paper said the other day? Seattle will make $25,000,000 this year in the supplying of goods and provisions and so forth. And why not? That road that we are building, hon. gentlemen, be it on Canada or United States territory, will benefit especially the people of the United States, because to compete with them we have to take our goods to Victoria and when there, we are just in the same position that they are. We have all the cost and difficulties of transportation against us from here to Victoria. There is a necessity for building some road now—no doubt about it; but there is also a necessity for us not to build a permanent road to the Pacific. The road that Canada wants, the road that will benefit the whole of this Dominion, is one on this side of the Rockies, from Edmonton. That line would traverse rich agricultural lands, and lands rich in minerals also. For about 1,000 miles it would be on a pretty level ground and could be made cheaply to the head waters of the rivers flowing west about 300 miles to the Klondike. By this bill, hon. gentlemen, you practically give all the Klondike to Mackenzie & Mann. You give them the privilege of selecting the gold claims from the Mackenzie River, and the Great Slave Lakes, up to the Pacific coast, in a district almost as large as Europe, and they have six years to wait, as I said before. You are giving away practically all your mining riches to a company for building 150 miles of a link of a railway, which will only be serviceable for five months in the year, which will be utterly useless in winter, because those miners desiring to go to the Pacific when navigation is closed will naturally take the shortest route, by Dyea and Skagway, which is shorter by 200 miles than the route now proposed, and shorter by 400 miles than the route, when it is completed, to Observatory Harbour. People will take the shortest route, and this road will be absolutely useless in winter, it is a repetition of the old water stretches, making it now ice stretches. The road that Canada should build—and I hope it will utimately be built—and the only railway to the Klondike, will be the road on this side of the mountains, and then, as I said before, we will have the commerce, and we will have the supplying of the mining camps. But what shall we build a road with? If we, to-day, give this land to Mackenzie & Mann for building 150 miles of railway, the road is not built—and it will not be what shall we have to build the whole road when it is necessary to build it? Because it will become necessary to build it. That country is likely to develop to such an extent that it will be of vital interest to Canada to have the road that I mention built. What shall we build the road with, if the golden grounds are now given away? What will we have to build even the prolongation of that road from Telegraph Creek to Pyramid Harbour, which is about 200 miles, and which Mackenzie & Mann have the exclusive privilege of building, and which Mr. Laurier said would be built if the United States people put no obstacle in our way? The treasury? If the mining grounds are given away, we will have to put our hands in our pockets, and build the extension to Observatory Inlet by government grant. And when we build that road by Edmonton, which we will ultimately do—a road over 1,000 miles in length—we will not have any golden district left to pay for the road. That sort of administration is not what we expect from this or any other government. We are giving away the land to Mackenzie & Mann. The next step will be that we will have to build the road for Mackenzie & Mann to Observatory Inlet. And when we build this Edmonton road, it will also be for them, because they will be the owners of the land. But that is not all. Those miners who are there and whose rights will be taken from them, will likely rise in rebellion, and we will have to send out our troops to quell the rebellion—a just rebellion I say in my place here to-night. And for whom shall we have to send our troops and soldiers? For Mackenzie & Mann. The power we are giving these men will make them potentates who will compare in power with the Czar of Russia. No, that cannot be done. If this honourable House is doomed to go one way or the other, we had ratherbe abolished after having performed what is clearly a duty to the country. I think the Senate will reject this iniquitous bill and will retain for the country the richest tract of gold-bearing land that the Creator has made, and which is being bartered away for a mess of pottage—for hash. If the Senate pass this bill, I for one, acknowledge that we should be abolished; if the Senate pass this bill and the question comes up at the next election for the abolition of the Senate I shall vote for abolition of this body, because I will deem that our usefulness is gone. If we are not sufficiently conscientious to perform what the country expect from us, it is better indeed that we should be abolished and that nothing more should be said of us. I, for one, hon. gentlemen, will cast my vote, and that, as a matter of strict duty, in favour of the six months' hoist, to this iniquitous contract that has been palmed on the government. Some members of the government, I am sure, at least I was told so, will be glad if this bill is rejected—will be glad for several reasons: first for a reason of honesty; second, if this bill should pass here it would sound the knell of this administration at the next election. This, hon. gentlemen shows that whatever has been said of us here, that we are not prompted by a spirit of partizanship; because if we meant to be partizan, the thing we would do would be to let this bill pass, and the result on the country at large would be such that all the gold that may be derived by some individuals from that contract thrown in the balance of election would not counter-balance the indignation in the country against the government. Do you know, hon. gentlemen, what was told me by an engineer of the old country? Said he to me, "You have that ten per cent royalty; it may be excessive, but if the gold is there which is supposed to exist, keep on that ten per cent of royalty, and in twenty years you can wipe off your national debt." Here we are giving it away for nothing and entailing on the country the building of future railways, as I said before, for those gentlemen and preparing for us there trouble, which will necessarily come if those United States and Canadian miners are despoiled of their just anticipations and rights. I feel very strongly on this question, and if this is to be our last vote or our last session of parliament, I want, before recording my vote, to give you my honest reasons why I shall vote for the amendment.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not know whether it is the intention of the House that this debate should be continued longer to-night. I am willing to move that it be adjourned.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We cannot finish to-night. It would be six o'clock in the morning before we would get through if we went on.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I am willing to proceed or I am willing to give way again to-night, but I wish to understand if it is to be closed.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I should be willing to leave it to the leader of the House, if he will agree to finish to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It is getting a little late I know, but if we do not get one more speaker off the list, we will not reach a decision this week.

Several hon. MEMBERS—Go on! go on!

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It seems the desire of the House that I should continue the debate. I have listened very carefully to the discussions which have taken place on this all-important matter. It is a matter which is looked upon by the whole country as of unprecedented importance to the future interests of the country, and, therefore, it behooves every man to come forward, and state his opinion carefully, frankly and independently. I am strenuously opposed to the giving away of our lands, unless for a fair and valuable consideration. I do not think that care has been exercised in making this contract. The question has not been well considered by the party whose duty it was to negotiate the contract on behalf of the government, and I believe they have come to a decision that will be very unsatisfactory, and disastrous to the interests of the country. We are giving away some three, four or five million acres of land. For what? For the purpose of having a tramway of 150 miles constructed, which, I believe, at the most will cost $5,000 a mile. That is the only consideration which you receive in return for this large area of valuable land. I suppose it is the most valuable property in the known world. No man can lay hands upon a particular spot and say there is gold here, but the consensus of opinion throughout the known world is that this land will be most valuable in the future, and that of course is what we desire to look to. Hon. gentlemen say the contract is not going to cost the country one solitary dollar. How can they come to that conclusion. They must value the land as nil, Is that a fair computation to make of valuable property, or is it the computation that a prudent business man would make of an asset? I appeal now to hon. gentlemen of long experience and well acquainted with business and financial operations, and ask them whether they would come to a conclusion and vote upon a question of this importance with the meagre information which has been communicated to us by the government? I think not. I should like to see the manager of a large institution making a proposition to carry out an enterprise with as small an amount of information as has been afforded us. That man's position would not be worth much. The government have acted in a very extraordinary manner. They tell you that urgency is needed, and urgency is the only plea In justification of this great outlay of money. I do not concur in that opinion. I believe that delay would have been far better than hurrying through this gigantic bill. What has been the effect of that? It has induced a great many of our young men to leave their positions and their homes and proceed to the Klondike in quest of gold. We know from past experience that it is very alluring. Young men we know are easily led away. At the time of the great excitement in California, very many men, chiefly of an undesirable class, left their homes in that country, but fortunately for us we have not that class of settlers here which they had in the United States at that time. Instead of our promising young men remaining at home to cultivate our farms and attend to our business, they have been lured away by the government prospectus, whether rightly or wrongly to seek a future home the Klondike. They have issued a false prospectus and we know the effect of these prospectuses. The country at this time is smarting from the consequences resulting from false prospectuses in the case of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and I have no doubt the same effect will be felt in the future, and the government have taken a great responsibility in their hands in trying to induce our men to leave this country for the purpose of going to a lone land, and depriving themselves of the comforts of home, until they are perfectly assured and satisfied that they are doing a good service to them and to the country. We are told that this is a great unknown region; that nobody knows anything at all about it; but I tell you, hon. gentlemen, there are men associated with this undertaking who know everything about it. I do not insult their intelligence by saying that they are going into this thing blind, that they are going into the transaction as gamblers. Their financial position and commercial experience and standing would not permit them to make such a proposition, and I would not have it understood for any purpose that they are actuated by any such motive. Therefore I do think they do know, and have known, and it has been considered by them for a great many months. Probably for years they have had their eyes upon that Yukon country, and at the right time they struck the right chord and succeeded in obtaining a contract above all others, and of the greatest extent that has ever been given by any administration or any country. The late government have been credited with taking very bold measures, and that is true to a certain extent; but this overtops all that has occurred in the past and stands pre-eminently above any act that ever was perpetrated or conceived by former governments. I am not going to say that there was any wrong doing in this matter; I do not accuse any man of doing wrong, but I do accuse the government of not supplying sufficient information to enable us consider the matter in a proper light before entering into this contract with Mackenzie & Mann. I firmly believe that if those three, or four, or five million acres of land had been offered on the English market, that land in place of realizing two dollars per acre would realize twenty dollars an acre, and I believe there would be very little difficulty in floating the whole of that stock in the English market in a very short space of time. We know that in the last few months large developing companies have been organized in England with capital up to $10,000,000. Their stock has all been subscribed; the people in England are so desirous of obtaining the privileges and getting the Klondike country that I believe all this land would be taken up and paid for and this country would derive the benefit of it. But all this profit is to go into the pockets and the hands of the contractors, and Canada will be left in the cold and will not realize one doller from it. Now is that a fair and honourable position to put this country it? I think not. The true plan would be to do what was done in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The government of that day invited tenders from one end of the civilized world to the other. They sent men to examine and explore the country and as soon as that was done, they were in a position to let the contract; and they knew what they were doing. Now in this case we do not know anything about the country. When this question first came up, nobody knew anything about the contract, or about the country, or about the future prospects of this district. All was in a state of chaos and confusion. I do not know that the position is very much improved at the present time, although it has engaged the attention for a long time of members of parliament in both Houses and of the country generally. During all the weeks of discussion on this bill, I have not heard one man express himself in favour of having this arrangement carried out in its present shape. If it had been carried out in a proper manner, with proper advertising that such a contract would be given out, and the best tender had been accepted, there could have been no word of complaint about it. I do not object to the contsruction of a railway provided that railway is situated in the proper place, and provided we do not pay too much for it. I presume some means of communication is needed for that country. That is self-evident. I have not heard one man object to the principle that a railway is necessary, but what people object to is the manner in which this contract has been given out, under suspicious circumstances. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice may think differently, but I have not heard one word against the propriety of the construction of a railway from anybody. I believe to-day, if you polled the entire Dominion of Canada the people would say, "yes, go on with the railway, give all the facilities necessary, but be careful that you select the best route, and obtain the best terms for the construction of that road." We have heard a great deal from hon. gentlemen who have addressed this Senate upon various subjects and topics. We have had the constitutional question argued very ably by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. He gave us an eloquent and learned address, as, of course all his addresses are. But there was something at the bottom of it, which I could not understand. I almost thought he wished it to be inferred that the Senate, as a Senate, had no right to interfere with the decisions of the Commons upon this matter, because a majority of the lower house had assented to the contract, and to the giving away of the lands. He did not say that in so many words, but his remarks led me to the belief that they were intended for weak-minded men like myself, to have a certain effect on our votes on this question. That was supplemented last night by the hon. gentleman from DeLorimier, and, for greater effect, he also came forward with pretty nearly the same argument. If that contention is true, we are not in a position to give a vote on this question. If we are responsible for the vote that we are to give, then we ought to be equally entitled to give our votes freely, frankly and independently. When I was appointed as a senator of this Dominion, I took upon myself as I thought a serious responsibility, and I was obliged to accede to certain terms and conditions on my appointment. I was obliged to meet Parliament whenever and wheresoever it was convened, and I assumed other obligations. But if I am absolved by the principle laid down by my two learned friends, and if so, I must withdraw from the obligations I assumed upon taking the position of senator. But I do not think that was the intention. If we are not responsible for our actions, we should not be called upon to cast our votes one way or the other. Of course, we all know that these lawyers give their opinions in such a way that it is very hard for laymen to controvert them. But I take a common sense view of it, and I say that the senators as free men ought to enjoy the same rights and privileges as members of the House of Commons, with the perfect right of private judgment.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—So they do.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—They have no right to say we are influenced by partisan or other improper motives, whilst they claim that they themselves are perfectly free from any imputations of that kind. I do not insinuate that these men have been guilty of any partisan acts, as far as they are concerned. They have their consciences to tell them whether they are doing right or wrong, and I have no right to inquire into it. When I concede that, I think they ought also to allow me the same right to decide every matter that comes before me as a free man. I claim a perfect right of free action in every matter that may come before me as a senator of this Dominion. If I am not in that position I have no right to be here, and I have no right to say that the measures introduced are either right or wrong. I am above all a true, loyal Canadian, and I want to see this country prosper and continue prosperous. I have no sympathy with those men who think that nothing shines except beyond the line to the south of us. We were told at the outset that this line was an all-Canadian route. That remained upon the tapis for a considerable time until one fine morning they found that the people of the United States took a different view of it. Our neighbours said: "You are interfering with our rights and prerogatives; thus far shalt thou go and no farther." That is the kind of treatment we have always received from our United States friends. They interpose their authority in every matter that concerns the British people. Only a short time ago they would not allow our ladies to cross the border with sealskin coats. They would not allow one of our servant girls or nurses to go into their country, and they put the alien labour law into force. But we are told here that we must not say a word to them at all. The policy pursued by our neighbours is for the purpose of trying to alienate the people of this country from their allegiance to the mother land, with the idea that we will eventually join the republic. They have tried that on several occasions. You all remember the abrogation of the treaty of reciprocity. They thought at the time that it would so injure the people of this country that we would immediately fall into the arms of the American republic. They were disappointed; they have tried such games since, and I have no doubt they will try them again. But there is no possibility of the people of this country being seduced from allegiance to their Queen and their country. There has been a great deal said about the Yukon mining regulations. It does appear to me most extraordinary that mining regulations of this character should have been framed in the way they are. I am not a miner and know very little about such matters; but I know the principles upon which business is generally transacted; and I cannot understand, for the life of me, why a miner going into that country and enduring all the hardship incident to a miner's life, should be subjected to a large royalty when those millionaires are let off with merely a duty of one per cent. That is contrary of all principles of business; it is against the fundamental rights of human nature; and I am sure, if the Government had taken the matter seriously into consideration, they would have come to the sensible conclusion that there should be a sliding scale. Say a man going into that country did earn thirty or forty thousand, he ought to be let off pretty easily, I think he ought to go scot free. When a man makes a large amount of money, the country has a right to benefit considerably from the proceeds of his find. That is sound common sense. I do not know that the government is actually doing that. I presume the subject was not well considered; the government had not the time to consider it. We know they had a great deal to do. They were travelling through Great Britain, enjoying themselves, and they must have heard a great deal of the Klondike during that period. It was universally spoken of in England, and everybody knew there would be a rush to that country this year. Did they make any provision to meet such a cantingency? Did they do anything? It is true they had an interview with Mr. Kersey in the month of December, but nothing came of it. It was only a few days before parliament met that the idea struck them that they could make this bargain with Mann & Mackenzie, and have the work prosecuted by these two gentlemen. I have not one word to say about the ability of these gentlemen to perform the work satisfactorily and properly — more satisfactorily to themselves, possibly, than to the country. However, they did make this contract, but is it possible that there are only two men in this world who are capable of undertaking and performing this work to the satisfaction of the government, putting up the necessary deposit, and doing every thing that is required? I believe that if it was known that the proposal for a contract was in the market, instead of one firm we would have had hundreds perfectly able and willing to carry out this work as well as Mackenzie & Mann. I do not say one word against their ability. I believe they are perfectly capable. At the same time, there are other capable men, and I believe in giving every man a fair chance. They have built many roads in this country and have obtained large amounts from the revenue of this country. I am opposed, and always was opposed, to giving out contracts in this way. Every contract of a public character should be given out by public tender. In Ontario, last year, the great cry against the Hardy government was that they did not comply with that regulation. When these gentlemen were in opposition they berated the Conservative government pretty well if they gave a small contract of $100 without complying with that regulation, and advertising for tenders. If it was necessary then, it is necessary now. That was one of the principle items in the programme of the Liberal party, while they were in opposition. But as soon as they get into power, they change their whole tactics. The fact is that they have taken everything from the Conservatives that is good, robbed them of their clothes, and have assumed every responsibility, and have done every act that they used to condemn so vigorously when they were in opposition. I could not help being very much amused the other day at the meek and quiet way in which my hon. friends the Secretary of State and the hon. member for Halifax discussed this matter. I think I would hear them multiplying adjectives in such number that the English language would hardly be sufficient to supply them if this bill had been introduced under the Conservative regime. We have had them here for many years and know what they have done, and I defy any man in this House to show me one solitary instance where these two hon. gentlemen joined in supporting the government in any measure, whether it was right or wrong, during the time they were in opposition. Still they say to us now, "You must not interfere with this measure, because the Lower House have expressed their approval by a very large vote." If the opposition were wrong then, certainly they must be right now, because they take a different course. They say now, as long as the Lower House assents to it we are obliged to do it, and therefore we may as well do it with a good grace. But under their former principles they would fight it to the death. It would be difficult to imagine the language those hon. gentlemen would use in denunciation of the Conservative party and anything proposed by them. They have turned round, changed their course and are as meek as doves.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Well, you change yourself.

Hon Mr. CLEMOW—I will not change myself. You could not change me. I am a Conservative from the word "go" to the present time, and will be till I die.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You are in opposition.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not care about that. It makes no difference to me whether a Conservative or a Liberal government are in power, as long as they discharge their duty for the benefit of the country. But I do not like to hear such epithets as were applied to hon. gentlemen by the hon. Secretary of State, when he accused us of forming an opinion on this matter before we heard the evidence. He ought to have known better. He was a Conservative one time and he ought to have known that the Conservative party consisted of hon. gentlemen who would not act in that unbecoming manner; and I think it was out of place to try and inflict such an act of injustice on the Conservative party in this country. I do not wish to occupy your time; I know that you are tired of this debate. You know all the circumstances, and you know whether, as honest business men, you can record your votes in favour of carrying out a proposition which I think is most disastrous to the future interests of the country. I do not go round and ask men whether they will do this or that. I merely ask you to vote according to what you conscientiously believe is for the advantage of our country. I see a great many scraps in the newspapers abusing and vilifying the Senate. I do not care what they say about me, as long as I am satisfied I am right and feel in my conscience that I am doing what I ought to do. They say they are going to bribe us. I do not think enough money has been coined in this country yet to bribe one man in this Senate, and it would require very strong evidence to make me believe any such thing. I do not think it is right for the Liberal party to continue heaping abuse upon a body of men who do not want to injure them, but who merely want to do their duty, and who will take the responsibility for their acts upon themselves and allow the gentlemen in the other House to bear the responsibility which falls upon them. Whatever may be the verdict in this case, I know and believe firmly that if the Conservative party desired to make political capital out of this matter which is now engaging the attention of the country, they would have allowed this bill to pass. But would we be doing our duty to ourselves and to our country to try and get the advantage at the next election? No; and therefore we have taken an independent course and I think it is the course that will be endorsed by the electorate of the country. If the bill is lost let them go to the country upon that deal, and if the country sustain them, of course the Senate will pass the bill, although in England one appeal has not been always sufficient. But let them go to the people, and they ought to have confidence in this country, because it is not very long since they succeeded in getting a majority. Whether they have a majority of the people in their favour yet I do not know, but depend upon it, a day of reckoning will come. I have heard a great deal about the value of that country, and among several scraps I have there is one here from England which is, I believe, the production of Mr. Ogilvie:

At Mr. Woodruff's lecture on the "Klondike Gold Fields," at Point St. Charles, on Friday, March 25, Mr. Woodruff quoted Mr. Ogilvie's words thus: Now, for my part, I think it is our duty as Canadians, to sink all political differences—to let the fire of patriotism consume all feelings that would tend to retard the acquisition of this most desirable line as an all-Canadian route to the Yukon, (applause), so that we may enjoy as far as possible the benefits that region will bring, if we use our rights wisely and well. In conclusion, let me say that we have in that far north land, a vast region, comprising some 90,000 to 100,000 square miles of untold possibilities, which with proper care, judicious handling, and better facilities for the transportation of food and utensils, will be the largest as it is the richest gold field the world has ever known. Rich deposits we know exist in it, and for aught we know, many more equally rich will yet be found. We know that there is sufficient to supply a population of a hundred thousand people, and I look forward to seeing that number of people in that country within the next ten years. It is a vast inheritance. Let us use it as becomes Canadians, intelligently, liberally, and in the best way to advance our country, Canada. Let us use it as becomes the offspring of the 'Mother of Nations,' (great applause).

Mr. Woodruff will leave for Quebec this evening.

I think if this matter had gone through some time ago we would have had other opinions from England of a similar character. Possibly, I do not know, I may be doing the gentleman an injustice for saying that he might have been the prime mover in booming the scheme in the English market for the benefit of Mackenzie and Mann. I do not blame Mackenzie and Mann for making the best bargain they can; that is human nature. Unfortunately others did not get the chance, therefore as public men we are called upon to decide this question one way or another—we ought to look into all these circumstances and matters and decide accordingly. My mind is made up, as you may imagine, to vote for the six months' hoist, and I think by taking that course I am doing a substantial good to the country. I ask the hon. gentlemen upon the Treasury benches if, with the experience of to-day, they would undertake the same kind of an arrangement that they made six weeks ago? Would they do it to-day? Is their opinion changed to-day, that they can get other men to do this work? Don't they know now from experience that they could get men to undertake this work for a mere trifle? I believe there are hundreds of men in England who would have built that tramway for the advantage of working the railway for ten years. I may be right or wrong? I merely say, give them a chance. Let them know that such a project is at their disposal and then we can see the result. As this question is one of such vast importance, I thought I was doing my duty to myself and the people whom I am supposed to represent, in placing my views before the House. I am in a position to say that the great majority of the constituents whom I have the honour to represent are certainly in accord with the opinions I have expressed. I have met men from all parts of the country, and they have unanimously expressed the opinion that this contract was one that should not receive the assent of parliament. The future will decide if I am right. If the Senate are right in rejecting this measure, they will have the glorious satisfaction of showing to the people of this country that they have been the means of saving them hundreds of millions of dollars. Hon. gentlemen will remember the attitude we assumed in reference to the Drummond County Railway bill. Our action in that matter has had the effect of reducing the grant which would otherwise have been paid for that work. According to the report sent to me, I find that the price of that road has been lessened to the extent of $600,000. I hope in this case our action will have a similar effect, and that we will have the proud satisfaction of knowing, in future days, that the Senate has performed a noble duty, for which we will receive the thanks of the community at large. We will feel satisfied that we have been the means of preventing a gross injustice. I do not say that it is an intentional injustice, and I do not impute corrupt or improper motives, but a man is just as guilty, if he does a thing rashly and without due consideration, as he is if he acts from improper motives. I believe the argument against this measure is stronger without any such imputations. By rejecting this measure, we will show the country that the Senate is not as useless a body as some people suppose, but really is the watch dog for the Dominion. We have been told that we are a lot of old women, and that we exercise no influence in the country. It was suggested that if some young men were introduced into the Senate, it would have the effect of reforming this body to a certain extent. I am glad that they are coming here to replace us, because we cannot live much longer, and we want the young generation to take our places, and the sooner we make way for them the better. Let the young men take advice from the old men as long as they live, and after they die, the young men can do for themselves. With a country as prosperous as Canada is, and so likely to continue prosperous, I see a great future in store for us. But we cannot afford to lose anything that may be of advantage and material benefit to the country. We have been in the past rather too careless as to our natural resources. I refer very largely to the article of timber. We had too much; we did not appreciate it, and gave away a great deal without receiving compensation for it. If we had, at the present time, the timber which has been destroyed by fire, and in other ways, we would have sufficient capital to pay our national debt. I hope we will not take the same course with respect to our minerals that we took in regard to our timber. Let us take care of our mineral lands and endeavour to make them more valuable, and realize the last cent that can be obtained from them.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE moved that the debate be adjourned, and that it be the first Order of the Day to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 30th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (I) "An Act to incorporate the Klondike and Peace River Railway Company."—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Bill (J) "An Act to incorporate the Lake Superior and Rocky Mountains Navigation Company."—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

CORRESPONDENCE WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

MOTION POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) rose to move:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all correspondence and memorials from the members of the provincial government of Prince Edward Island who composed the recent delegation from that province; and will inquire what action the Federal government has taken in response to such applications?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I hope my hon. friend will let that motion stand. There is a memorandum of the claims of Prince Edward Island with the government, but the government have not dealt with it or considered it yet, and it is unusual to bring down an uncompleted correspondence, or a correspondence relating to a matter which has not been finally disposed of, and I hope my hon. friend will not press his motion to-day.

The motion was allowed to stand.

CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

The Order of the Day being called,—

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the second reading (Bill 6) "An Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company;" and the motion in amendment of the Hon. Mr. Macdonald (B.C.), that the said bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE said: We have heard a great deal about the vexed question before the House. We have heard none too much. A great deal of time has been expended in investigating this matter both in the lower House and in this House. That time has not been needlessly or uselessly expended, because if there ever was a measure that demanded the strictest scrutiny and investigation before any parliament in the world, this is the measure. We have had many excellent speeches in both Houses of parliament, in this House, notably the eloquent, able, exhaustive, statesmanlike speech of my hon. friend the member for Richmond (Mr. Miller), after the delivery of which I felt like saying on behalf of those who should succeed him in the debate, as was said once of old, "What shall the man do that cometh after the king." I shall take the liberty of comparing the treatment which has been accorded to this measure in both Houses with the treatment accorded to a patient placed under the operation of the keen Roentgen rays. Light has been let into the internal economy of this matter. Its internal economy has been pretty fairly exposed, and many dark spots have been located; but I fear me there are some dark recesses into which no Roentgen rays and no light will ever find access. In the few remarks—I say few because that is my intention, although I may not be able to carry out the intention—in the remarks I propose to offer to the House I shall direct attention only to a few of the more objectionable points, to my mind, embraced in this measure. And it does appear to me that these points are about as numerous and as thickly set as are the "quills upon the fretful porcupine," and, judging from their demeanour, it strikes me that the sponsors in this House of this precious bantling of the Minister of the Interior experienced just about as much pleasure in the handling of it as they would in handling that rather objectionable and refractory animal to which I have alluded. In either case it strikes me that the sensations of pleasure would be about as much as could be expected under the circumstances. Now, one of the things to which I object in this measure is this: It has often been spoken of, but it cannot be too much emphasized—it is the secrecy of the matter. I say it is a bird of evil omen. Its incubation was in secret, and the circumstances surrounding that initial process of its life were ominous of evil. It was hatched in secret, even in its pin-feather stage it was a bird of evil omen, and now that it has attained full plumage, it is a bird of evil omen still, and malodorous as ever. Why was this not open to public tender? It is a false assertion to say that the hon. Minister of the Interior was not perfectly cognizant of the fact that there were many people who would have been very willing to have tendered for this work, and it is useless to say that the offer that was subsequently made by Hamilton Smith, was rendered nugatory, or that the man was not sincere, inasmuch as the offer was made after the contract was let. I say that goes without saying. Who can tell what offer might have been received if this had been open to public tender. Mr. Smith was a man of large experience; he was a man of wealth; he represented capital in abundance; he himself had been on that ground and had large parties of men prospecting, and he knew just exactly what he was doing and what he was saying when, in that subsequent offer—which if we may call it an offer—he gave the Minister of the Interior to understand that for one-quarter of that enormous grant of gold-bearing lands of Canada he was willing to have undertaken the contract, and that without the monopoly clause. Then, again, the contract was concluded within eight days of the meeting of parliament, and this has been characterized as indecent haste. I submit, hon. gentlemen, whether it did not merit that characterization under the circumstances—within eight days of the meeting of parliament when the people's representatives would have been assembled, and when the matter could have been placed before them and had the exercise of their discretion and judgment upon it. It was an easy matter for the government to have called parliament one, two or three weeks earlier than they did. Urgency has been pleaded for the contract. Well, the Minister of Railways knew in July last, before the House rose, of the Yukon conditions; and he should then have asked for power to have dealt with them, which, no doubt, would have been accorded. Engineer Jennings commenced his work on the Stikine River on the 25th September, which means, counting from the date of the prorogation of parliament, that there were three months lost in which work might have been done. On the 25th October the engineer completed his work and the minister was put in possession of all the facts. The contract was not let until the 28th January. There was then an opportunity for putting the matter up for tender if they so desired. Now, it appears to me evident that the conclusion that must be drawn from this method of procedure is one that cannot be avoided, that no intelligent man, or body of men, can arrive at any other finding than that it was a foregone conclusion with the Minister of the Interior that Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie were the only one within the bounds of Canada who would be permitted to get this rich plum. Now, I will treat, for a very short time, of the difficulties of navigation. The Stikine River is open, as we have repeatedly heard, for only five months in the year. There are shallows and rapids in this river, as also in the Hootalinqua, and I was present in the other House on an occasion when the member for Westmoreland, N.B., brought to the notice of the House a matter connected with the practical use by steamboat of this river which had not been touched upon by any other member who spoke, nor has it been in this House. Any one who is familiar with steamboat navigation at all will at once realize what it means to navigate a steamer, even a powerful steamer, against an eight-knot current. Now, according to my reading of Mr. Jennings's and Mr. St. Cyr's report there are places on that river where it is exceedingly narrow and there are very sudden bends. Suppose a steamer comes to this sudden bend in the river where an eight-knot current is running, what happens? Her bow is struck on the starboard or port side by the eight-knot current and before she can help herself she will be driven across on the rocks on the other side of the river. And then there is another thing. It would be a necessity for steamers going up the river, in some places where the riffles are, and broken water, that steam winches and ropes would have to be used from the steamer to the shore. Can much progress be made in that way? I think not. I have in my hand some other papers which carry with them considerable authority, which I think the House will be ready to acknowledge and appreciate when I read them. I read first from Judge Creasy's report when trying a certain case before him in which he uses this language :

And here it may just be cited that there are occasions when only canoes can be used up and down such a swift river as the Stikine.

12th May, 1875.

SIR,—I beg to inform you that I arrived here yesterday, seven days from Wrangel. The river not being thoroughly opened, I had a fearful time of it, in many places it was blocked twenty feet high with ice, and the snow on the banks from one to seven feet deep. I have pitched my tent in a well sheltered beach about one mile below the ice mount and about forty miles from Wrangel. * * * There has been only two canoe loads of passengers and the express canoe gone up as yet.

I am, &c.,
R. HUNTER.

Subsequently we have from the same gentleman, when he became a member of the provincial parliament, the following communication dated the 7th March, 1898 :—

The members of the House had all heard of the agreement which had been entered into by the Dominion government in the building of a railway from Glenora and Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake. The disadvantage of this route was that the Stikine River was not suitable for a large commerce. Near its mouth the river was frozen in the winter time, was subject to freshets in the rainy season and too low for navigation in the dry season. For these reasons it was absolutely necessary to have some other connection with the railway than was afforded by the Stikine River.

I may say that I am well assured that if the obnoxious land grant and monopoly clauses were removed I, and the members of the opposition generally, would support any reasonable proposition for a road to the Yukon gold fields, starting at any point and by any route after a careful survey has been made. We all heard what was said yesterday by my hon. friend the member from New Westminster during the course of his debate. I read now from the daily Times of which he is the manager. The extract is dated March 17th, 1898. I wish the hon. gentlemen of this chamber to notice how the extracts which I now read will compare with what was said by the hon. member from New Westminster last evening. The Times says :

THE STIKINE ROUTE.

Overwhelming evidence is now forward to prove that for the present the Stikine route is unavailable for traffic of any kind. It is, therefore, the bounden duty of Victorians to warn all miners and prospectors outfitting here that they cannot go in to the Klondike via the Stikine route until the middle or end of April. In our local columns detailed descriptions of the condition of affairs on that river have appeared, and it is needless here to repeat them. The travellers whom the Times reporters have interviewed on the subject are men whose word can be trusted, but if there was a shadow of doubt upon the veracity of those gentlemen all dubiety in the matter vanishes in the face of the very significant fact that among those to return to Victoria, baffled in the attempt to ascend the Stikine, is Hon. Edgar Dewdney, one of the directors of the Klondike Mining, Trading and Transportation Company. With his mules, and his asses, and his oxen, his men-servants and his maid-servants returned he hither, convinced that by way of the Stikine no man can reach Dawson City, at least for the present. This fact should set at rest all doubts as to the reports regarding the impracticability of the Stikine until the ice departs.

It is the worst policy at any time and in any case to conceal or colour facts ; such attempts as are now being made by the Colonist to conceal and colour the facts regarding the Stikine route are both foolish and wicked. Foolish, for the reason that whereas part of the people now know some of the facts, very shortly all the people will know all the facts, and the Colonist will stand convicted of deliberate falsehood. Wicked because many of those outfitting here rely upon the statements made in the daily press to guide them ; and to send men to such a God-forsaken rat-hole as Fort Wrangel, when they might live here comfortably and inexpensively until the ice breaks on the Stikine, is downright cruelty.

The Times has not hesitated in the matter. We believe the best thing that can be done for Victoria is to publish at once the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and if possible prevent the men now here going to Wrangel.

The Secretary of State seems to be immensely amused. If he can controvert this it is all right. I have cited the authorities and that is sufficient. About that meeting in room No. 8, with Mr. Livernash and his associates, I should like to know why it is that the hon. gentlemen who have devoted so much time to the consideration of Mr. Livernash's references have singled him out of the three delegates who came here. I was present in room No. 8. I think I know, and can appreciate when I hear it, an intelligent and skilful statement of circumstances at any time, and I am free to say that I never heard a clearer exposition of any set of facts than was produced before that assemblage of senators in room No. 8 by Mr. Livernash. It is true that he was a United States citizen. He told us that he was of Canadian parentage. He told us all about his connection with the press. He told us of his interests in Canada, and that his principal interests were now in Canada. The statement which that gentleman made in regard to the difficulties which beset this scheme, were made so plainly that he that runneth might read, and they were endorsed by the other two members of the delegation. These gentlemen who have been so pronounced in their condemnation of Mr. Livernash have said nothing about the other two gentlemen. One of them was a Dr. Wills, formerly connected with the Mounted Police of Canada, and the other one was a French Canadian representing French Canadian interests in this delegation. These delegates came here accredited men. There is no doubt about that. They told us how they were appointed, and they were very frank indeed. Mr. Livernash said he wanted to have nothing to do with politics and to have nothing to say about politics. He stated the situation in the Yukon, and he showed us how undesirable that situation was and how impracticable the route was. I was very much amused at my hon. friend the Secretary of State. Whenever Mr. Livernash's name was mentioned he said: "Oh, that is from Washington." Knowing the proclivities of the government which the hon. gentleman represents in this House, I should have thought that anything emanating from Washington, anything having the flavour of Washington about it would be as agreeable to his nostrils as the flavour of a savoury meal to a famishing man. These gentlemen cannot minimize or lessen the effect of the information that was given to this honourable House by that gentleman and his associates. Now, I want to make a contrast. There was placed upon our desks in the first instance a sheet like this in my hand, subscribed by somebody, I forget the initials, Slavin, and there was also placed upon our desks another one, which is here signed J. W. O'Brien. I should very much like to know at whose instance these were placed there.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Who paid for the printing?

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I think it is imposing rather too much on the credulity of the intelligent men of this House to wish to convey to us the impression, to have us assume that these things were put here on the individual motion of these men. I for one do not believe it. One of them, as has been said and as we all know, is a pugilist, the other is a rum seller—a pugilist and a rum seller, "par nobile fratrum," a noble pair of brothers! the proteges of the government, and I wish them joy of their associates. I think the government must have been reduced to very great straits indeed. They must have realized that they were in great straits when they had to resort to such means to save this bill. Then comes the question of the difficulty which these men, reputable men, neither pugilists nor rum sellers, who came here as the endorsed representatives of at least 2,500 of the miners in the Yukon gold country, experienced in getting an interview with the Minister of the Interior, the parent of the precious progeny which we have been dealing with. They were here for five weeks, or nearly so, before they got an interview, and then it was not an interview with the Minister of the Interior; it was an interview with the general cabinet. Now, is this Canada or is it Russia? Does the Minister of the Interior think that the men that those gentlemen represent are serfs, as the Russians are serfs. He himself has exhibited, in his action in this respect a good deal of the czarlike spirit and policy, but he has made an infinite mistake if he thinks that that kind of thing will go down in Canada. As a Liberal-Conservative, I hope the government will give him a free hand, it will bring the deluge all the sooner. I say that this is a most iniquitous allotment such an enormous land grant on the base line principle. This was very clearly brought before us, and strongly accentuated by Mr. Livernash, when he said that these gentlemen could, by this system of allotting the land on base lines, secure all the gold lands in that country. I do not know anything that would better characterize this allotment affair than comparing Mackenzie & Mann (and I do not want to say anything derogatory to their dignity when I mention it) to that dread denizen of the sea—the octopus, which, with its deadly tentacles, grasps everything within its reach; and the miners to the poor mariner when that devil fish of the ocean has him in his arms,—and there is no salvation from any quarter. Another serious objection that I have to the bill is the monopoly feature. How under God's heaven men of intelligence can say that there is no monopoly in this is more than I have the intelligence to understand. I do not wish to take time to refer to the agreement which I have under my hand, but how any man can say that under that contract there is no monopoly is more than I can make out. Look at the time given for the selection of 6,000 miles of the richest mineral lands in the country —not merely the gold, but all other metals (and who can tell what they may cover) and the timber, which is such a very essential factor in the success of mining there. In fact, the miners cannot get on without the use of timber and in that regard they will be completely in the hands of the contractors. Now, I am going to make a little divergence here. I want to refer to the characteristic wavering, uncertain, undecided, never-know-what-to-do policy of the government. In illustration of that I want to speak for a moment or two of the premier's treatment of that telegram of his which he sent to Lord Strathcona. When asked by the leader of the opposition to produce the telegram he at once acceded to the request in his usual gentlemanly manner, "Certainly, I will bring it down to-morrow." Twenty-four hours after, when asked to produce it, he said, "No, I cannot produce that telegram; it is private." It reminded me of a verse that I saw a little while ago. Some of the words might be construed as rather profane, but they might fairly be associated with the conduct of the premier, and as the literal meaning of the word implies total loss, it may have some significancy in regard to his government's tenure of power:

He can if he will, he will if he won't,
He'll be damned if he does, he'll be damned if he don't.

To revert again to the objectionable features of this bill, it has been asserted over and over again that it is not possible to transfer this charter to a foreign company, that there is a provision to prevent it. I cannot see that. It is true that it is provided in the agreement that a certain number of the directors shall be of British origin or British subjects. That, to my mind, does not exclude the possibility of transference to a foreign company. Then, again, there are the freight rates. There is no specification as to what they shall be, but I notice there is to be a reduction of 25 per cent in the rates after the lapse of five years, and another reduction of 25 per cent after another term of years, and then the rates come under the general railway law of the country, so that the first rates must be very high. No provision is made for the steamboat freight rates, which are a very material matter indeed in this contract. A friend made a suggestion to me the other day—I merely cite the suggestion for the consideration of the government—that the government might sell the lands by the acre at, say, $25 or $30 an acre. The public will readily buy the scrip. At these prices, four million acres would yield one hundred millions of dollars or enough to build a railway from Montreal to Dawson City and pay for the Georgian Bay Canal as well, and with the balance of the land we could pay off the national debt. Before I resume my seat I wish to refer for a few minutes to an incident which occurred in another place a short time ago. I am jealous for the honour of this House with a great jealousy.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I hear my hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax, say in his dulcet tones, "Hear, hear." I would have been under a deep debt of obligation to him if he had accorded me that emphatic "hear, hear," to some of my other utterances a little earlier, or even if he will do it a little later I shall be obliged to him.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman will not allow me even to applaud.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I daresay what I am saying is not agreeable to the hon. gentleman, but I am not responsible for his feelings. I wish to allude to a circumstance which occurred in another place. I repeat I am jealous for the honour of this House, and I, in common with my fellow members, feel aggrieved when the press, representing either of the two great political parties into which this country is divided, attempts either by the exercise of cajolery or by the issuance of threats, to influence the action of this honourable House in the discharge of its grave and responsible duties. I say, without fear of contradiction, that every time the press does so, it oversteps entirely the bounds of its legitimate sphere. Let me give you some illustrations. I quote from La Patrie, of March 23rd, and I commend this to the attention of this honourable House :

> Senator Macdonald yesterday proposed the interment of the Yukon Bill.
> Then it is understood Toryism wishes to prevent the Liberal party from governing; Toryism wishes to prevent the cabinet and the Commons from directing public affairs.
> Let the cripples and the irresponsibles of the Upper Chamber have their way to their hearts' content; their arbitrary and capricious reign will be of short duration.
> Sir Wilfrid Laurier, his colleagues, his supporters, all of them the outcome of the electoral suffrage, represent the people. The Millers, the Kirchhoffers, the Macdonalds, the Bowells and the other invalids of the Senate are mere individuals, representing nothing but their own impotence and their own spitefulness. We will not allow our responsible system to be smashed by maddened Toryism: we shall not allow men driven from power by the people to crush us. We are in power to govern, and we shall govern.
> It was to Laurier, it was to our eminent compatriot, that the Canadian people confided the direction of their affairs at the election of the 23rd June. It was not to Bowell, it was not to Tupper.
> The senators, it is now evident, are about to throw out the contract for the railway from Glenora to Teslin Lake; but we will have our turn. Let our friends have confidence in the energy and patriotism of the chiefs of the Liberal party.

Now, if I were to characterize this as it deserves to be characterized, I would say that for unadulterated blackguardism, the vernacular of Billingsgate will pale in comparison with this precious extract.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What paper is that from ?

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—That is from La Patrie, the government organ.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The government have no organ.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Well, Mr. Tarte is an organ of the government, at least he stands so much towards the government in the capacity of an organ that he makes them dance to his music whenever he chooses ; then La Patrie is Mr. Tarte's organ, and so the direct line of descent is clearly established. The editor of La Patrie has a bad attack of mal-de-tête, and it seems to be aggravated by an extra inoculation of political virus, which has upset its entire constitution, and his friends ought to look after him, or he may become a candidate for a lunatic asylum.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—He is full of microbes.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—As a sample of the alleged incompetency of this House, I wish to give the following in connection with the Drummond County affair :

The old contract was an annuity for ninety-nine years of $64,000, which, capitalized at three per cent, would give, say $2,100,000. Under the new contract for the completed road the cost is $1,600,000. The difference between these two amounts is $500,000, being the amount saved to the country on this count by the action of the Senate. Besides this, the new contract provides that the company is to do about $65,000 more work than the old, which is a saving of expenditure which, otherwise, the government would have to have made. This, added to the $500,000, makes $565,000. Now, take the Grand Trunk portion.

1st. On all betterments under the old contract, including double-tracking of thirty-five miles of track from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, the government was to pay five per cent interest for all time on half cost. Under the new arrangement (if carried) the government is only to pay four per cent interest on the portion of cost which the government uses bears to total uses.

2nd. The government, instead of paying above interest at four per cent, has the option of capitalizing in commuting annual interest on a four per cent basis. As the government can borrow money at two and three-quarter per cent, if betterments came in all to $1,000,000, which is a low estimate, there would be a saving of at least $200,000 here.

3rd. The Grand Trunk Railway is to allow the Intercolonial Railway all the through traffic from Montreal and points west, or from all points on the Grand Trunk Railway for points on Intercolonial Railway, i.e., through freight, which virtually means closing their lines from Richmond Junction to Lévis, as far as competition with the Intercolonial Railway goes. I have no data by which to estimate the value of this, but we can safely say that this "arbitrary, invalid, incompetent, crippled Tory Senate" has saved to the country, on this Drummond Railway matter alone, at least a million of dollars, and this is not by any means the only instance of that kind.

Hon Mr. DEVER—The hon. gentleman has not read the other side.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is nothing on the other side.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I have overlooked, in speaking of this matter, one utterance of the editor of La Patrie, as to the Liberal party being the elect of the people and as to their policy being approved by the people. We have had some striking evidence that a change has come over the spirit of the dream of some Canadian voters as evidenced by the result of the recent election in Ontario. Is it possible that the editor of La Patrie cannot read the handwriting on the wall? If that is the case, let the government go to the people, and they will find in that people a Daniel that will very soon interpret it for them unmistakably. Coming back to where I was when I made this divergence, I was speaking of an incident that transpired in another place. If these utterances of the press—such utterances as I have quoted—entirely overstepped the bounds of the legitimate sphere of the press in this matter, what shall be said of the man who, occupying the honourable and responsible position of minister of the Crown, has so little apprehension of the requirements of his own high office, or of the quality and bearing which should characterize its incumbent as from his place in parliament, when discussing a matter in which the interests of Canada were deeply involved, to formulate threats as to what would happen if this honourable house refused, at his dictation, to abdicate its judicial functions, or should, in the legitimate exercise of those functions, prefer to follow a course of conduct dictated by its own judgment rather than that dictated by a minister of the Crown. There is only one fitting and proper characterization of that gentleman's conduct, and that is, to brand it not only as betraying a lamentable ignorance of the situation, but as a palpable infraction of all parliamentary rules and etiquette. I would be abundantly justified in using much stronger language, but I content myself meantime by characterizing it as I have done as a palpable breach of all parliamentary rule and etiquette, pardonable only, if pardonable at all, on the theory that the hon. gentleman in his present position, represents, in some respects at least, an inexperienced mariner navigating for the first time unaccustomed waters, who has not yet quite taken his soundings or ascertained with any degree of definiteness his longitude and his latitude. I indulge the hope, hon. gentlemen, that this honourable House, untrammelled as it is by the clamour of any constituency, unheeding the urgings of impassioned partyism, uninfluenced by the pronouncements of the press of either party, or even by the dicta of either fledgling or full-plumed ministers of the Crown, will vindicate its position in the constitution of this country and assert its right to condemn unreservedly, this or any other measure which, in their judgment, is pernicious or does harm or evil to our country, this Canada which we love so dearly, and which we should all like to see attain and hold that position which is her manifest destiny, if only—and I wish to emphasize that proviso with all the strength I have—if only she has and keeps at the helm of state, wise and competent steersmen, a foremost place among the nations of the world. I have only to say, in conclusion, that it is not necessary for me to inform you, after these utterances, that it is my intention to vote against the bill, and thus I hope to add my little mite to another signal service rendered by this Senate to Canada, and one that shall be for ever memorable in her annals.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—At this eleventh hour, I have no intention of saying anything, and I do not rise for the purpose of adding anything to the information which hon. gentlemen already possess, which is very limited, and very meagre indeed. My object is simply to give expression to the faith that is in me, for the reason that the constituency which I have the honour to represent is represented in the House of Commons by a very able man, a friend of mine, a Liberal, and represented in the Local House by a Cabinet Minister, the Hon. Mr. Harty. Therefore, I say that, at this very late hour, it would be absurd that the historical city of Kingston should not give utterance to its feelings on this occasion. We do not hear of the Yukon for the first time. Twenty-six years ago, on the 2nd May, the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald delivered a very able and exhaustive speech on the Washington treaty, in the course of which, when a great outcry was made against the free navigation of the St. Lawrence, he referred to the Yukon and Stikine Rivers. In reply to the ironical "hear, hear," of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, the hon. gentleman said that there was even then a large trade on that river. At that time very little attention was paid to these rivers, and it is extraordinary that now their names fill the whole world, and if it is permitted for the shades of the saints to look down on sub-lunary matters, I can imagine how the right hon. gentleman would look down on this occasion and smile, that is, if saints are permitted to indulge in that very human practice. There are three points which seem to me to urge themselves on the attention of any on considering this bill, and I must say I heard with a great deal of regret the hon. gentleman from de Lorimier trying to assert that this Senate had traditions by which it was bound that the political allegiance that any gentleman had there was transferred when he came here, to his senatorship. Now, such is not the case, the history of the Senate shows it; and although we are not responsible directly to the people, still we are responsible to the country, and above all responsible to conscience. We are responsible to the inate feeling which every one has of doing what is right and what is just, and I trust that will always be sufficient to account for the deviation which we may have to make from the House of Commons; it is a painful thing to oppose the will of that House in any way. Any hon. gentleman here must feel that it is a most disagreeable thing for him; and only the strongest sense of duty and the strongest idea of what is right would urge him on to take such a stand, particularly when he happens to be himself politically opposed to the party which governs the country. There was no such feeling at the time of the Queen's Jubilee, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was the central figure; no Conservative uttered a word disparagingly about his honours. On the contrary, the Conservatives joined in the general acclaim and tried to assert themselves as Canadians, as we do on this occasion, and to do what is proper and right. There are, as I said, three points which occur to any one in considering this question. They are the three R's: the road, the route and the remuneration. As to the road, I do not agree, but I do not pretend to set my opinion up against the ministers of the government, fortified as they must have been by engineers, by the best talent which I have no doubt they could obtain. I think that if a trunk line was built, instead of this narrow gauge, by the government, and carried on by them fairly and honestly, this Senate would not hesitate for a moment to vote what they require. I will tell you why. It is asserted that they give away the cream of this country to these gentlemen—because there is no doubt they do give away the cream of the country—they give these people the right to select these claims in any place they wish, and after they do that, what will be left to those who come after them? How shall they build and throw the onus on the country itself when the best part of that country is given away? That I would like to know. There is no one who will take a contract to build a larger road through greater difficulties if these gentlemen have the pick and cream of the whole affair. Therefore, I object entirely to the route. There is no reason why the government should not manage and run a road. We have had experience of government ownership on the Intercolonial Railway. It may not be of the most agreeable nature, but at the same time it is possible, and I have no doubt that that road, under proper management, may yet be made to pay. On the continent of Europe we have countries running roads and there is no reason why the government of this country should not run and manage its road, and let the profit of this road, instead of going to private individuals and into companies, go into the government and to the people. Therefore, I object to it on that point. If it were part of a scheme to carry the road from the points that were named, I have no objection to that. Then, again, as to the route. Looking over the map of that country, and glancing along the difficulties that lie in the way, I put aside anything like Edmonton and Prince Albert, for the simple reason that this is a case of urgency. I admit that it is a case of urgency. The whole outcry of the people of this country was to try and get into that country as easily and as expeditiously and as cheaply as possible; and, therefore, urged by that cry, the government had to select what they considered the best way. Casting one eye over the map, you can see no better way in which this want can be filled than by taking the route which they did, and, therefore, I have nothing to say against that. The worst of all is the remuneration, and this I confess is the only point on which I disagree with the government and with the party in power. The remuneration which is offered to these gentlemen, who are the contractors, and whom every one has been loud in praises of, and against whom I have nothing to say. They are men of whom Canadians are proud, who have raised themselves to the position in which they are; and probably no gentlemen in this country are better able to carry on that road if the road is to be built than they. But I contend the remuneration is out of all proportion to what is required. I am not going to say anything about what they might do—what people might do is not to be talked of—it is this fact that I look on now, and that is that a large number of people have been thrown into that country and those people are not treated with fair play. The idea of giving these gentlemen millions of acres of land and then limiting a miner to 200 feet is something extraordinary. It reminds me of the story Sir John Macdonald used to tell of a Jew who, going into a shop in the rain, happened being very hungry, to take a piece of pork, and just at the time he took this piece of pork a terrible thunder clap came, and the Jew said: "What a terrible row you are making about a little bit of pork." Now, the strict regulation confining miners to the very small amount of land you are giving, is very extraordinary as compared with the vast amount that it is proposed to give to these gentlemen. If the government would modify their proposition with regard to that, if they would not freeze out of this frozen country all the men who have gone there through such great tribulations, I would not have so much animosity against this bill; but they are taking away even the very wood without which they cannot carry on their mines. The mining in that country must be on the surface of the soil; the surface must be heated; eternal frost prevails to the depth of sixty feet. The only way to thaw that out, so far as we know at present—science may devise some other way in the future—is by burning the wood which is in the neighbourhood on the banks of the rivers, and the bill gives these contractors the right to all that wood. Not only that, but taking the man with his claim of 200 feet who happens to go in there, and is perhaps at the extremity of his means, perhaps all his hopes are about to be dashed to pieces—when these gentlemen finally finish him up by saying: "You cannot touch this wood; it belongs to us," and the miner cannot get out of it. They receive these lands in fee simple, and fee simple gives them absolute power and control of it for ever, and all that is contained thereon, so that there is no possibility of any man who may be prospecting there, and who may have secured a claim, to enjoy the fruits of his labour. That, I think, should be provided against. There is no provision for it in the bill. Why limit men to 200 feet in this vast extent of country. Give them all the feet they want, give them 500 or 1000, or whatever amount is wanted. I think it will be forced on the conscience of the government and on the hon. leader of the House that the difficulties are so great in the way of settlers going in there, and the extraordinary difficulties they have to overcome, that he will see that it is necessary to remove this bill for the present and substitute for it—if they intend to substitute anything—something which will be more honourable and impartial, and which will give the people of this country a chance to possess the inheritance that God has placed in their hands. I thought I would just mention that as my particular reason for voting against the bill. I do so with extreme reluctance, as I think the Senate ought to try to assist the administration in governing this country. They are entitled to every consideration, and when any one thinks that the members of this House are swayed by the principles they may have had in former times in casting their votes in this chamber, they are terribly mistaken.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I desire to say a word on this important occasion. I have come to the conclusion that the Senate of Canada is at one of its most important epochs. Hon. gentlemen know that much has been said about the Senate of Canada, but, in my humble opinion, we will be for ever doing our duty on great questions of this kind. This is the most important question that has ever presented itself before our country. It is the greatest question that has ever come before the Senate of Canada, and what is it? It is the biggest steal that was ever attempted to be forced upon the people of Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I wish hon. gentlemen not to forget that I am a Liberal by nature and by force of the circumstances of my whole life, but as a Liberal I am against the Liberal who forgets his principles. I am with the Liberals, and will be with them as long as I live, but this is the worst deal that I have ever known in my life. We know that the Senate of Canada is an honour to this country, and will be an honour for ever. I see some of my old friends around me, and I stand up for the honour of this Senate. I am in earnest. There is no Irishman in the whole world more in earnest than I am in the interest of my country, Canada. Where is that interest more thoroughly fixed at the present time than it is in the hon. gentlemen composing this House? I am one of those. I love this Senate. Sir Oliver Mowat said he loved it and that he hoped he would die here, but Sir Oliver preferred dying at home. But now there is a question before us and we are called upon as senators to deal with it. No question has ever been raised in the whole world equal to the measure before us, and the senators with their grand old heads will have to pass upon it. And what do my friends say? What does the hon. Secretary of State say about this? He says this whole land is no good. Did you ever hear of a man that had anything to sell depreciate its value? My hon. friend the Secretary of State disparaged the Klondike in strong terms. Is that the way a man does when he is transferring something he is selling? Does he say it is no good? That is what my hon. friend the Secretary of State has done, and I say he has gone all wrong, because we are giving this country away and my hon. friend the Secretary of State says it is no good. Should he not rather say a word in favour of it? Common sense should indicate to us that this is one of the worst deals that ever was made in this world. It is a steal from beginning to end. I do not say one word against the government of Canada, and I am going to stand by them, but this is the worst deal that was ever made in the world.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—At this late period in the debate I feel that anything I could say will not add to what has already been said respecting the bill now under consideration. I feel at the same time that each one of us should give expression to the views he holds respecting this matter, and the views of those who have opposed the bill have been so well and clearly expressed already that it is impossible for me to add anything to them. Therefore, in anything that I may say I shall deal very briefly indeed with the matter. To my mind it appears that the amount of land we are giving in consideration of this small bit of road is entirely out of proportion to the value that we receive for it, a piece of road 150 miles long, and 600 miles from the objective point we intend to reach, a road of three feet gauge which cannot cost a great deal of money. In this country it could be built, stocked and fitted out with all the appliances for running for from eight to ten thousand dollars a mile. Of course, in that country it will cost more, but to imagine it will cost anything at all approaching the value we are giving for its construction under this bill is out of all reason. When we consider that under this bill we are giving 3,750,000 acres of land, which is reputed by those who know most about it to be some of the most valuable land in the world, for the construction of this piece of road and that besides the land we are giving other considerations which are almost as valuable as the land itself—I say we are acting a very bad part and that if we, by our vote, approve of that, it would not be in the interests of the people whom we represent. Under the contract with Mackenzie & Mann they have the right to select this land. It has been said by some hon. gentlemen that it was of such a wonderful extent that it might reach round the world under certain conditions. That is certainly one way of putting it. Let us look at the contract and the position in which the contractors are with respect to the government regarding the location of that land. They can take it in blocks twenty-four miles long by six miles wide, and that is divided between the government and the contractors. The contractors have the choice of the location. They can take those blocks within their district wherever they please. They will have a better knowledge of the value of the mining locations in that district than the government can have. I am told they have at present men engaged to go in there for the purpose of finding out the best locations in which to place these tracts of twenty-four miles, and under their contract they can take up forty of these different locations. In the district which has been exploited by those who have gone there and from which a vast amount of gold has been taken, in the valley between the Indian River and the Klondike, there are 684,000 acres of land. But what is that compared with the land we are giving them? If they put down their locations of twenty-four miles there they would not have half enough land in that section. They have to extend to other places, and by the reports that we have from mining engineers, geologists, and mining experts who have gone in there on behalf of the government, we know that there is a very great extent of country in that section which is gold bearing and of great value, and although a large part of the tracts of three miles by six which the contractors are to take up on these different locations may not be mineralized, still, if even the front part in any one location in the gold-bearing tracts is of the same value as the locations where fortunes have been found, on Bonanza Creek and the several other creeks in that country, one of these locations will be more than sufficient to pay the whole cost of the line which they are to build. When that is the case, we are giving far too much for what we are to receive under such a contract. It is true that a great many people are going into that country, and I ask the House to consider for a moment the amount of money they are taking with them. It is said that a hundred thousand people are going there. Some estimate the number higher, but if the number is one hundred thousand people, and the amount they take there is $1,000 on an average, that is $100,000,000 taken into that country by these people. What time is it going to take those people to get $100,000,000 from that country? I doubt if in the next two or three years we will see that amount of money returned to this Dominion from that region. It has been said that there is great urgency for the construction of this road. I am not prepared to say that when the government were about to enter into this contract there was not urgency. They were at that time under the impression, and it was stated in the public press, and by many people coming from that part of the country, and there was likely to be starvation in the Yukon district. But we see from later accounts from there that the danger has been removed, that there are sufficient supplies there now, and that those who go there are taking with them supplies for twelve months. And, further, where the different trading companies engaged in trade with that country, and the supplies now going there, arrive at Dawson, there is no doubt that there will be sufficient food taken into that country to supply the population going there. Further than that, we see that it is not such a very difficult matter to get out of that country as many supposed some time ago it was. We see that people have arrived in this part of the Dominion who left Dawson about a month ago. Compare that with the difficulties, at the time of confederation, or very shortly after that, in getting to the north-west of this country, even to such a place as Battleford, which was the seat of the government in the North-west in the early days of confederation. It was then more difficult to get to that part of Canada than it is now to get from Vancouver to the city of Dawson. Under these circumstances, I do not think there is any such urgency for the construction of that road at present, as was perhaps thought to be the case at the time the government entered into this contract. On the other hand, if it is really the case that the country is so valuable, it may be necessary, in the interests of the Dominion of Canada, that a railroad should be constructed into it, and if that railroad is constructed on fair and reasonable terms, not such terms as are given to the contractors under this bill, but terms which would receive the approval of any reasonable man, I for one would be prepared to give my vote to assist the government to carry out that project, even if it was to be done by means of money from the treasury or on the credit of the Dominion, if it was found necessary and desirable to build a road into that country. We have had various routes discussed here, but it appears to me, from anything I have heard—and I have listened with a good deal of attention and without any preconceived objection to anything that was said by the government or by advocates of other proposed routes into that country, and I believe that the proper and most advantageous route for the Dominion—for the people of the eastern section of Canada at any rate, for those whom we represent more especially—is from some point in an eastern direction from the coast, so that the advantages of the trade of that country might be brought to this part of Canada, and the Peace River district and other regions that have been spoken of as possessing such fertility opened up. That would furnish employment for a railroad to be constructed into that country. There are some other clauses of the agreement made with those contractors which I think are very objectionable also. I will refer for a moment to the conditions under which they take up the mineral lands which are to be given them for the construction of this road. They receive those lands and pay a royalty of but one per cent on the minerals taken out. What is the position of other people who have gone to the Yukon and expended their time and energy there during the past few months, and will continue to expend it for months to come in prospecting the country with a view to getting some return for their labour by finding a claim that will repay them for their trouble? We understand from those who follow that business that a man going into that country cannot go there and at once take up a claim. He may find in a gulch, or some such place, a good many miners at work, but he has to find a location where he can commence to work himself. It will require quite a time and much labour for him to prove whether that claim is of any value. But before he can go and look over the country and see whether there is a place where he can take up a claim, he must procure a license, for which he has to pay $10. And he may find that there is no value in the claim he has been working for months, and have to move to some other place. After finding a likely place he must get his license recorded and pay $15 for his entry. He has to pay $15 a year rent, and if his little location is not sufficient for him to carry out all he intended to do, he must pay $100 for a tract of land behind him in order to procure wood for carrying on his work. That is what the miner has to encounter. After he has got this far advanced in his work, the contractors come along and pick up property in the very place where he has been working his claim. We will say he is away out in the centre of one of these tracts belonging to the company, or one of the government reserves—what is that man's position? The contractors owning the land on every side of him, a block 3 by 6 miles, may sell ten, fifteen or twenty claims, or any number they choose, out of their tract, and the miner, who is on his solitary claim there surrounded by their land, has to pay all the taxes I have enumerated, his ten dollars license, his fifteen dollars for entry, and fifteen dollars a year rent, and then, after he has taken out twenty-five hundred dollars, the government claim ten per cent on every dollar he takes out above that amount, while the contractors, with their men working along side of him, taking out ten times as much as he can, have only to pay the government one per cent. Now, what is the position of the working miner in comparison with that of the contractor? I tell you that the hard-working miner will become a hewer of wood and a drawer of water for the contractors, and in a very short time, if this bill is passed and the contract becomes the law of the land, the men who hold that contract would be the owners of that country. The miners would have no chance to live there under such unfair class legislation. There are a good many other points in this bill which perhaps might be criticized, and with which I am not fully in accord, but with respect to the quantity of land and the regulations enacted by the government for the miners, as compared with those under which the contractors would work, I cannot agree. Under those circumstances, I feel that I would not be doing my duty as a senator of Canada if I did not give my opposition to this bill, and vote for the motion for a six months' hoist,

Hon. Mr. COX—With your permission hon. gentlemen, I will preface the remarks I have to make by reference to a personal matter. Newspaper rumour, and at least two hon. gentlemen in the other chamber, in the course of their address, conveyed the impression that I was a partner in or in some way interested with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann in the agreement now under discussion. I therefore, desire to say that I am not and have never been directly or indirectly interested in it to the extent of one dollar. It is to be regretted that the real question at issue has to a large extent been lost sight of by the introduction of matter altogether foreign to that with which we have to deal, resorted to, in some cases I fear, for the purpose of creating prejudice against the government and the contractors. For instance, the hon. gentleman for Brandon did the Minister of the Interior very grave injustice by the use of the following words. I will read from the speech of the hon. gentleman:

> Many people have wondered how it was that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann were singled out from amongst all the other contractors in the country to have this particular bonanza, this most-favoured contractors' treaty thrust upon them. Perhaps some of you may be under the impression that this is Mr. Sifton's first railway deal, that he is a novice at railway-building, and that in this matter he met Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann for the first time. You are very much mistaken. Mr. Sifton was for a number of years a member of the celebrated Greenway government in Manitoba, and anything that aggregation does not know about subsidizing and building railways with most-favoured contractors is not worth knowing. The Dauphin Railway in Manitoba was constructed by Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann for Mr. Sifton, under circumstances which were to what I might call the mutual satisfaction of Mr. Sifton and these contractors. And I do not hesitate to say that were the inner workings of that deal known to the public it would make a situation mighty uncomfortable for more than one government. But even the outside history of that deal is interesting reading. The road is 100 miles long. If you ask Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann what they got for building it, they will tell you: Oh, a land grant of 6,400 acres a mile and a cash bonus of $40,000 a year for 20 years from the Federal government. How much will you ask from the Provincial government? Not a cent, they will reply. And it is strictly true, but when, in your rude, inquisitive way, you probe this matter a little further, you will find it to be a fact that the land grant and the Dominion subsidy, which amount to $800,000, is, according to the opinion of the experts in the country, sufficient to build and fully equip that road. But this did not satisfy our liberal and large-hearted Minister of the Interior, who was then Attorney General of Manitoba. He thought that was not enough for these contractors; he therefore put through a deal whereby he practically made them a present of $8,000 a mile, by guaranteeing the principal and interest on their bonds to the extent of $800,000. I say he practically made them a present of it, because he did not even take security on their land grant, all the security he took being a lien on the road, and that is a second mortgage, as the Dominion subsidy ranks first.

This was intended to and did convey to hon. member of this House, the impression that both the Minister of the Interior and Mr. Mackenzie had colluded together to defraud the province of Manitoba, of which the Minister of the Interior was then Attorney General, and that the same two gentlemen were now entering into a corrupt bargain to defraud this country. I will now briefly state the facts as to the Lake Dauphin road which may be verified by reference to the records. In 1895, the late Dominion government granted aid by way of a bonus to the extent of 6,400 acres of land per mile, to what is now known as the Lake Dauphin road, for a distance of 250 miles. They also entered into an agreement to pay $80,000 per year for a period of twenty years, to be repaid by the carrying of men materials, mails, &c., for the government at the usual rates, the accounts to be adjusted at the expiration of twenty years, the government taking a lien upon one-third of the land grant for the due performance by the company of its part of the contract. This was afterwards divided into two sections of 125 miles each. The Manitoba government, by statute, was authorized to guarantee payment of principal and interest in bonds to the extent of $8,000 per mile for not exceeding 125 miles, the bonds to be secured by first mortgage on the road, and its earnings not second mortgage, as stated by the hon. member for Brandon. The government have not had to pay one dollar under this guarantee, the company having paid the interest on the bonds as it matured, and if they fail to do so in future, the government can take possession of the road and would have it at a price far below its value. It is already earning more than the interest on the bonds. The bargain was an exceptionally good one for the province, and there is nothing whatever to justify the insinuations that were made against the two gentlemen named.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It leaves the contractors a clear profit of 640,000 acres of land and $40,000 a year. The railroad was built on the guarantee of Manitoba of $8,000 a mile, and that is the only thing that is certain. The land grant of 6,400 acres a mile and the $40,000 a year are a clear profit to the contractors.

Hon. Mr. COX—If the contractors make a big profit, and there is no doubt they will, from whom do they make it? From the Dominion Government?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—From the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. COX—The land grant was from the Dominion Government. It is not right to blame the Manitoba Government for it, or the then Attorney General of that government. The only thing that the Manitoba Government gave to the contractors, that was of any value to them, was their endorsement on the bonds that enabled them to negotiate them at a better rate of interest than they would have been able to get if they had not been guaranteed.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That was not a part of the first contract; that guarantee was an after thing, was it not?

Hon. Mr. COX—That is what they did give them. The Manitoba government guaranteed the bonds which was the first charge on the entire railway and its earnings. The road is worth a great deal more than the bonds that the Manitoba government guaranteed. They did not give them one dollar, nor are they likely to ever have to pay them one dollar, because the lien they have taken upon the road is more than sufficient to pay it. I refer to that matter in justice to the hon. Minister of the Interior, who is not here. I have known the hon. member from Brandon a great many years as an honourable man, and I do not think he would make that statement deliberately knowing the same to be untrue; but I say that the political prejudices, if I may use that word, or his desire to make a political point against an opponent, leads him to do a very great injustice to an hon. gentleman who is not present in this House, and I think it is to be very much regretted that that should be done in speaking of a matter of such very great importance, and saying he practically gave some $800,000 when he ought to have known that he did not give one dollar or incur one dollar of liability, practically. The hon. gentleman from Shell River made some statements equally misleading in reference to the contractors, or purchasers, or owners of the Toronto Street Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I thought the hon. gentleman was stopped by the Speaker. If my hon. friend is going to deal with that question, he also should be called out of order.

Hon. Mr. COX—I know the hon. gentleman from Shell River will not find any fault with me. I believe he made a mistake. I understood him to say that the present contractors have floated the Toronto Railway upon the public for $9,000,000, while it costs them only $1,600,000. I happened to be along with Mr. Angus, one of the trustees in verifying the expenditure of that road, and I know as a fact that it cost over $4,000,000 in actual cash that went into the transaction; that is being sold to the public at what practically represents $9,000,000. But that is no reflection upon the contractors, nor upon the city, nor upon anybody else. The electric tramways in the city and in the country have so developed beyond the expectation of any person that that $4,000,000 has jumped into nine or ten millions; and the foresight, energy, ability and business astuteness of Mr. Mackenzie, who foresaw tha tand took the benefit of it, is no reason why an important matter in which he has been engaged should be brought up for the purpose of reflecting on his character or standing. The contract was let by public tender in the face of very close competition. A number of Toronto gentlemen, who thought they knew a great deal and thought they were able to judge as to its value—and I was one of them—thought that we were offering a very big price for it, but it turned out that we were quite below the tender of Mackenzie and his associates, and from the large profits they afterwards realized we know now that we lost by not having the faith and foresight they had.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There are nine million dollars securities on that road now.

Hon. Mr. COX—There are six millions capital and $3,200,000 bonds, but, as I said, the property has jumped into value; it is worth nine millions of dollars.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—To the public?

Hon. Mr. COX—Yes, to the public. It is the very best tramway service on the continent.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—The Speaker decided that it was out of order to discuss the Toronto railway. We want to come to a decision on the case which is now before us, and if we are going to discuss all the electric railroads in the cities of Ontario, I do not know when we will come to a decision.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It is a matter in which the hon. member from Halifax has no stock.

Hon. Mr. COX—We would be very glad to have him interested. I wish I had got interested sooner. It will, I am sure, be admitted by every member of this honourable House that the administration of the affairs of the Yukon country for the next twelve months is one of very great importance, of momentous importance to the country, and carries with it serious responsibilities. If the agreement before us is approved, it leaves the responsibility with the government of the country, with the gentlemen who, within the last twenty-one months, have received their commission from the public voters of this country. If the bill is not approved, it puts that responsibility upon the members of this Senate. Now, hon. gentlemen, is there anything in that agreement that justifies this House in assuming that responsibility?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Lots of things.

Hon. Mr. COX—I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman thinks so or he would not vote against it. Personally, I want to say, before I record my vote in its favour, that I do not think there is anything in the agreement to justify this House in taking out of the hands of the other House the responsibility of administering the affairs of that country. It is fraught with very great responsibility and with very great importance, and I for one do not think that we ought to take the responsibility of that upon this House. Different routes have been suggested and various objections have been urged against each of them; but there are fewer objections against the one now proposed than against any of the others. Let me start at Dawson City; it has not been denied, so far as I have heard, that we have about 600 miles of navigation from Dawson City to Teslin Lake, the whole of the 600 miles being exclusively in Canadian territory, the proposed road of 150 miles also being through Canadian territory. This road brings us 150 miles nearer to the Pacific coast; it also brings us 150 miles nearer to an exclusively Canadian port on the Pacific coast, but at that point we have 150 miles of navigation on the Stikine River. And suppose, for argument's sake, that the attitude of the United States might cause difficulty or trouble in the use of that navigation—which is highly improbable, still, if they did, the 150 miles as contracted for brings us that much nearer to an exclusively Canadian port. It brings us also 150 miles nearer to Ashcroft on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, if it is decided to build the line any further. In other words, this line of 150 miles would be a portion of a line from Port Simpson to Dawson City. It would be a portion of a line from Ashcroft to Dawson City; and it would in the meantime make a connecting link between the navigable waters on the Stikine River and the waters leading from Teslin Lake to Dawson City. And the necessity of getting into that country at the present time with the least possible delay, appears to me to justify the contract that is before us. Various opinions have been expressed as to the value that should be put upon this land. The land has been valued at all figures, as low as five cents an acre—and one hon. gentleman last night, addressing this House, valued it at millions, billions and trillions of dollars. It is just one of these things that may be valued at any price, and the figures that are put upon it are purely problematical. I am not disposed to undervalue it. I have a very high opinion of the mineral wealth of this country, and particularly of the mineral wealth of our British Columbia province, and of the lands in our western and north-western country. I am inclined to think that a large amount of wealth will be taken from the lands that it is proposed to give to the contractors for the construction of this road, but I would like to ask this honourable House, who will get that wealth? It will be the miners who may be there; it will be the merchants and the farmers who raise the produce to feed those miners; the merchants who supply them with clothing; the manufacturers and their employees who supply them with the implements and tools necessary to do that work, and this amount, whatever it may be worth, be it large or small, will be distributed amongst the people of this country, and if it so happens, and I think it really will happen, and should happen, that the contractors get a large percentage of that profit, who will be any the worse off?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Did the public in Toronto get the wealth from the Toronto Street Railway?

Hon. Mr. COX—Yes, sir; they did.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Did they get nine million dollars?

Hon. Mr. COX—Yes, I bought stock when it was 25 cents on the dollar, and properties I have in the outlying parts of the city that were not of any value are increased in value; and many others besides myself have gained by it. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who would have gained anything by it if it had been a horse tramway as it was a few years ago? Some property now valuable would be still farming lands, or market garden lands. In many ways the city has increased and developed and extended and improved by the construction of the Toronto Street Railway. While the contractors made a large amount out of it, scores of people have derived profits out of it, and the public are receiving the benefit of it. Mechanics who are unable to get homes are now able, by the use of the tramway, on payment of three cents, to get two or three miles out of the heart of the city into nice comfortable and convenient homes of their own, and live in a much more healthy locality than they would have been able to if the railway had not been built, as they would have been huddled together in the centre of the city, with horse tramways. I say the development of the country would do a great deal to enrich the whole community and everybody in it. The hon. member from Shell River (Mr. Boulton), as well as myself, will get some benefit from the opening up of that country and the development of it. Would it not be better, if there is ten millions a year taken out of that country, that the contractors should get every dollar of it than to have it imbedded there in the rocks of that country? The contractors cannot hold it. You cannot keep money tied up in any way; if the contractors made large amounts of money out of that, it would get into the country and spread over the Dominion, and we would all get a share of it; and it would be better that the farmers, merchants, manufacturers, mechanics and labourers who contribute to take that wealth out of the rocks should get their share of it, and the country will be enhanced by it. If the contractors should make so much money that, as was playfully said in the House of Commons the other evening, Lord Yukon takes the place of Lord Strathcona and entertains Canadians and others in the capital of the world, will that do us any harm? Or if Lord Klondike takes the place of Lord Mount-Stephen.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It depends on who he is.

Hon. Mr. COX—Perhaps, as I said before, the hon. gentleman from Shell River might be the one.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or it might be Mackenzie & Mann?

Hon. Mr. COX—I do not know and I do not care, as long as some man goes to the other side. As long as I see the wealth of the people of Canada increasing, I do not care who it is. If I do not get any larger share of it than to insure the man's life for $15,000 or $20,000, that is all I want. He might take a policy in the Imperial, of which company the hon. gentleman is a director. The hon. leader of the Opposition read several letters yesterday from prominent men in the country, indicating the trend of public opinion with regard to this matter, and when I received a letter this morning I thought it would be a good opportunity to read it to show that whatever wealth comes out of the Yukon will be distributed among the people of this country. It is addressed to myself, and reads as follows:

Hon. Geo. A. Cox, Toronto.

DEAR SENATOR COX,—Judging by newspaper reports, it is apparently conceded that the Yukon Bill will be defeated in the Senate, and although at this stage, I do not suppose that any amount of argument or the submission of any number of facts in favour of the measure will have any effect, nevertheless its defeat will deal the heaviest blow at the extension of Canadian trade that manufacturers and merchants have experienced in many years.

As you are aware, I have more or less knowledge regarding the trade of British Columbia and the coast cities, and I do not hesitate to say to you that the expected action of the Senate will most undoubtedly result in building up the Puget Sound ports to the detriment of Vancouver and Victoria.

I visited the Pacific coast both in March and August last, and at that time the Canadian Yukon trade was practically nil, although Seattle, Tacoma and Portland were crowded with miners and prospectors, and every vessel going north was overloaded to the danger limit with those rushing to the Canadian gold fields after Canadian gold, but transported in Yankee vessels, and outfitted entirely in the United States.

The steamer "Portland" and other so-called "treasure-ships" hailing from Seattle were bringing down the wealth accumulated by American miners in the Canadian Klondike, and Seattle was advertised the world over, as not only the most advantageous outfitting port, but the point to which all the gold wrung from Canadian soil was being brought, and it was claimed that the treasure vaults in the National Banks of that city were overflowing with the natural wealth which was our birthright.

I endeavoured to secure business for our company, believing that as one of the largest industries in Canada, we should in some way benefit, but found that owing to the United States coasting laws and customs regulations, we could not at that time secure even a fractional part of the trade that should have accrued to us.

As soon, however, as the intention of the Government to have built the Stikine-Teslin Railway became public, the whole situation was reversed, and every Canadian merchant and manufacturer is experiencing the benefit of large orders for Yukon requirements, and thousands of Canadian merchants are being employed on this work, so much so that at present it is difficult to engage mechanics or operatives at any point, the whole industrial population being well employed.

When it was known that a railway was to be built, over which Canadian goods could be transported without the harassing difficulties experienced at Skagway, Dyea, or by the Yukon River route, Canada came to the front. The world over, it was made known that all bound for the Klondike could travel the entire distance under the British flag, and command the traditional safety and protection guaranteed by the Union Jack. Vancouver and Victoria were lifted from depression, and to-day their streets are teeming with a population that is continually buying and moving north. Their merchants are wiring repeat and repeat orders to Ontario and the east for more goods in ever-increasing quantities. Our Canadian lines of transportation are over-taxed with the demand on their facilities for carrying men and merchandise to the west and to the north, and I leave it to any man who is in touch with the pulse of Canadian trade of to-day to say that our present commercial self-reliance, our faith in the future of our trade and our self-confidence in our ability to meet all demands on us, if we are only given half a chance, was not borne out of the confidence we all had that no matter how our political parties might differ on every other point, that in national sentiment and the desire to conserve our own resources for our own people, they stood solidly shoulder to shoulder. Apart from our selfish trade interest, can we not also confess to a feeling of patriotic pride when we know that the Canadian Pacific Railway has purchased a fleet of ocean steamers to ply between Vancouver and Wrangel, is building a fleet of river steamers to ply between that point and Glenora, that our government has made provision for a railway from Glenora to Teslin Lake, and that large numbers of river boats will be there available for transportation direct to the gold fields, so that once again Canadian determination and pluck will have, inside of twelve months, overcome what appeared to be insurmountable obstacles to the control of our own commercial interests.

The Conservative party, to which, as you know, I owe allegiance, has in the past incurred much criticism when advocating a "forward" policy calculated to promote our industrial independence, as when they, in the face of opposition, carried to a successful conclusion the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Sault Canal, and in the light of the present, have they not for ever earned the gratitude of Canadians for their unyielding determination to act for Canada first.

I am afraid that the intensity of my interest in this matter may have led to my writing you at too great length, but the satisfaction of the knowledge that we have already secured orders for over $30,000 worth of machinery for river boats to be used on the Canadian Yukon route, is tempered by the fear, sordid though it may be, that as a result of the action of the Senate, we may lose any further extension of this trade.

As you are perhaps aware, the Polson Iron Works and the Bertram Engine Works, of this city, have also been working overtime to fill orders for boats and machinery for the Stikine route, and to my own knowledge, many other factories throughout this province and Quebec are working overtime to fill the demand for picks, shovels, axes, woollens, clothing, boots, hardware, and every other description of machinery and merchandise that is being ordered from the coast in the expectation that it will be shipped in our own vessels over our own route, and the profits thereof remain with our own people.

It may not be too late to prevent an error, which, if committed, will be so far-reaching in its deplorable consequences that history will regard it as the lost opportunity of a century, and I trust that you will do all that one man, standing for his country, can do to sound a note of warning that may find an echo, if not in the hearts, in the intelligence of Canadians at large.

Yours truly,

He need not have told me about his allegiance to the Conservative party, because if it had not been that he was such a strong Conservative I, perhaps, would have been in the other chamber. He stumped the county against me, and I was only defeated by sixteen votes. I know that he controlled more votes than that out of his own shop, but still I am satisfied and feel much happier in this chamber.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if there is anything to prevent the construction of this road going on even if this bill is thrown out?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, certainly.

Hon. Mr. COX—Yes, this honourable House is in the way.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If it is put on a proper basis I think it could be done. If they could be sure of half the business they say will be done, they could build the road and make a profit.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I want to point out that there is not a word about that 4,000,000 acres.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. COX—I would like to hear what the hon. gentleman has to say.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Was that letter written spontaneously, or was it in reply to a request?

Hon. Mr. COX—I could not tell you, but I will give the name of the gentleman.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think I know it.

Hon. Mr. COX—He is one of the most active Conservatives in the country, and has done good work for his party.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He is a very respectable man.

Hon. Mr. COX—He is at the head of a manufacturing establishment employing about 800 men—one of the grandest manufacturing concerns in this country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He does not say one word about the terms.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, he approves of the bill.

Hon. Mr. COX—I do not care what value you put on the land, I say it is not worth anything to us, and at this point I want to make a confession—something that I tried to do but failed. I did try, and tried my very best and thought I was doing it from patriotic motives. I was so foolish as to be one of the syndicate who tried to defeat the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I am very thankful I was not successful. I am very glad that the government of that day had not the second chamber to defeat their project.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You may be wrong again.

Hon. Mr. COX—Perhaps I am wrong in supposing the second chamber is going to defeat it.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—How can the hon. gentleman expect me to vote against the bill when he will not give me the name of that man?

Hon. Mr. COX—I will give it to the hon. gentleman. I would not like to give the name to the House without permission, but I am willing to give it to any hon. gentleman. I can assure the House that he is a lifelong Conservative, and when I ran in West Peterborough for the House of Commons, I attribute my defeat to the fact that that gentleman stumped the county against me.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the best evidence of his good sense.

Hon. Mr. COX—Yes, and I would like the Senate to take his advice. I compare the opposition to this transaction to some extent with the unwarrantable opposition, if I may use that term, that was used against the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If it had been successful in defeating or delaying the construction of that road at that time, it would have done this country an incalculable injury. I believe the gentlemen who constructed that road, and who have so much assisted in developing the resources of this country are entitled to all the wealth that any of them has got out of it, and to all the honour there is in connection with it, and I am glad that two of these gentlemen grace the House of Lords.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I am afraid a good many who were at that time in the same position as my hon. friend would not be so honest as to make the confession.

Hon. Mr. COX—I hope with all my heart, that this House will not make the mistake that we made at that time. When the hon. gentleman from Acadia (Mr. Poirier) was speaking last night of the very large value to be placed upon the land, it reminded me of the great diversity of opinion that existed as to the value of the lands which were being given to the Canadian Pacific Railway. It will be admitted by all that the value that has been taken out of these lands already—and only a very small proportion of them are yet occupied—can be counted by the hundreds of millions of dollars. My hon. friend from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) will bear me out in the statement that only a fraction of the wealth of that western country has yet been developed, and yet hundreds of millions of dollars of produce have been taken off those lands that were valued at a very small amount, and hundreds of millions more will yet be obtained. And to whom will it go? It will go to the citizens of this country and the citizens of other countries who will come here to develop it. It has been demonstrated that the wealth is in the lands, that there are untold millions yet to be extracted from them. And yet that wealth will go to the people who dig it out, and these three or four million acres of land are developed and the wealth—and I do not care how much wealth is taken out of it—goes to enrich every man, woman and child in the country, and to benefit them directly or indirectly in some way. I say let it be developed; let the contractors make money out of it. If they make as much money as is stated that they will make out of three or four million acres, there are hundreds of thousands of acres yet to be developed, and I do not believe it is possible to cover a fraction of the mineral wealth of that country with the three millions which is to be selected by the contractors. Put it down there where they like, and have all the base lines and restrictions where they like, and there will be still unlimited wealth in that country, and in the millions of acres yet unoccupied and fertile lands to the east of it waiting to be developed to feed the hundreds of thousands of people who will yet be occupying that western country. I cannot understand how any person can justify opposition to this project so much calculated to develop the resources of that great country. I wish that something could be done to delay the fatal vote which I am afraid is going to be taken to-night, and to postpone the matter for further consideration. Let the parties get together, and do something to avert the great injury that is going to be done to this country by the blow which will be struck at the manufacturing and mercantile interests of Canada by throwing out this measure.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let me say, hon. gentlemen, that I regard the bill and the motion made by the hon. member from Victoria as both of very great importance to this House, and to the country. I was for 30 years a member of the House of Commons. I have seen and heard during that time many warm contests and many heated observations; but I must say that for what seems to me an exhibition of a cool and determined spirit of political partisanship, I have never seen in the House of Commons so fierce a spirit exhibited as I have witnessed in this House by several hon. gentlemen during this discussion. I hope that the Senate is not going to delude itself with the notion that it is not actuated by political feeling, for I am perfectly sure in my own mind—and I think when the discussion that has taken place on this bill in this House is read in the country, there will be no two opinions upon that question, that in respect to those measures which emanate from a Reform administration, they are not likely to be received with very much generosity. We were told there were men in the old Greek republics who, on account of their hostility to others whom they regarded as political rivals, were ever siding with Philip of Macedon, and it does seem to me that in this discussion we have had exhibited a strong inclination on the part of some hon. gentlemen to cast their political influence in favour of those measures of public policy, those works and undertakings, that would place the Yukon country and the trade of that country under the control of our powerful neighbours, instead of being under the control of the people and government of this country. Let me take the case of the mover of the motion now under consideration for the six months' hoist. If there be a province in this Dominion that would be specially helped in its industrial enterprises, in the extension of its commerce, in the stimulation of every branch of industry by this measure that province is British Columbia. It seems to me that whatever doubts there might be in respect to any other portion of the Dominion, there can be no doubt whatever as to the position of British Columbia, and yet my hon. friend who sits on the other side of the House, from the province of British Columbia, has offered to this measure his most determined opposition. He has criticised it most unfavourably—I was going to say most unfairly—certainly most unfairly from my point of view, and the hon. gentleman in doing so, I cannot help thinking, must feel that he is causing a serious detriment to the province of British Columbia.

Now, look at what has been said? Both hon. gentlemen in this House who are here from the North-west Territories, and several other hon. gentlemen have declared that this road would be of no substantial advantage to the people east of the Rocky Mountains. I do not agree at all with that view. They said it would be a road advantageous to the people of the United States and of British Columbia, and I wondered how my hon. friend could defend his action in this House before the people in British Columbia when almost every speaker who supported his motion pointed out that that would be the province, among all the provinces, that would be specially benefited by this measure. This is a blow against the trade of British Columbia. It is a proposal, when carried, and I suppose it will be carried, that will help the United States, that will help the people of San Francisco and Seattle to control the trade of the Yukon country, and to do this at the expense of the people of British Columbia. My hon. friend is, in fact, whether in intention or not, an ally of that gentleman who is here and who supported the cities of the Pacific coast, and as one of the editors of the San Francisco Examiner went up to the Yukon country for the purpose of making a report on the conditions of things and to aid the city of San Francisco in acquiring the trade of that country. What did that gentleman say when he was here? Why he said if the mining regulations of the government were brought into force in that country the population would soon settle the question, not by obedience to the law, not by seeking the repeal or amendment of them, or a change in a constitutional way, but with Winchester rifles—the sort of talk that was reported to us before the government was actively engaged in promoting this enterprise. Those people who are seeking to control the trade of the country, seeking to close the avenues by which we are to gain admittance to our own territory, with the intention of governing and controlling that country, find in hon. gentlemen who are supporting this six months' hoist motion the most efficient allies they could acquire on the continent of North America. That is the condition of things; my hon. friends, whether they will or not, whether that be their object or intention or not—and I do not attribute to them the direct intention of undertaking to betray the interests of this country, but any man who has thought out this question, any hon. gentleman in this House who has seriously considered the question instead of giving his mind a holiday on the subject, can come to but one conclusion, and that is that if this measure is defeated, if this Senate undertakes to take the work of administration in that country out of the hands of the government, to disable them and disqualify them in this respect for the discharge of an important public trust to the people of this country and to the sovereign of the British Empire, have but to persist in the course which they have taken, they have but to carry the motion of my hon. friend and they will put it in the power of the United States to exclude almost every dollar's worth of goods and all the products of this country going into the Yukon, and they will enable us, if we hold the country at all, to hold it by the grace and favour of the government at Washington. The motion to destroy this bill is a matter in which this House is unfortunately more interested than the government. I suppose hon. gentlemen remember very well the answer of Mr. Stephenson when it was proposed to send the first locomotive over the railway track to Manchester. Some one asked him what would be the effect if a cow came upon the track, and he said it would be a very bad thing for the cow. I think when hon. gentlemen are undertaking to place this House in antagonism to the House of Commons, to the government, and to the people of this country, they are taking a course which is not to the advantage or the honour of the Senate of Canada. This is an important question for the country, and for this House. It is an important question to the country because there has come a tide in the affairs of this Dominion, of which, if they were permitted to take advantage, would most materially contribute to its prosperity. If my hon. friends deny us that opportunity, if they say advantage shall not be taken of it, if they say no avenue of trade shall be opened to that country, then these hon. gentlemen are inflicting a serious blow upon the commerce of Canada and its various skilled industries, a more serious blow than has been struck at any time since this union has been established. I say it is an important question for the Senate, because there is a strong bias exhibited in this discussion to hinder the bill and defeat this measure, a measure, in my opinion, necessary to the work of administration in the Yukon district. The government have said to the House that, in their opinion, this is a necessary measure. The government are responsible for the administration of the affairs of this country. It is less than two years since there was an appeal to the country, and there was returned a House of Commons opposed to the former administration and expressing its confidence in the present administration; no election has taken place at any time since the government has been formed which shows or tends to show that the confidence which the people expressed in June, 1896, has been withdrawn. Since then, twenty-two elections have taken place, and not one of those elections has gone in favour of the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. I say, therefore, that there is nothing to warrant the majority in this House in voting against this bill. The declaration has been made over and over again that the government upon this question do not represent the country. How do they know that?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You could easily let us know if you have the confidence of the country?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman suppose that the Crown is going to dissolve the House of Commons to satisfy his whim? Does he suppose that because he chooses to say the government no longer possesses the confidence of the people that therefore we ought to put the country to the expense and the turmoil of a general election? Is that the view which my hon. friend has of the constitutional duties that devolve upon him as a member of this House? They may be the views of my hon. friend: they are not my views. The government have said it is their duty to adopt what they regard as the necessary means to accomplish the end which this bill brings before this House. They have fully considered that subject. My hon. friends opposite may have come honestly to a very different opinion, but under the provisions of our constitution, and our constitutional system, the duty of deciding that is with the government. It is the opinion of the government and not the opinion of my hon. friends that must prevail. Can they for a moment suppose that any government worthy the name of government—any government having a sense of self respect will, after having been supported by a majority in the House of Commons, the representatives of the people, those who bear the taxes and the burdens that measures of this sort may impose—do they suppose that the majority in this House is to determine the question of administration against the other two branches of the legislature, against the Crown and against the majority in the House of Commons? It was well said on one occasion by Macaulay, in discussing how far there should be open questions in the work of government, that there is one class of questions which specially belong to an administration, and that is the class of questions that have to do with the administration of the affairs of government, that class of questions which are closely associated with the work of the executive government. Now we have in the Yukon district a large territory that is being occupied for the first time. It is necessary to provide a government for it; necessary to provide efficient means for the maintenance of law and order; necessary to provide easy means of access to that country, and so far as we could do so, control the trade of that country. This we have endeavoured to accomplish. We came down with our measure. We have two courses open to us, to ask for an appropriation of money or to take what, under the law of this country, is a part of the public revenue, a portion of the public land, and we decided in favour of the latter course. On that question there was no difference of opinion, and I venture to say that every Liberal member, and many who are not Liberal members, in the House of Commons, preferred an appropriation of public land to an appropriation of public moneys. What does this House declare on this matter—I am speaking of the majority who have expressed opinions in this discussion? My hon. friends say: "Why, you are giving too much lands." Some say: "You ought not to have given lands at all." Others say: "We want no road at all." My hon. friend from Monck (Mr. McCallum) declared we did not want a road into that country.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I said nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has forgotten what he said.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—No, I have not forgotten.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Others maintain that we should make an appropriation of public moneys. I say that is not a question on which this House judges. That comes before this House in no other sense than a supply bill. It is in that respect practically a supply bill, and you propose to take out of the hands of the administration, whose life depends upon the vote, not of this House, but of the House of Commons, and out of the hands of the House of Commons the question whether this shall be an appropriation of lands or money. Further than that, a motion for a six months' hoist is practically a motion to put the trade of the Yukon country beyond the reach of the people of Canada. We have had over and over again discussions on that line. We have had over and over again, during this debate, a declaration that we ought to seek admission to that country by the Lynn Inlet and that our railway ought to go into that country from the Lynn Inlet. A few hon. gentlemen have spoken about the Edmonton route, but they have spoken of it as rather an abstract speculative question than a question of practical politics. They know it would involve the construction of at least fifteen hundred miles of railway, and they know if they were building a mile a day it would take five years to build from Edmonton to the Yukon country. So that is a matter, on a question of urgency, that must be set aside altogether at the present time. And so my hon. friends turn their attention away from Edmonton, not to a road within British territory, not to a road that would be under Canadian control, not to a road where we could determine what the commercial policy should be of the country in respect to the commerce and trade and travel that passes over that route, but to a road beginning in the United States territory at Lynn Inlet and which the government of the United States could control. That has been the position. These hon. gentlemen profess—and I suppose are serious in their professions—to be devoted to British interests and the maintenance of British rights. I supposed that this country had practically taken a new departure with regard to the maintenance of the integrity of the empire and the interests of the empire when the Queen's Diamond Jubilee took place. We had a few on each side who favoured more effective defences of this country. No one could seriously interest any large number of persons on either side of the House in that question. I thought I saw a change—what I believed to be a change for the better—a change which would have the effect of interesting the people of the United Kingdom in this country and everything that affected the well-being of Canada. But here we have a question upon which it is perfectly manifest to every one who has chosen to look into it that the people on the western coast in the great cities of the United States are endeavouring to seize the trade of the Yukon country, and to control it and to control the wealth of that country, and we have a large number of gentlemen declaring that that is the best course to take—to support a railway which would accomplish that object. Has any hon. gentleman taken the trouble to look at the bills that are before this House? Here we have a bill that I dare say will be considered after this one is disposed of to incorporate the Pacific and Yukon Railway Navigation and Mining Company, a bill which declares that this company—and a declaration in perfect accordance with a dozen speeches which have been made in this House—is for the general advantage of Canada, and a bill which says that the company may lay out, construct and operate a railway of the gauge of three feet, and that bill is being moved by gentlemen who have declared in the discussion of this subject that a railway with three feet gauge is nothing more than a tramway, and yet they are pressing that measure here and pressing in what company? Why pressing along with Mr. Hamilton Smith who was here and who was actively working to defeat the policy of the government upon this question in the interests of commercial men in the United States upon the Pacific coast. Let me say this—and I say it with a great deal of regret—that there has been, in several of the speeches that have been made in this House, an exhibition of a spirit of very fierce party bitterness. I say that the speech by my hon. friend who moved the six months' hoist, the speech of my hon. friend from Monck, and the speeches of the three hon. gentlemen who spoke in this House from the North-west Territories, were all in a tone of fierce party hostility, nearly every one of them suggesting that there is something wrong, that there is something dishonest, and not merely an error of judgment.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I did not say so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know that the hon. gentleman did.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I accused no one.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not intend to include the hon. gentleman from British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Does the hon. gentleman say I said there was something wrong?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What did my hon. friend mean by his allusion to the Minister of the Interior with regard to the exclusion of Mr. Hamilton Smith? If my hon. friend did not mean to impute any wrong motive to any person I shall be glad to hear it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I described the possibilities under this bill. I said nothing at all imputing motives to anybody. But I can say to the hon. gentleman to-day, as I said before, that there is nothing to prevent the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State being partners in this concern, having stock in this railway, and I am surprised that my hon. friend who knows so much about the independence of Parliament, should put in an amendment to exclude the members of the House of Commons when he is allowed to go in himself. That is all I said about the bill—that the possibilities were that you could do so if you liked.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman seemed to think there was something very suspicious that the members of the House of Commons should be excluded and the members of the Senate not excluded from entering into partnership in this company. Let me read the provision upon which my hon. friend commented:

> No member of the House of Commons of Canada shall be be admitted to any share or part of the said contract or to any benefit to arise therefrom.

That is the declaration in the contract. Let me call the attention of the House to the provisions of the Act relating to the Senate and the House of Commons, section 15 of that Act provides:

> This Act shall not extend to disqualify any person as a member of the House of Commons by reason of his being a shareholder in any incorporated company having a contract or agreement with the Government of Canada, except any company which undertakes a contract for the building of any public work, and any company incorporated for the construction or working of any part of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

That does not say one word about the exclusion of senators. It is a provision in an Act revised in 1886. My hon. friend was in the House and did not at that time propose to extend that disqualification to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—He could not do it if he tried.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Why then exclude the members of the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The law excludes them.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—And you allow the senators to go in, as an invitation to try and induce the men of this country to support this bill—to put another weapon in Mackenzie & Mann's hand to try and carry the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let us see whether my hon. friend is right in that imputation. I point out to him that there is the same inclusion and exclusion in the Act relating to the constitution of the Senate and House of Commons. Let me read a portion of the next section:

> In every contract, agreement or commission to be made, entered into or accepted by any person with the government of Canada, or any of the departments or officers of the government of Canada, there shall be inserted an express condition that no member of the House of Commons shall be admitted to any share or part of such contract, agreement or commission.

I wish to call the attention of my hon. friend to this, and to give him a piece of information which he does not seem to have possessed. He will see that the government are required, by the provisions of that section, in making a contract for the construction of a railway, to insert in that contract a provision declaring that no member of the House of Commons shall be admitted to any share or part of such contract or agreement. The government simply did this: in the provision of the contract they made the contract conform to the law.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I think the hon. gentleman wants to be fair ——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am fair.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Let me say one word on this point. How did the hon. gentleman come to omit it in the first contract, and amend it afterwards? How did he come to put it there in the second place? This bill was introduced in parliament without such a clause, and it was twenty days after that that clause was put in excluding the members of the House of Commons, and yet nothing was said about the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let me tell my hon. friend why we could not put anything there about the Senate. The qualifications and disqualifications of the Senate are fixed by the British North America Act. We cannot impose on the Senate disabilities other than those which are imposed by the law.

Now, in drafting the contract these words had from oversight been omitted, which the law required shall be inserted, but the law on the subject is clear as noon day. It is stated in express terms that this shall be a part of every contract entered into for the construction of any public work or undertaking, so that my hon. friend will see that the provision which excited a suspicion in his mind is a provision that the law requires shall be inserted in the contract.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I should like to ask if that excludes any one from being a shareholder in a mining company which arises out of the acquisition of those lands.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will have to consult his solicitor on that point. Now, I say this: the spirit in which my hon. friend discussed the question, and the spirit in which it was discussed by some others, was an exhibition of party bitterness unrestrained by a sense of responsibility, because my hon. friend knows that this House cannot be legally controlled by public opinion. If the House of Commons do wrong it can be brought to account; if the government go wrong it can be brought to account, and therefore, under our constitutional system, the intention is to govern in these matters subject to their responsibility to the House of Commons. While their conduct may be criticised in this House, it is an extreme and unusual course for the Senate to undertake to override the public policy determined upon by the government and to mark out for that government a different course. Does my hon. friend suppose that is permissible? Let us look at what the constitutional system is: if the government on this question had been beaten in the House of Commons there was one course open for them, and that is to tender their resignation, and permit another government to be formed to carry out the views which the House had expressed, but my hon. friend cannot turn out the government by any vote in this House, and does he suppose that the government, that are entitled under the constitution to remain in office, will for a moment consent to abandon that course which their judgment tells them is the proper course to pursue under the circumstances, and accept from this House a declaration of what the public policy should be?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We do not want you to do that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What is it that the hon. gentleman wants the government to do? He proposes that this measure shall not receive a second reading. He proposes that this measure, which was to be an instrument in the hands of the government to enable them to properly administer the affairs of that country, to secure to the people peace, order and good government, and to promote the trade and prosperity of this country, shall not become law, and my hon. friend, therefore, puts it outside the power of the government to undertake to carry out in that country the policy which every one, who has carefully considered the question, must believe to be in the public interest.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The question was never submitted to the people at all.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend forgets that it was submitted to the people's representatives, and they are the exponents of the people's wishes, and so far as the public are concerned, their view must be taken as the view of the people.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman in what particular they have done that? Have they carried out one pledge they made to the people?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will discuss that on a proper occasion.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Exactly so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am discussing at the present time the motion of the hon. gentleman from British Columbia that this bill shall not be read now, but shall be read this day six months. There was exhibited in this chamber, by some hon. gentleman opposite, no great regard for the reputation and good name of the Minister of the Interior, but there was shown a special interest in a gentleman from the Pacific coast, Mr. Hamilton Smith. Mr. Hamilton Smith, let me say, may be a very clever and enterprising man; he may be very wealthy or he may not be. I do not know his circumstances; it is a matter of no concern of mine; but I do know this, that he had no communication with the government. We do not profess to read the thoughts of men's minds or the hearts of men, and when Hamilton Smith came here he had no communication with the government or any member of the government with respect to railway communication into that country. He was here for some time before the contract was entered into. There was a gentleman here, Mr. Kersey, who wished to enter into a contract and the hon. leader of the Opposition complains that the government gave Mr. Kersey no particular information. Supposing the government had asked Mr. Kersey to tender, and that is practically what he was invited to do, it was not their business to say how much land or money he should receive per mile. It was his business to say how much he was willing to take. There were other parties who were in communication with the government, and although we were ready, perhaps a few days earlier, to have entered into a contract with Mackenzie & Mann, that was delayed for the purpose of enabling Mr. Kersey to complete his negotiations with capitalists in England, and to make us a tender, if it was in his power to do so. Now, he did not do that. He was not restricted as to the amount of land he would be expected to take for the construction of this road, but he told us this, that rich as those lands are in minerals he could not raise the necessary capital to go on with the undertaking upon the land grant alone. Now, that was Mr. Kersey's position. He thanked the government for the courtesy with which he had been treated, and withdrew from further negotiation, because his friends on the other side of the Atlantic failed him. Now, in the case of Mr. Hamilton Smith, he said nothing until after the contract was entered into. He wrote a letter. In that letter he condemned the all-Canadian route to which the government had committed themselves, and he undertook to point out how much more advantageous it would be to construct a road from Lynn Canal. His proposal was a United States proposal, not a Canadian proposal. It was a proposal to build a road that could be controlled by the United States, that would be in the interest of United States commerce, and to build that road with aid from the public treasury or the public domain of Canada.

Well, hon. gentlemen, that was a proposition that the government could not for a moment entertain. It would be a betrayal of the public trust, instead of undertaking to serve the public interest, if we had for a moment listened to a proposition of that sort, if it had been open to us. What then was the next thing done? Then followed the introduction of a bill into the United States chamber which was a proposal to cast discredit or doubt upon our right to navigate the Stikine River so as to affect these negotiations and prevent Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann floating their scheme on the London money market, if they had made the attempt and if they had got the bill through the two Houses with that expedition which we all supposed would have been the case at the time these negotiations were had. Let me tell hon. gentlemen that is what their friend is doing. That was inspired, I have reason to believe, by some hon. gentleman to get a charter to build a road through United States territory controlled by Congress and by the executive government of the United States for admission into the Yukon country of Canada. I should like to know, if that road were built, what chances we would have to build a Canadian road? Why it could only be done by payment out of the public treasury of Canada, and when we would undertake to build a road, we would have the regulations made with the United States relaxed in order to embarrass and hinder our success, that the work would be abandoned in order that the United States government and the people might be able to control the trade of that country in their own interest. It is a matter of amazement to me that any number of hon. gentlemen of this Senate, who reflect upon the subject, could ever for a moment entertain a proposition of that sort, yet that is what is proposed. The hope of this country, the possibility of the extension of its commerce and its trade, the protection of its interests and the maintenance of law and order in that country, depend very largely upon this measure, and the hon. gentleman opposite, and those who are supporting him, whether intentionally or unintentionally, are nevertheless contributing to this end—the control of that country by United States cities on the Pacific coast. Now, let me say this further. The hon. gentleman from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), in speaking upon this subject, spoke against this Stikine route. He spoke in favour of the railway being built from the head of Lynn Canal. My hon. friend seemed to think that this road if built would be controlled by the United States.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him, and ask this question: Did not Mr. Smith, in his letter of the 18th February, offer to build by the Stikine route on much more favourable terms than Mackenzie & Mann?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let me ask my hon. friend what signifies a proposition made by Mr. Smith after he knew the government had entered into a contract, a completed engagement with other parties?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You have discussed this point, why not this one? You are now pursuing the course of the Irishman of answering one question by asking another.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A very proper course under the circumstances. I say it is a matter of no consequence what offer was made. It would prove nothing if he had offered to build the road for nothing. I discussed the other proposition for the purpose of showing what Mr. Smith's design was. Mr. Smith came here for the purpose of defeating the attempt to establish a Canadian route under Canadian control, and then sought to secure the construction of a road from the head of Lynn Canal—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He offered to build the other as well.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Whatever he could do he did to defeat the policy and object of the government, and I regret very much that my hon. friend, or any hon. gentleman in this House, should give his influence in favour of a proposition of that sort. Now, my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) declared that we might just as well go to the head of the Lynn Inlet to construct a railway as to begin at Telegraph Creek on the Stikine River. My hon. friend's contention was that the Americans had the same right to impose duties upon us at Wrangel, or any other port where goods might be transhipped, as they had to impose duties on us on goods at Dyea and Skagway. I said that is not so, and I shall undertake to establish that that is not so. My. hon. friend yesterday, in discussing this subject, undertook to show that the government of the United States might make regulations, but those regulations must be consistent with the right of free navigation, and so my hon. friend could not for a moment maintain that the United States government could impose duty. He said more: he said no one with a grain of common sense could argue in that way, and my hon. friend said it was an idiotic contention. I will not go that far; I will not say that my hon. friend from Westmoreland has not a grain of common sense; I admit he has a great deal more than a grain, but I say on this question he was mistaken.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is my hon. friend aware of the fact that in the discussion on the Hansbury bill before the United States Senate a statement was made that the law officers of the State Department gave it as their opinion that the United States could impose duties at Fort Wrangel, notwithstanding the treaty of Washington?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not aware of it, nor do I care whether they did or not. I know that is not law, and I know that no United States law officers will, in seriously arguing this question, or maintain any such law. I hold in my hand Mr. Wheaton's work. Mr. Wheaton is a United States authority of great eminence; there is none higher. He is an authority in the United Kingdom and upon the continent of Europe as well as in the United States. Let me read what Mr. Wheaton says on this very subject:

It was a principle that the right to a thing gives a right to the means without which it should not be used, that is to say, that the means follows the end. Thus a right to navigate a river draws to it a right to moor vessels to its shores, to land on them in cases of distress, or for other necessary purposes, &c. This principle was founded in natural reason, was evidenced by the common sense of mankind, and declared by the writers before quoted. The Roman law, which, like other municipal laws, placed the navigation of their rivers on the footing of nature, as to their own citizens, by declaring them public, declared also that the right to use the shores was incident to that of the water. The laws of every country probably did the same. This must have been so understood between France and Great Britain at the treaty of Paris, where a right was ceded to British subjects to navigate the whole river, and expressly that part between the island of New Orleans and the western bank, without stipulating a word about the use of the shores, though both of them belonged then to France, and were to belong immediately to Spain. Had not the use of the shores been considered as incident to that of the water it would have been expressly stipulated, since its necessity was too obvious to have escaped either party. Accordingly, all British subjects used the shores habitually for the purposes necessary to the navigation of the river, and when a Spanish governor undertook to forbid this, and even cut loose the vessels fastened to the shores, a British vessel went immediately, moored itself opposite the town of New Orleans and set out guards with orders to fire on such as might attempt to disturb her moorings. The governor acquiesced, the right was constantly used afterwards, and no interruption ever offered.

That is the doctrine, and my hon friend will see the right to tranship and to moor are incidents to the right and navigation of the river.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Transhipment is not used under the provisions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The word transhipment is not used, but words broad enough are used; the word transhipment is expressly used by Philimore. I do not think it was necessary to bring in several volumes on this one subject when the very broad expression is used which certainly includes the one I refer to.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Does he presume to say that we could tranship goods at Wrangel without being subject to the rules and regulations of the United States government?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have said nothing of the sort; I said that the United States government, under the express provisions of the treaty, have the right to make rules and regulations, but those rules and regulations must be rules and regulations consistent with the free use of the river. They may make rules which will prevent a ship from Canada stealthily smuggling goods; but they cannot subject a vessel to the customs laws by putting a duty on British goods; that would not be the free navigation of the river.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the tariff, not the customs law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is so.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I did not say that the United States would impose duties at Wrangel, but I did say that any transhipment which might be made there must be under such rules and regulations as the United States government imposed, and my hon. friend admits now that they would have the right to impose such regulations as would prevent smuggling into the United States territory, and I referred to what Mr. Sifton said in his speech in the other House, that if these rules and regulations were vexatious, we had one relief by being able to tranship at Port Simpson.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is thinking somewhat loosely on this subject. I point out to him that what he was arguing at the time was that we had just the same rights at Dyea and Skagway as we had at Wrangel, that there is no difference—and I pointed out to him that at Dyea and Skagway they could impose a duty on every dollar's worth of goods landed if they so chose; at Wrangel they could not do so, and my hon. friend dissented from my contention. No one pretended to argue that the government of the United States could not make regulations there; they are entitled to make regulations, the treaty expressly says they may make regulations; but the treaty does not say they may make regulations inconsistent with the free navigation of the river. My contention is that those regulations must be reasonable regulations, and must not have any other object in view than that which the treaty authorizes. Now, several hon. gentlemen have praised the Dyea and Skagway route. The hon. member for Calgary said that when built the Stikine railway would be a United States road. Well, let me say this, hon. gentlemen, the Americans may use it. We are glad to have them use the road; they contribute to its support; they are not likely to travel over it without paying the usual charges. They will, of course, pay the regular duties and charges upon entering the country, when these goods are for disposal in Canada, precisely as they would pay if those goods were landed in Toronto or Montreal; there would be no difference. If they landed the goods, we would get the duties, and if United States goods went into the country to a great extent, we would receive a revenue which would contribute to the maintenance of the government and the payment of the expenses incurred; but beyond that there would be a very large sale of Canadian goods, as there is, even under the existing circumstances, no inconsiderable quantity of Canadian goods being sent into that country. Then, I find the member for Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) and the hon. member for Shell River (Mr. Boulton) both supporting the six months' hoist and opposing this bill; but both are promoting a bill to authorize the construction of a road from the head of the Lynn Inlet. I want to press this upon the attention of these hon. gentlemen who are voting for the six months' hoist, that they are supporting a proposition to build a road in United States territory which we cannot control.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—But we are giving no money or land towards it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Money is wanted ; it is sought.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—No land grant.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The House of Commons and the government are not likely to support a land grant under the circumstances, and I think there will be a good many people in this country who, after the speeches made in this House, will thank God they have a House of Commons and have a government in this country sustained by that House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then the primary object in view is not the building of a railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly, it is the building of a railway on Canadian territory. We do not propose to build a railway in California or in the Southern States or Alaska.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Nor do you propose to allow foreigners to build a railway into the Yukon, notwithstanding the fact that they ask for no subsidy, either in cash or land.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, we do not propose to put the trade of this country into the hands of people at Washington.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can the hon. gentleman reconcile the stand he takes with the policy laid down by the minister in the other House in regard to the Kettle River Railway Bill ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That bill is in the interest of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. It is a railway company seeking admission to the territory on the Pacific coast.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I wish to ask the hon. leader which is most in the interest of the mining industry of this country—to land the goods and passengers at Fort Selkirk or to land them 300 miles by river navigation away from that? I am putting the interests of the miners, who are working in that country, against the other interests he is speaking of.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is the interest of the Canadian people, whether in the Yukon country or any other portion of Canada, to favour the construction of a road on Canadian soil that will be controlled by the Canadian parliament, and subject to Canadian policy, no matter whether it be a longer or shorter route than the United States route. Besides that, let me call hon. gentlemen's attention to the fact that the town of Dawson is very near the western boundary of the Canadian territory, that when any expansion takes place in that country it must be eastward.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Alaska territory, you mean.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Canadian territory east of Daw on, and so every mine that is opened is a mine coming nearer and nearer the part where this road will enter the country. If the mines prove productive, as we all hope they may, if the country is occupied by a large mining population, then this road will be just as convenient to the mining population as if it ran nearer the United States border. Besides that, there is nothing in the world to prevent any railway corporation that has large interests in that country to select a route wherever they please. There is one thing that this contract provides for, and that is that wherever the contractors build a road for their own use, it shall be also open for the use of the miners in that country. My hon. friend spoke some time ago with regard to the use of the Stikine River under treaty of Washington. Let me read a letter which passed in 1873, after this treaty was negotiated, from the Treasury Department at Washington to one of their officers in that section of their territory. It was written in September, 1873, and reads as follows :—

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that Mr. William Moore residing at Fort Wrangel, Alaska, has addressed a complaint to the British Minister here, in which he states that the United States deputy collector had informed him that he had been instructed by his government that no foreign bottom should be allowed to carry freight through American territory on the Stikine River.

As the 26th article of the treaty of Washington, of the 8th May, 1871, provides for the free navigation of the Stikine River, I have to request you to ascertain, without delay, the truth of Mr. Moore's statement, and to transmit a copy of the instruction received at your port in relation to the navigation of the Stikine, with a copy of the instruction given to the deputy collector at Fort Wrangel on the subject, and state the practice of the deputy collector with the authority on which it is based.

Hon. gentlemen will see that at that time the rights of the British population were asserted by a British minister, and that the United States government at that time also called the officer to account for having misunderstood his instructions. We have been told over and over again, during this debate, that this is not an all-Canadian route. What do hon. gentlemen mean by this not being an all-Canadian route? Not a foot of this railway is within miles of the United States border. From its initiation to its termination it is wholly in Canadian territory. It terminates on a river which runs through a portion of the United States. Is that a reason for saying that it is not an all-Canadian route? If the Canadian people, under the solemn compact made between the government of Her Majesty and the government of the United States, are entitled to use that river for all commercial purposes in what respect does it differ from a Canadian river? As long as peace continues, that treaty remains in force; it could only be terminated by a war between the two countries, or by their mutual consent, and we are not looking for war, and not looking for a termination of the treaty; but, in any event, we have made the southern terminus of the road at a point from which it may be extended directly south 180 miles to a sea-port in our own territory. The government expected, if this contract was confirmed, to ask parliament for a small appropriation to construct a wagon road; so that if it should become necessary to use it for military purposes, it could be done. It would be adequate for that purpose for the present, and if the Yukon country should prove as valuable as we hoped it might, then the railroad could be extended from Teslin Lake down to the seashore in Canada, and a road would be established which would be used, not only during the season of navigation, but throughout the year. It has been said that our grant of land to this company is a prodigal grant, that we have given more to this company than the company ought to have received for building that road. That railway was estimated by the engineer to cost about $25,000 a mile under ordinary circumstances. But the circumstances are not ordinary. The wages, in all probability, that these contractors will be obliged to pay during the season of construction would be the same wages that miners receive. Unless they approximated such wages, the men could not be retained on the road, and every one will understand under these circumstances, that the road will cost much more than a road of that kind under ordinary conditions. What was the duty of the government? The country did not want to give money; they did not want further burdens imposed on the treasury. That country is being opened up in the interests of the mining class, a large percentage of whom are not British subjects, persons of foreign birth going in there to carry on mining operations, and we thought that the best and wisest course—and in that I know we have the concurrent opinion of the country—was to make that country, if possible, bear the burden of the obligation that we were obliged to incur on behalf of the Yukon district. That is what we did. At all events, that is what we have undertaken to do. And now as to the amount. We felt it our duty to give our assent to such an area as would be pretty certain to secure the financing of the operations of the contractors. That was arranged. There was urgency. There was necessity to secure early admission to the country, and in order to secure that early admission it was necessary that these men should not fail in their financial undertaking. We could have given them one-twentieth of the part of land—yes, we could have given them one-hundredth part of the 3,750,000 acres; we could have given them 37,500 acres, and given them all the placer-mining it is possible for them to receive under this contract, but what would have been the effect if we had given them so small an area of land? They would be likely to fail in the English money market. They had not the same chance of succeeding with a small area as with a large one, and so the government adopted a course which they believed to be best in the public interest. Let me illustrate, going back six miles on each side of the base line, you are not adding anything to the placer mines put in the possession of the company. No placer deposit has been found more than 100 yards in width, so that the greater portion of that land added on each side, which goes to make up the area, adds nothing whatever to the gold deposit on the lands that pass into the possession of the company.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—No one can tell that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly, if it is placer mining they can tell. Now, with regard to the quartz mining, every one knows how uncertain the direction or length of the lodes may be, where there is a deposit in the quartz rock. Supposing the prospectors of the company were to find what they regard as favourable indications of gold deposited in the rock, they are obliged then, in order to acquire that property, to lay out a line 24 miles in length and to include that in one of the alternate blocks which they receive. They might not get another on the whole distance except that one. There is no certainty that they would. The chances are quite as much against their receiving one as they are in favour of their receiving more. Let me call the attention of the House to another fact: If you take the opinion of any writers on the subject of gold mining, they will tell you that the mining operations which have been carried on throughout the world, taken as a whole, have not yielded more gold than the value of the labour and capital invested. My hon. friends know this, that they often read reports of very large sums of money taken out by miners and carried back with them to their homes. They are published abroad. Every newspaper reports the success that has attended the fortunate miner, but there are hundreds and thousands who never bring back anything like the amount they have expended to get into the country, and there is no report of their case, and if you wish to know what the value of their mining operations has been, you must include those who fail along with those who succeed, and you must estimate the value of the whole and consider the value of the labour spent and the capital invested in order that they might reach that country. Now, when the company acquires mining lands, the company are not in the position of the fortunate miner, but in the position of all these miners, taken in their collective capacity. That is the test by which you judge what is fair and what is not fair, and let me say this, that when you come to the subject of quartz mining, when you consider the amount of machinery used, the cost of it, the taking of it into the country, the number of men that must be employed in order to make the property acquired valuable, you will see that if the government had actually given the land to a company that were obliged to do nothing else than work the quartz mines, they would have been conferring a valuable privilege, not simply upon those who had received the lands, but upon the entire population which would go into the country in consequence, who would there labour, who would consume the goods and the food imported for their maintenance from other parts of the Dominion. I say that is the position of things. These men acquiring those mines, if they build a highway by which men can reach a market for the products of their industry, and miners can have ingress and egress to the gold fields, they have conferred on this country a lasting benefit. It is not what the government receive from the miners that is of greatest value to the country, it is the trade developed, by what the miners consume, it is the foreign goods that are brought in and on which the duty is paid; it is the home-produced goods that have given employment in the mills and factories where those goods are produced and the freight paid to the railroads that carry them. All these go to make up the considerations which ought to influence an administration. I do not expect that the government will receive a very large amount of money from the miners by the payment of royalties. I do not suppose they will receive a very large amount from the company in the payment of the little royalty charged them, but I do expect, if the road is built and the country occupied and the population go there, whether seeking their own fortunes in placer mining or entering into the employment of the company, that they will by the consumption of the products of other portions of the country largely contribute towards the well-being of the entire population of Canada. There are matters which I think the people who have discussed and criticized this proposition of the government adversely have overlooked altogether—the political considerations. I do not pretend to say that we would spend a large sum of money in the defence of that country. When you consider the larger population that would go thither, the country from which they come, the little restrait that law exercises over them in that country, it is a very great thing with them that they should feel that it is in the power of the government to exercise control over them if they disobey the law. Many hon. gentlemen have said that these miners coming from the mines of the United States have been law-abiding residents in southern British Columbia. I have no doubt that that is perfectly true, but the mines in southern British Columbia are easily accessible. If they were disorderly or riotous, it would be easy to send in a force there to restore order, and the fact that that country is of easy access has an immense influence over the minds of men in preventing them becoming disobedient to the law and disregardful of the rights of others. Now, that is the condition of things in southern British Columbia; that is not the condition of things in the Yukon country. That is the condition of things which we desire to see established in the Yukon country and that is one of the purposes, and not by any means the least important of the purposes, which the construction of this road would have promoted. Now, let me say a word or two with regard to what some hon. gentlemen speak of as the monopoly clause establishing this road. I do not perhaps understand what it is that hon. gentlemen who have spoken of monopoly mean by that term. I know this, that every railway that has ever been built is a monopoly where it is not actively competing with some other means of transit and travel, and even where there are competing points, usually railways come to an understanding with each other and agree upon their charges, and so the monopoly is re-established notwithstanding the multiplication of their numbers. That is the condition of things that exists everywhere, and that will continue to exist until the government assume some jurisdiction over railways with a view to regulating their charges; but in this respect the railway constructed into the Yukon country does not differ from any other railway. Provision is made that high charges may be imposed for a limited period of time. Every one who is anxious to see a railway constructed into that country will admit that that is a reasonable provision. If you have few persons travelling, if the gold deposits should not be what we believe them to be, if it should prove to be less valuable than we supposed, if the population should diminish in numbers so that there would be little for the railway to do, then, of course, the charges would need to be higher than they would be under other circumstances. But they are provisions that are reasonable in the interest, not only of the railway company, but of the public, who desire to see communication established and communication sustained.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is a monopoly in clause 4 of the contract.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend refers to clause 4. It is not a monopoly clause.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is in the hands of the company for five years.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let me read that clause. I am afraid my hon. friend has not read it with care. The clause reads:

> For five years from the first September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal, or thereabouts, or from any point at or near the international boundary between Canada and Alaska, into the Yukon district.

There is the restriction. There is the area within which that restriction is to operate.

> And for five years from the said date no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors and the contractors' company, to assist in building any such railway in that district.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Within that area.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, within that area, and why not? Do hon. gentlemen think that it would be the exercise of common sense to spend a large amount of money to acquire ingress into that country to furnish facilities for traffic and travel, and then build a competing line to United States territory, to make that railway property less valuable to those who have invested their moneys in it? I say it would be an unreasonable proposition.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—In clause 5 of the schedule, hon. gentlemen will see they have a preference to extend the road to Port Simpson.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly, and I think that was necessary. Hon. gentlemen know well the difficulties that have arisen in connection with the Manitoba and North-western road, by different sections being in the hands of independent companies. When they are to build this road from Teslin Lake southward to Telegraph Creek, it was only reasonable, if that road was to be extended to Observatory Inlet, 180 miles further, that the additional 180 miles of the road should be constructed by the same company, if reasonable arrangements for that construction could be made. My hon. friend will see that is a proper arrangement, and I think when he examines it closely he will find nothing in it of which he should disapprove. The hon. leader of the opposition, in speaking on this subject yesterday, asked me if we had extinguished the Indian title. That was a very extraordinary question for the hon. gentleman to put. I think he told us in an earlier debate that the government of which he was a member had taken an interest in that country, that they had sent explorers there, that mining operations had been carried on in that region, and my hon. friend, although he had been exercising for several years authority over the country, as far as it was necessary to do so, had not thought it worth while to extinguish the Indian title.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We never attempted to sell any lands or give any license; hence there were no titles to extinguish.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend know that a large portion of this continent was sold without the title first being extinguished? Take the case of the Hudson's Bay Company. The King granted a charter of the lands in free and common soccage, just in the ordinary form of any other conveyance of land, without extinguishing the Indian title, and left them to do as they pleased with regard to the extinguishing of the title. My hon. friend knows the Hudson's Bay Company transferred a portion of that territory to Lord Selkirk, and he held it for a time, and retransferred it to them. Lands were sold all along the river, and titles acquired, and it was only after the country came into the possession of Canada that steps were taken to extinguish the Indian title to these lands. Every charter that was given, the charter to Lord Baltimore, the charter to the Duke of York, the charter to Wm. Penn, to Mr. Oglethorpe and to the Virginia Company, were grants in free and common soccage in areas large enough to constitute large provinces, without the Indian title being extinguished. It was subsequently extinguished, and the power of the Crown does not depend upon whether the Indian title is extinguished or not. It is not a legal title. It is a mere matter of grace. The recognition by the Crown of a certain right to hunt and fish over the land, and the extinguishment of the Indian title —not its transfer, because there is no such thing as transfer of Indian title—is a mere matter of public policy for the purpose of preserving peace and good-will between the Indians and the white population. In that country the Indians have never given rise to any difficulty, and there has never been any demand on their part and there are certain advantage in leaving things as they are in that regard.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Allow me to point out the difference. In the cases of which the hon. gentleman has referred, no provision was made that the Hudson's Bay Company should extinguish the Indian title. In the bargain made between the Canadian government and the British government, signed by Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir George Cartier and other delegates, a special and distinct provision was made that compensation, whatever that might be, to the Indians, should be paid before any attempt was made to sell or dispose of lands in the territories. There is no analogy at all between the cases.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—When we come to discuss that question, the hon. gentleman will find we are acting strictly within our agreement and strictly in conformity to the law. My hon. friend also discussed the independence of this body, undertaking to vindicate the majority of this House from the charge of political bias. My hon. friend said they objected to the Nanaimo Bill of one government and the Short Line Bill of another, and they rejected the Drummond County Railway Bill last session, and did a number of other things, all of which tended to show perfect impartiality. I dissent from that statement of my hon. friend. He knows he and his friends around him did not fight the Conservative government in this House. My hon. friend referred to the Criminal Code being rejected one session. I think it was brought down the last day of the session, it was not considered but it was not rejected. The Senate could not, without prolonging the period for which the session was intended to continue, deal with the question. I do not pretend that I have laid aside my political feeling and inclination in coming to this House. I do not think there would be any advantage in that. There are certain constitutional duties imposed upon me here that are not imposed in the House of Commons, and I do not ask my hon. friend to give up his strong feeling against us and his strong conviction that there is nothing good comes out of Nazareth. That is a part of his habit and education. But my hon. friend does not forget that in this House a committee was appointed to inquire into the conduct of Mr. Mackenzie, as Minister of Public Works, and that it condemned his choice of the Kaministiquia River as the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That choice was denounced, and the Port Arthur terminus was preferred, and $900,000 was spent upon the breakwater in order to form a harbour there, and after the railway went out of the hands of the administration and a company was organized, the company vindicated the wisdom of Mr. Mackenzie's action by choosing the Kaministiquia River as the terminus of the railway, and my hon. friend knows that, as things now stand, hundreds of thousands of dollars of public money were wasted by the attempt to cast discredit upon the head of the Liberal administration.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But there is a distinction between Fort William and seven or eight miles up the river.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I know the country very well, and those expenditures which Mr. Mackenzie proposed to make will be necessary there. My hon. friend pretended to say there was no political feeling in that act, and if that stood alone it would be an indication that this House is no more exempt from the political feeling than the House of Commons, although it is exempt from the responsibility and the regard for public opinion, which does exercise a controlling influence in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is very strong language.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman knows that the contractors who entered into an agreement with the government trusted to the fairness of both Houses of parliament, and in order to make the most of the favourable season of the year in which their undertaking was begun, they expended large sums of money. They exhibited, under great difficulties and adverse circumstances, remarkable energy. They have been distinguished in this country as contractors in whom the labouring men upon railways and public works have the greatest confidence, and towards whom they have the utmost good-will. They have never had any quarrel or difficulty with those in their employment, and they have to-day 2,000 men engaged in undertaking to push this road through in order that the men who are going to the Yukon country to seek their fortune may be enabled to reach there. Thousands have gone to Dyea and Skagway without succeeding in getting through. It is reported—I do not think the numbers are exaggerated—that about 5,000 are on their way up the Stikine River to undertake to go through by the route in which these men are engaged. At the present time I am told—and I believe my authority is perfectly reliable—they have spent upon rails and upon other necessary appliances for the early construction of this road $500,000, and this House, by its vote to-night, proposes to throw all that property upon the hands of these men without compensation. This House, by its vote to-night, proposes to deny to this country access into that district during the coming season, to furnish supplies, to maintain life and to maintain order. This was a duty that devolved upon the government, and the government should be allowed to carry out their policy, whether it was a wise or unwise policy. If wise, the credit would have been theirs, in which this House would have shared, and if unwise, the fault would have been wholly that of the government. The Senate propose to take that matter out of the hands of the government. You propose to shift to your own shoulders the responsibility for every misfortune that may overtake those people and for every loss that the people of this country may sustain, while at the same time you have no executive organization to do a single act in respect of the matter. I have expressed my views on this question in reply to what has been said in objection to the measure of the administration, without any intention of being offensive to any person in this House. I desire to express my strong conviction that if the hon. gentlemen who have spoken so strongly against this bill think they are not actuated by party and partisan feeling, they are certainly labouring under a very great delusion.

But let me say this, that whether this measure proves mischievous to this country in a great degree, or in a less degree, the fault of that will not rest upon the House of Commons nor upon the government, but upon this House. The eyes of the country are upon the Senate of Canada, not with the view of approving of the course which the majority have intimated their intention to pursue; and my hon. friends will not have very long to wait until they discover that upon this question the public feeling and sympathy is with the government and not with the majority of the Senate. What the people want is to see that road constructed. They may complain if they see proper, whoever pleases may complain, that the government has paid too much; but when you undertake, under pretense of finding fault with the government and censuring the policy of the government, to condemn a measure necessary to the work of administration, then you are going very far beyond that which is the constitutional rule and usage applicable to the case. Whatever may be your action, I know this much, that the government of this country has in this matter done its duty, its whole duty, and has acted in the public interest in submitting the second reading of this bill to you to-night.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was adopted by the following vote :—

Ottawa, Thursday, 31st March, 1898.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

MANITOBA SCHOOL LANDS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a statement of the quantity of lands allotted for school purposes in Manitoba; the quantity of said lands sold, and the prices at which they have been sold; the amount received on that account; the amounts still due to the government; the manner in which this fund is invested and administered; the amount already paid to the province of Manitoba, how much on the capital, if any, and how much on the interest; the amount still at the credit of the province, whether on the capital or on the interest; the dates of payment in each case and the amount of each payment; and also, all the correspondence, papers, memoranda and Orders in Council relating thereto, up to date.

He said: I do not propose to make any lengthy remarks on this motion to-day. I desire simply to draw the attention of the government to the fact that in the other House a resolution will be brought down by which parliament will be asked to hand over to the local government of Manitoba a part of the proceeds of the school land grant. I also desire to call attention to the fact that this school land grant, and consequently the proceeds of the same, are a trust vested in the hands of the Dominion Government for the whole population. We know that at present there is a large section of that population in Manitoba which is deprived of its legitimate rights in school matters. The minority have been deprived for years of their legitimate share of the local government grants and of their legitimate share of the school taxes in the province, and have been obliged besides to pay out of their own funds for the support of their schools. It is proposed to hand over to the local government, in this present unsettled condition of things, a part of that trust, and I desire to express the belief that this policy, under the present circumstances, is unwise and may lead to injustice. I do not think that any portion of these school land grants, or the proceeds of them, should be handed over at present to the provincial authorities, unless the minority in Manitoba is assured of its legitimate share of the same. I wish to point out to the government what our views are, and what the danger is. The chances are that the local government will take that money and use it in its own way and will deprive the minority of their legitimate share of that money.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Do you refer to the university lands or the general school lands?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The general school lands. I hope the government will be kind enough to bring down the papers at the earliest date possible. The resolution I have referred to, as we are all aware, may come before the House of Commons at a very early day, and consequently we must have all the information necessary to discuss the matter fully and intelligently.

Hon Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that we have no objection at all to the motion being adopted. I cannot say what time it may take to make a copy of the papers, but I have no doubt the work will be done with as much expedition as possible, and as soon as we can lay them before the House, having regard to other returns that are being prepared, we will do so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I fully concur in the remarks of the hon. gentleman who proposed this motion, and I hope the government will see its way to do justice in the premises. The report of the proceedings which took place in the other House would lead to the belief that a further delay will not be necessary, because I think all these papers were brought down or an answer was given to a question put by a member of the other House. Most if not all of the details have been given, so that we will not expect very much delay.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Was it this session they were brought down?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes. The question was put by Mr. LaRivière, I think. At all events, the answer given in the other House may be valuable to us. I think when Manitoba came into confederation it was provided in the Act that was passed that a certain amount of land would be allotted to school purposes. Those lands were to be sold and the proceeds of the sale were to be devoted specially to school purposes. At the time when the schools were put on an equal footing, the legislation brought by Mr. Martin and followed up by Mr. Sifton and Mr. Greenway at the time, had not been the law of the country, but since that time, as we are all aware, that legislation came in force and a considerable portion of the community has been deprived of its schools. If the rumour is true that by the legislation that is attempted to be brought in the other House we are going to deprive one part of the population of its right in the proceeds of these schools, I hope the government of the day, which had so much to say in the last general election in favour of the protection of the rights of the minority, will see their way this time not to do more injustice than was done by their friends in Manitoba, and they will look twice at the question before putting in the hands of Mr. Greenway what in the spirit of this constitution has been secured to the schools whatever they were at the time. These are the few remarks I intended to make in support of the motion, and we hope that the government will see that justice is done.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If I understand rightly the observation addressed to the House by the hon. senator who spoke last, these returns have already been brought down in the House of Commons, and if they have been brought down there, they are certainly as available to the members of this House as to the members of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—No return has been brought down in the House of Commons, but an answer has been given to certain questions put by Mr. LaRivière, and it is not as complete as I should like to have it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Very well, then the return will be brought down.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate all correspondence, memoranda, papers and Orders in Council relating to the Manitoba School Question, since the 1st of July, 1896, up to this date.

He said: In rising to make this motion I want to say at once that I have no desire of embarrassing the government in anything they may think fit to do with a view of settling that school question; but as every one is aware, the air is full of rumours; it is but fair that we should know how matters stand. Apart from that, I make this motion more especially in relation to the motion I have just made. It may be important to know in what position the school question is as between this government and the government of Manitoba, before we arrive at any decision in the other matter. The position in which the school question may be might influence our decision on the measure. It is the principal object I have in view in making the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

METIS CLAIMS IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY rose to Ask the government if it is their intention to make any inquiry as to the claims of the Metis population in the North-west Territories who have claims, or are in any way entitled to government scrip, such as was given to the Metis population after the union of Manitoba in confederation.

He said: I have understood from parties interested in this matter that at the time the last adjustment of those claims was made, there were some parties whose names were not considered, and they desire to know if the government is going to take any action, or how the matter stands.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The matter is under consideration, I may say to my hon. friend.

A PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to move:

That when the Senate adjourns on Friday next, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 19th April, at 8.30 o'clock in the evening.

He said: I have been asked by a number of members of this House to put this motion on this paper, to give an opportunity to the House to pronounce on the question. I hope the government will treat it as a government measure.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say to the hon. gentleman it is too soon to make a proposition of this kind. We have had before us but the consideration of one measure for several days, and we had better make some little progress with the business before we take into consideration the question of adjournment. We may consider it perhaps Tuesday of next week, if my hon. friend will allow his motion to stand.

The motion was allowed to stand.

THE PLEBISCITE BILL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY rose to Ask the government when they intend, if they do intend, to introduce the promised "Plebiscite Bill," and whether the bill will be first introduced in the House of Commons or Senate?

He said: I am prompted to ask this question from the fact that early in the session it was promised that the Plebiscite Bill would be brought down in two weeks. I should like to know whether it is to be brought down and introduced in this House or in the House of Commons. Though I opposed the government measure which was before us yesterday, I may inform the government if this bill is introduced here, I shall give it my support—I do not care in what shape it may be. I shall vote for it here, and vote for prohibition in the country, and if a bill is brought into parliament to introduce prohibition, I will vote for that, and if it carries, I will see, in the town where I live, that the prohibition is enforced. In my opinion, the Senate is not the proper place to introduce the bill, but whether it is introduced here or not, when it comes before us, the government shall have my hearty support for that measure.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The bill will certainly be before both Houses this session, but whether it will be first introduced in this House or in the House of Commons, I cannot inform my hon. friend.

PACIFIC AND YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (F) "An Act to incorporate the Pacific and Yukon Navigation and Mining Company." He said: It is with a degree of trepidation that I beg to move the second reading of this bill. As hon. gentlemen probably know, this bill is one promoted by Mr. Hamilton Smith and his associates for the building of a road from Pyramid Harbour via the Dalton trail to the Five Finger Rapids. It has been discussed so largely in the press and adverted to in this House, that I shall not enter into any explanations.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am opposed to this measure and I am opposed to the second reading of the bill. I do not believe it is in the public interest, and therefore I shall not give the bill my support and I shall, so far as I can, fasten on the hon. gentleman and those who choose to support it, the responsibility of having proposed a measure that I believe to be wholly against the public interests of Canada and calculated to promote the interests of traders on the western coast of the United States. When I look at the bill I find it is practically to promote railway construction in United States territory. This undertaking is declared in the bill to be for the general advantage of Canada. I say it is a bill for the general disadvantage of Canada. It is a bill to promote the trading interest of the people of San Francisco and Seattle and to enable them to make, practically, for all commercial purposes, the Yukon country a portion of the western territory of the republic. My hon. friend and a number of others spoke against the government bill that was before the Senate with respect to the gauge. This bill proposes to construct a railway of 3 feet gauge from Pyramid Harbour, at the head of Lynn Canal, into Canada. Now Lynn Canal is at the present time under the jurisdiction of the United States. This bill would enable the United States to control, not the commerce of the United States strip of territory, because the territory owned by the United States even if we concede to them the territory to the summit of the heights which surround the inlet, would be a very small area indeed and no railway would be required for that purpose. The railway is required for the trade in the Yukon country, in a territory wholly Canadian, and this bill is to enable the people who reside upon the Pacific coast in the United States to possess themselves of that trade. There is nothing in the world at any moment to prevent the United States making such regulations as they please. They need not extend any bonding privilege to the people in our country there, nor would they give the bonding privilege unless we made large concessions to their trade which would at least put them on a footing of equality with our own traders in our own country. I say that such a proposition is not one loyal to the interests of that country or loyal to the rights and interests of the Canadian people. If the United States had given to them the control of that territory, whether we would afterwards have any standing in our own country or not would depend upon the concessions that we were willing to make to the people of the United States. We proposed the construction of a railway to give access to that territory, and the hon. gentlemen in this House rejected that proposition yesterday. That proposition would have enabled us to determine upon what terms the United States products should be admitted into that country, but in this bill it is for the United States government and people to determine upon what conditions the trade and commerce of Canada shall pass from one section of Canadian territory into another section of Canadian territory. It is a proposal to place the trade of the Yukon country under the control of the government at Washington. I am not willing that that should be done. My hon. friend has undertaken to clear the way for this bill by the course taken upon by the government measure and he now proposes the second reading of this bill. I am not prepared to support that motion. I say this legislation would be to the lasting detriment of this country. Let us suppose for a moment that the road was constructed; supposing we undertake to send goods through that territory, if the the United States would charge us duty it would be in their power to do so if they see proper. They could say "you shall not send a pound of goods of any sort across this strip of border land on the coast without paying duty to the United States, unless you permit the goods of the United States to be sold in that territory upon certain condi tions." We would be absolutely at their mercy. We would be under their control, and I say I am not willing to assume so humiliating a position, and one that would be to the lasting detriment of the trade of Canada in that country, no matter how long it might continue an integral part of this Dominion. Why, the country would not be worth holding. We would have no political object in maintaining it. We would have a large expense to incur for the purpose of government, and would derive no possible advantage as a compensation for that expenditure. I ask the hon. gentlemen in this House to seriously consider the character of the proposition that is being submitted to them. You have a gentleman coming here proposing and asking the government of this country to take up this scheme, to construct this railway. You had him going to Washington and succeeding in getting through the Senate a measure threatening us, and, with regard to our treaty rights upon the Stikine River; you had another gentleman coming here from the city of San Francisco, pretending to be a delegate from the United States miners in this country, supporting the scheme, and I say now you have the scheme itself as a result of all these co-ordinate forces acting together against the government of this country. You have now the scheme itself submitted to you and it is for you to say whether you will recognize the right of the people upon the western coast of the United States who are undertaking—and I am not blaming them for it—to secure the trade of the country on their behalf, if we are so very far ready to play traitor to the interests of this country for the purpose of promoting their interests against our own. I cannot believe that this House, notwithstanding the course that it has adopted towards the government measure, are prepared to go that far. I am not prepared to believe that this House is ready to sacrifice the hope of the people of Canada, the industrial classes in Canada to the interests of the people of the United States. In my opinion that cannot be tolerated in this country. That is the course which hon. gentlemen are proposing, and I therefore propose to put the responsibility of adopting such legislation on this House. I move that this bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Without passing any opinion on the bill before the House, I would mention to the hon. Minister of Justice that there are two charters now in existence, passed by this parliament last year, giving access by the Lynn Canal into the Yukon country, and that whether this charter now before us passes or not, it makes no difference, and I apprehend no difficulty. The government of this country have the whip hand in this matter. Supposing the United States to-morrow should put any obstruction on our commerce going in by a railway from the Lynn Canal, this government could very easily stop their products going in at the boundary and say: "We will remove our custom-house and not admit your goods if you restrict us in this way." So that the Minister of Justice is quite wrong. But what is of much more importance is the fact that there are now three local charters in British Columbia, given by that government, to build towards the Yukon. There are two charters on the Stikine route and there is a grant of a million and a half acres of land and three hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, attached to one charter, and there is another charter with 750,000 acres and certain concessions to the Cassiar Central Railway. The government to-day, or the contractors who are supposed to be on the ground now, can very easily arrange with the other two companies to carry a road by the Stikine River if it is found to be a practicable and proper road, and that is a matter the government should take advantage of at once and negotiate with the holders of those charters. I am perfectly willing to let this bill go before the Railway Committee and be discussed there. It will take some time before the charter can come up and we will see how things are developing in the meantime. I am not for or against the bill, but I wish it to go to committee and I shall vote against a six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—In looking over this bill I at once became convinced that I could not vote for it. The views I took of the government bill—and I expressed them in this House—were to the effect that I would never give my vote to a bill presented by the government to open a road to the Yukon district on the western side of the Rockies.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The reason I gave was that it was giving the advantage of the trade of Canada to United States people only and the whole of Canada except British Columbia would be deprived of the advantage of the trade in the Yukon country. British Columbia is on the other side of the Rockies, and should that province desire a road going north towards the Yukon, it has full power to construct it, but as to this parliament incorporating companies to build such roads, I believe we ought not to allow such a thing to be done, and if it is possible for the government to prevent the two other companies that have been chartered last year from going on with their road, I should think they ought to do so and I would be ready to support them. As I said before, I was against the government bill particularly on account of the land grant. But I had others which I made known to this House on the 29th of March last. But the main reason was the fact of the road being on the western side of the Rockies. I could not conceive that a country like this would make a road which would be to the sole advantage of our neighbours and deprive our people of the advantage of the great trade and commerce which will be the consequence of the opening up of the Yukon district. So in all those cases, if I am present, I shall vote against all these demands for incorporations for bills on the other side of the Rockies.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Whilst my hon. friend has put my name down as seconder of this motion, I may say that it was without my consent but simply as an act of courtesy to him I allowed it to be done. You will remember in my speech in regard to the government measure I was opposed to any road on the same ground as the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. I do not apprend there will be any danger of starvation in that country and therefore there is no urgent necessity for a railway to prevent such a calamity. I am opposed to building a road on the coast with Canadian funds, because I do not believe the trade of Canada will justify it. I do not thoroughly understand the purport of this bill as the Minister of Justice does, and I am quite willing to be guided in that sense by his judgment and let them take the responsibility of rejecting the bill.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I may say that my sympathies are very much with Mr. Hamilton Smith in the way he has been treated, yet I cannot bring myself to vote in favour of the bill of my hon. friend. I think there is a great deal in what the Minister of Justice says, that this is putting the trade of the Yukon into the hands of the Americans, and I do not think they should have trade which is ours and ought to belong to us, and in which they would not reciprocate with us. I do not understand very much about this bill, but I am unwilling to vote in its favour. I wish very much that the matter could be more fully discussed.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not share the view of hon. gentlemen who have expressed themselves so far on this question, and I do not think that the grounds that the hon. Minister of Justice has taken in opposition to this charter are tenable from a sound standard. What is the proposition of this bill? It merely asks the privilege of building into Canadian territory as far as Fort Selkirk, crossing 15 to 20 miles of United States territory in order to get there. The ocean port is theirs, the railway is ours, with the exception of 15 or 20 miles.

Hon Mr. MILLS—They claim 35.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is a question that has to be settled yet. What is the condition in that western country? The Americans own the great territory of Alaska, west of the 141st meridian; it is closed to them for 8 or 9 months in the year. They cannot possibly, excepting during three months, get in anything at all to carry on their operations.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then they are under our control.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We can say we won't let you get in; you have your long River Yukon open for three months of the year, and if you are not satisfied with that we won't let you in through our territory. That is the position the hon. minister just proposed to assume to a neighbourly nation. If you take that Alaska territory in conjunction with our own Canadian territory, both territories being about equal in size and both under the same condition during the winter time, they can only be reached by means of a railway in the winter time. The distance from Pyramid Harbour to Fort Selkirk is about 288 miles, 260 or 270 of that, according to the location of the boundary, is in Canadian territory; then from Fort Selkirk down to the 141st meridian is about 250 miles. Now, should the United States government block that road which is a means to carry produce into their mining country west of the 141st meridian, they are going to injure themselves more than us, and I should say would not refuse to enter into the most friendly arrangement. They contribute to the transportation on Canadian soil to the extent of something like 550 miles to reach the 141st meridian. Now, are we going to be so blind as to say to them: "We refuse to accept your trade to the extent of 550 miles through Canadian territory?" And what for? That I cannot possibly conceive, because we are trying to force United States trade out of that country and into our own.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Does the hon. gentleman believe that it will compensate for the great trade of the Yukon district which we will lose by that?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I have not come to that point. I quite agree with my hon. friend from the stand he takes in developing Canadian trade from the east as the most economical and most profitable and the most successful that can be carried on either from the east or west of the 141st meridian; but I am now discussing this point from the question of two neighbourly nations, both of whom have interests in that country, and one of which is absolutely, for 9 months of the year, excluded from communication with its own people west of the 141st meridian, unless we grant the concession to them that is asked under a bill of this kind. Now, I am not prepared to say to the United States, "we won't let you have access to your territory because any trade that is developed by this concession is going to build an ocean port on the Pacific coast out of whatever Canadian trade may pass through it." That is the stand that the leader of this House takes on this question. Is that a statesmanlike position to assume? Is that the position for this House to assume—that is from the standpoint of neighbourliness to the United States? The geographical position is very peculiar in that they own the long strip of coast line. The argument that they may close their doors, and that they may put obstructions and all that sort of thing in our way to utilize the 550 miles of transportation that it opens up to us does not count in the matter, because we have far greater advantages to give to the people of the United States in the development of that road that they have to give to us.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—This has been done before. When we passed the Canadian Pacific Railway incorporation bill, did we not do the same thing, prevent any road from being opened south of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Do you think I disapproved of the government measure because it had that monopoly clause? Indeed I did not. It is only right, and it is only using ordinary means of protection to ourselves to restrict the powers of those who may defeat our views. Have not the Americans some ports from which they can have a road through Alaska? I believe they have.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The monopoly clause of the Canadian Pacific Rilway is not a parallel case. Under the monopoly clause of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we had a perfect right to build down to the United States boundary, in a southerly direction, so as to draw the trade of the United States to the Canadian Pacific Railway, but the monopoly clause prevented us from building a road in a south-easterly direction, which would take the trade of the Canadian country into the United States.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would ask my hon. friend if we were to start from a Canadian port and build in Canadian territory into the Yukon territory, whether the United States could not use our road just as well as they could use this?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am coming to that point. What I wish to point out in connection with what my hon. friend has just said is this, that the Grant Trunk Railway has its commencement in Chicago, Ill., and its terminus in Portland, Maine. It is a Canadian road, yet we do not see the United States declaring that the produce of the western states shall not pass through Canada. Although competing railways have often threatened to do away with the bonding privilege it is only a bugbear. Our neighbours do not deny us the right to carry freight through their country, nor do we deny them the right to carry freight through ours. Why should the bugbear be raised in Alaska when it has no influence down here in the east? I have not the slightest fear of anything of the kind. I listened with a good deal of interest to what the hon. minister just said with regard to our ocean ports. I am as loyal and patriotic a Canadian as there is anywhere: I want to see our country have every advantage that our geographical position gives us, but when you talk about building a road from Glenora as a competing route to a line from Pyramid Harbour, you are doing something very much as if you were trying to make water run up hill. From Portland Canal up to the Lynn Canal is about 300 or 350 miles. If you tried to make an ocean port at Portland Canal for the purpose of developing the Klondike region you would have to convey all your freight and traffic, whether from Canada or the United States, if you limit transportation to that route, over 600 or 700 miles of railway when we have already an ocean route. The southern part of Teslin Lake is at the 60th parallel; Lynn Canal is on the same parallel, so you are actually proposing to build a railroad through a very difficult and expensive country in order to compete with an ocean route which will place you further on your road than you would be when you reach Teslin Lake. You are taxing the trade of Canada and of the United States for that purpose, and if you go no farther than Teslin Lake it is only a summer route. You are taxing the miners who live in that country, for the same purpose. You are adding to the cost of transportation and the cost of all supplies. The success of a country like that depends upon the economy with which the mines can be worked, so that from that standpoint I do not think the objections that the hon. leader of the House has raised are valid. I am not opposing the action of the government in this respect with any desire to obstruct. It is an honest criticism that I am making on this matter. I am applying the best judgment I can to indicate the best location for a line which will most successfully develop that region.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Do you think that the United States government would have given the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway the right of passing goods in bond through the state of Maine if they had not Portland as a seaport? Do they not know that by doing so they build up Portland at the expense of St. John and Halifax? Do you think that if Canada owned Portland that the United States government would allow us the privilege of passing our goods in bond through Maine? I am inclined to think not.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—In reply to that, we have the Canadian Pacific Railway, which leaves our border at Moosejaw and goes for 2,000 miles through United States territory and crosses into Canada again at Sault Ste. Marie. There is a road which passes through United States territory from one part of Canada to another part of Canada and to a Canadian seaport. The United States make no objection to that. They get the advantage, whatever it is, of the transportation of freight and passengers through their country on the Canadian Pacific Railway. As you all know, the Canada Southern Railway runs through Ontario in the same way, taking advantage of our geographical position. We have the advantage of our geographical position, and we utilize it for our own benefit. If we are precluded from using our Montreal port for six months of the year, that is the misfortune of climatic difficulties which present themselves, but I do not conceive for a moment that it is a sound argument against the introduction of this measure that the United States people are going to do something after we build this road that will block us from using it. I say that Vancouver, Victoria and all those coast cities will be immensely benefited by being able to utilize railway connection that takes you to the heart of that district up to Fort Selkirk, where I believe the government are going to establish their headquarters, and tax the country to build five or six hundred miles of railway to compete with the ocean route between Portland Canal and Lynn Canal. This bill before us is different from the bill we discussed and rejected yesterday. What we discussed yesterday was the remuneration we were giving. It was not a question of building 150 miles of railway that the government thought was advisable. I do not think that was the intention of the Senate at all. It did not enter into the question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend himself argued that this Lynn Canal route was a better route. He proposed himself to go by this route rather than by the all-Canadian route.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON – If there was a railway from Lynn Canal and one from Telegraph Creek, which one would you use? I have no hesitation in saying you would use the one from Pyramid Harbour.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So the political consideration of controlling our own territory is no consideration at all, according to the hon. gentleman's contention. I dissent from that, and I say one of the objections to this line is, that if you build it you put it in the power of the United States government and people, if they are so disposed, to defeat your control of the Yukon territory.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is the same with the other.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We are not now discussing the question of subsidizing the road; we are only discussing the right of parties to come before this parliament and ask for the privilege of constructing a public work in that country. When the question of subsidy comes up, if it should come up, I am not disposed to advocate anything in that direction, because I know perfectly well, whether you start a road from Portland Canal or Lynn Canal, or Telegraph Creek, or any other point on the coast, three-fourths of the trade will be from the United States. That goes without saying. There is not sufficient trade in our own ports, as compared with the trade of California and Washington and Oregon, to justify us in assuming that more than 25 per cent of the trade will be Canadian, and therefore I do not think it would be right for the government to put its hand into the treasury and use the public money of Canada for the purpose of subsidizing a work that is going to be used by trade three-fourths of which is from the United States. But I am not going to say to our neighbours that they shall not have the right to enter that region by the most economical route, simply because we mistrust them in all our dealings with them of a national character.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Is it not our duty to pass such measures as will reserve to Canada our own trade and prevent foreigners from taking it away from us?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is what I conceive to be the duty of hon. gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Suppose we give this company power to build this road, will there be any reason then to build a road from Edmonton, 1,300 miles in length, to the Yukon district to furnish communication with the Yukon from the coast. The difference in freight alone would prevent the use of the road on our side of the Rocky Mountains.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What I say is this, that the true policy for this country to pursue is to permit any private capitalist that choose, without financial aid from the treasury, to do their best for the development of that country, and to retain all the money we have for the development of our western country and the construction of the Edmonton route. The Edmonton route will beat the ocean route as soon as we have it constructed. I proved that the other day by showing that the freight by the Yukon route, all water, was ten dollars per bag on flour, and that we could transport a bag of flour by the Edmonton route all-rail for five dollars, and make a handsome profit; and will have not only, the Canadian Yukon territory to supply, but also the adjoinging Alaskan territory in the same way. When we build the Edmonton route we are going to have an immense advantage in the trade that will be developed on both sides of the 141st meridian. Now, so far as friendliness is concerned, I have a bill on the order paper to amend the mining regulations which permit United States citizens to come in here and mine without taking the oath of allegiance. The United States government require a Canadian to take the oath of allegiance and separate himself from his country in order to obtain the same privilege in their country that we give perfectly free in Canada. That bill, when it comes to be discussed, I propose to ask permission to withdraw, because the United States government, I see, since that bill was put upon the order paper has adopted a different policy in Alaska, as the following telegram, which appeared in the press this week, shows:

WASHINGTON, March 25.—An agreement has been reached by the conference committees of the House and Senate on the Alaskan land bill to insert a provision allowing Canadian miners the same rights in Alaska as are given by the Canadian government to the American miners. Canadians will not have to be naturalized to take up mines in Alaska.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—You must have scared them.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It shows the influence this Senate is able to exercise in any public measure that is brought before it. Whether that is the cause of the action of Congress or not, I cannot say.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentlemen of the United States Senate are like the coon in the story: Our hon. friend from Shell River has only to point his blunderbuss at the United States Senate and immediately it comes down.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I said nothing at all about a blunderbuss or anything of the kind. I have introduced a bill to amend our mining regulations on the 11th March. I see a telegraphic despatch on the 25th March that the very thing asked for on behalf of Canadian miners has been acceded to by the concurrence committee of both Houses of Congress. It is a coincidence. I am not claiming anything. I introduced that amendment on behalf of Canadian miners, and it was in their interests I did it and I am only saying so far—whether the bill introduced here had any effect, or whether it was a spontaneous act on the part of the United States Senate I am not prepared to say, but I am only quoting that in order to show that there is not an unfriendly disposition on the part of the United States people, if they are only approached in the right way, but if we say we are going to do our level best to use our power in our Yukon country to exclude them naturally they will use their power to exclude us. I heard the hon. leader of the opposition, when he was Minister of Customs, tell us that it was customary in the Rossland district to charge so much a day for an officer to accompany any United States goods that were passing from one point in United States territory through our country to another point in the United States. They were charged $3 a day, and in the same way the United States government charged our people $3 a day. There we have a precedent for the action of the United States. In Alaska they charge, I believe, $9 a day. In going across to Lake Bennett they had to cross Dyea Pass, which is a very difficult one. I am only pointing that out to show you that, so far as putting our Canadian miners upon exactly the same footing as the United States miners in Canadian territory, the United States people were willing to go hand in hand in developing that country to the very best of our united ability, and I do not think it is wise for us to show any unneighbourliness by defeating a measure which is asking no subsidy form the government, but let it go to committee and be amended if desirable.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I have no intention of discussing the merits of the bill before us. I will hold myself entirely free as to the course I shall take, and that course will depend on how matters will eventuate and when we find out whether we are going to have an all-Canadian route into the country and therefore until I know that I shall hold myself free to vote any way I desire.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The impression seems to prevail in the House that the applicants for this bill are United States citizens, and should be treated as foreigners, as indicated already by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, who seems to have developed very quickly a strong antipathy against our neighbours to the south.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say a word objecting to this bill because they were United States citizens or British subjects. I object because it is a measure in the interest of the United States.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The burden of my hon. friend's complaint for some days has been that Mr. Livernash was the alleged representative of certain United States journals, and addressing members of this House exercised a certain influence over them in his statements, I think I can say with the greatest degree of confidence that the leader of the House is mistaken in his statements of Mr. Livernash's position, and I further more say that my hon. friend was inaccurate in making the statement that Mr. Hamilton Smith influenced the authorities at Washington to introduce the hostile legislation, if you call it so, that has recently emanated from the Senate. My hon. friend has made that statement in connection with this bill, and made it in such a very emphatic way, and I venture to say that my hon. friend is only hazarding the assertion that these gentlemen in any way represent the United States citizens as indicated by him. As I was about to say the promoters of this bill, as hon. gentleman will ascertain by reference to the bill, are all English capitalists. The promoters are:

The Right Honourable Horace Brand Townsend, Baron Farquhar, the Honourable Herbert Cokayne Gibbs, Francis Alfred Lucas, Joseph Harry Lukach, Rochfort Maguire, Harry Mosenthal, Lionel Phillips, John Edward Dudley Ryder, Gerald Dudley Smith, Hamilton Smith.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They are not Yankees.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Hamilton Smith I might say, is a mining engineer occupying a very distinguished position, and considered one of the most eminent men in his profession. Mr. Mosenthal is head of the firm of Mosenthal & Son, one of the largest mercantile firms in London. Mr. Lucas is managing director of The Exploration Company, which has a paid up capital of 1,100,000 pounds sterling. I might say the Rothschilds are very heavily interested in this exploration company, and owing to the fact of the association of Mr. Smith with this company, I apprehend the premier imagined the firm of Rothschilds were being made use of for the purpose of influencing gentlemen in the House of Commons and in this chamber in reference to this bill. The Right Honourable Lord Farquhar was until recently the head of the large banking firm of Sir Samuel Scott and Company, London. Mr. Phillips is a member of the great mining firm of Warner, Bate & Co., probably one of the richest firms in the world. Cokayne Gibbs is a member of the well known banking firm of Anthony Gibbs & Sons, London. Mr. Ryder is a capitalist, and one of the directors of the exploration company. Therefore, hon. gentlemen will observe that the promoters are gentlemen occupying the highest financial position in the commercial world, and gentlemen respecting whom the Dominion of Canada should congratulate most heartily in interesting themselves in developing the resources of this Dominion, and particularly the resources of that vast and undeveloped country, the Yukon district. So much for that. My hon. friend objected by saying that the policy of this government has been or will be to preclude any railway going into the Yukon country from a United States port. Consistency is certainly something to be greatly admired in individuals, and above all not only to be admired but is indispensable and absolutely necessary in a government. Let me point out to the hon. gentlemen the gross inconsistency of the position taken by the leader of this House and taken by his government in the policy he has just enunciated as the policy of his government. My hon. friend raised as another objection to this bill, the fact that we propose to make connection with the American system of railways and are thus diverting Canadian trade to the United States ports. He further points out the fact that the road is a narrow gauge road and should not receive the support of parliament. The celebrated Teslin Lake road is a narrow gauge road also and the approach to the Teslin Lake road is through United States territory, I find before me a bill which was introduced in the other House and which has recently received the support of the government, namely the Kettle River Railway Bill. After my hon. friend has laid down the policy of the government—an anti-United States policy and a pro-Canadian policy—let us see what those consistent gentlemen are doing in regard to the bill lately introduced in the Commons. The Kettle River Road is intended to run from a point on the international boundary line into Canadian territory and to run in and out of United States territory into Canadian territory and said by some to tap Canadian trade and to turn it into United States channels.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The first thing we find in this bill which has received the support of the government is the statement which my hon. friend objected to a few minutes ago and was the first objection he took, namely that it was declared to be a work for the advantage of Canada. In section two of the Kettle River bill we find this statement :

The undertaking of the company is hereby declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Will my hon. friend explain the position which he takes in the one and the inconsistency of his government in the other ? In the first place we find this company proposes to lay out, construct and operate a narrow gauge road. The 4th clause reads :

The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway of a gauge of [not less than three feet, and of not more than] four feet eight and one-half inches, from a point on the international boundary line at or near Cascade city, in the Cariboo-Kootenay district, in the province of British Columbia, thence running in a westerly and southerly direction, following the course of the Kettle river, to a point on the said international boundary line at or near Carson city, in the said district, and also a line of railway from Midway, on the said international boundary line, in the said district, in the said province, thence running northerly, following the course of Boundary Creek, to a point distant not more than twenty miles from said Midway.

Will you permit me to draw your attention to the powers which the government propose giving to this same foreign corporation, the applicants for which are Americans. The names are as follows : Charles Thomas Dupont, Daniel Chase Corbin and Austin Corbin. They are men who are known to be among the leading promoters of United States railways in the Western States. They propose giving to these men a power as follows in paragraph 5 of that bill :

The company may also form a connection at the international boundary line in said points, namely, at or near Cascade city, and at or near Carson city and Midway, with the Spokane Falls and Northern Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Washington, and generally with the railway system of the United States.

My hon. friend talks loyalty and patriotism, and about restricting railway enterprise to Canadian territory. Again in paragraph 12 of the same bill :

12. The company may enter into an agreement with the Spokane Falls and Northern Railway Company for leasing to such company, the railway of the company hereby incorporated in whole or in part, or any rights or powers acquired under this Act, as also the franchises, surveys, plans, works, plant, material, machinery and other property to it belonging or for an amalgamation with such company.

A railway which we are incorporating, and which is no sooner incorporated than it becomes absorbed by the Spokane Falls Company organized under the laws of the State of Washington, and generally with the railway system of the United States, and yet my hon. friend talks of limiting Canadian railways to Canadian territory. As I said before, this indicates the inconsistency of the position taken by my hon. friend. It is entirely out of the question for this government or any other government to conceive for a moment that railway communication can be kept out of that western country. Just as surely as the sun will set to-day and will rise to-morrow, so surely will you find railway enterprise entering that country from the Alaska border and from ports on United States territory. The position taken by this House was not that those roads should not run from United States ports but that the Dominion should not contribute any of its resources and should not alienate vast tracts of land for the purpose of building up lines in that country for the aggrandizement of United States transportation companies at the expense of the Dominion of Canada. This is the policy which this House I submit laid down by its vote last night, and not the policy that that immense tract of country must necessarily be tied down to railways running from Canadian points within the interior of British Columbia. I do not hesitate for a moment to say that my own personal inclination would lead me to favour the building of a road from a point in the interior of British Columbia and thus if possible excluding United States trade. We cannot accomplish impossibilities no matter how much we may desire that our desires should be effectuated. It is impossible to keep out United States railways from that section of the country. There must be reciprocal treatment between the government of Canada and the government of the United States in regard to the development of that country. The interests of both lie side by side in that country; only a fictitious or geographical line separates the one from the other. The United States government as we very well know possesses advantages in regard to the opening up of that country by its waterways of which we must avail ourselves in time. If the government should determine to build up a Chinese wall along the 141st meridian and along the boundary line between the territory of Canada and the United States to my mind it is something that is perilous to accomplish and the sooner hon. gentlemen recognize that the better. My hon. friend brought down his Teslin Lake bill to this House and the government staked their policy on it—that urgency demanded the building of a railway into that country. That was the fundamental principle of that bill and upon that principle hon. gentlemen built up the laboured arguments and appeals which were not only made in this chamber and the other but throughout the liberal press of the Dominion. Is the position taken now by the government consistent with the underlying principles which they promulgated on the Teslin Lake bill?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I say most decidedly not. My hon. friend never dreamed for a moment until the presentation of this bill—until its doom was practically sealed that it was contemplated to carry the road to a point in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The contract provides for it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No; the contract provides that the line shall be built from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake. The policy of my hon. friend has not been to assist the road to Observatory Inlet. My hon. friend knows the government has not foreshadowed its policy as to how that section of road from Telegraph Creek to Observatory Inlet is to be built.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But it has foreshadowed its policy that there should be such a section of road and these contractors were to have the first opportunity to build it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend say that the government have pledged themselves to the policy of building a road from Observatory Inlet to a point on the Stikine River through the tract of country over which an exploratory line has never been run, regarding which no information can be given to us as to its geographical features, and regarding the physical disadvantages of which they can say nothing? Will my hon. friend say he can appeal with reason to a chamber of intelligent men and say that the government have pledged themselves to build the two hundred and some odd miles of railway over a tract of country respecting which they have no information?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—180 miles.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Say 180 miles. My hon. friend does not presume to say it is within the realm of possibility to build that which he says is the policy of the government. I say their whole policy, and it is the only intelligent policy my hon. friend could bring down to this House or the other, viz., that the rapid development of that country and the emergent features of the situation demanded the building of a road and the country was called upon to sacrifice something for it. We were called upon to sacrifice resources of 4,000,000 acres of gold-bearing land for the building of that road. Why? The question of alleged starvation which was facing the people there and other urgent reasons so elaborated by my hon. friend. Therefore I say the position taken now is absolutely in contradiction with the position first taken by the government when the bill was introduced, namely, that it was introduced for the purpose of meeting an emergency. Now these gentlemen asked for a charter to build from the Lynn Canal to within a point of 200 and some odd miles of Dawson City. As I have already pointed out to hon. gentlemen the stability of those promoters financially is of so unquestionable a character that not a shadow of doubt can prevail in the minds of hon. gentlemen as to their ability to carry out this undertaking. In the next place I would direct the attention of the hon. gentlemen to the fact that they ask no bonding powers. Their financial ability to build this road is of so high a character that they ask simply for powers to stock the road and they are prepared practically to put the money up themselves, because they ask no bonding powers. Now I ask my hon. friend if his government is prepared to take the responsibility of refusing a large number of English gentlemen representing the largest financial aggregation that has appeared in any bill here—to build a road, for which the government claim the greatest need.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the bonding privilege, the hon. gentleman claims that there is merit in this charter that it does not provide for bonding privileges. If the hon. gentleman will look at the tenth and eleventh clauses of the bill, he will find that substantially the power is given. Clause 10 reads :

> The capital stock of the company shall be eighteen millions of dollars, and may be called up by the directors from time to time, and in such amounts as they deem necessary.

And clause 11 reads :

> The directors under the authority of the shareholders given at any annual meeting or at any special general meeting called for the purpose, at which meeting shareholders representing at least two-thirds in value of the capital stock of the company are present or represented by proxy, may convert ninety thousand shares, representing nine million dollars, or any less number of shares of the capital stock of the company, into preference stock ; and the holders of such preference stock shall be entitled to receive a preferential dividend.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would be utterly impossible to organize a company without issuing stock. Stock is a badge of the amount of interest of individuals in the company. How would my hon. friend organize a company ? How would the interests of these constituting it be in any way indicated ? However, I simply point this out that they have no intention of issuing bonds, but simply of subscribing for stock, paying up their stock, and building the road. They are not in this bill asking from the government any assistance. Therefore, is my hon. friend's government prepared to take the responsibility of saying to the people of the Dominion of Canada, and saying to the thousands that are rushing into the Yukon country, and saying to those representing the millions of trade going into that country, under no consideration will we permit capitalists to build a road from the Lynn Canal, even though it be the only recognized route which has yet been indicated as coming within the domain of sound commercial investment ? Or is my hon. friend, on the bald cry of loyalty to Canada, going to insist upon alienating 4 million of acres, or possibly some millions of money in building a road from an impracticable point and along an almost impossible route ? Is this to be done simply for the purpose of precluding capitalists building from a point on the international boundary line ? Is my hon. friend going to take that position ? As I said to my hon. friend the other night no matter where you build from the interior of British Columbia, if you cross the Stikine River by a route, and you are bound to cross the Stikine River, if you adhere to your determination to utilize the route outlined in the Teslin Lake bill—there is no way of excluding American trade from entering at the Port of Wrangel and going up the Stikine River and transhipping its goods on that road which, at an immense sacrifice to the people of Canada, you have built for the purpose of promoting trade interests to the extent of 90 per cent American and 10 per cent Canadian. I say emphatically that no other conclusion can be drawn from that fact. If the government of Canada, at the public expense, will build a road entering from or crossing the Stikine River, American trade will seek that route, and it is just as advantageous to American trade as to Canadian trade.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—With this difference that if it is American trade it will pay duty and customs tax to Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will they not do that in this case ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Upon such terms as they decide to impose on you.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, it seems to me it must be obvious to any hon. gentlemen in this House that the American government will be only too pleased to give bonding privileges at once to Canadian trade for the purpose of taking that advantage which they must necessarily enjoy of the great bulk of American trade proceeding over any route which may be built either from the Alaska coast or tributary to the Alaska coast. Therefore, I say, in view of that fact there is no alternative ; there is no way my hon. friend can possibly preclude American trade from going into that country. As I said before I am strongly in favour of a route from the east of the Rockies but it is utterly impossible if you build from a point in the interior of British Columbia to preclude American trade from proceeding up the Stikine River and paying its duty as they are paying to-day and thus taking advantage of a public work constructed at full cost to the Dominion of Canada. It is a most unusual thing, almost unprecedented, that this House should absolutely pronounce itself upon a private bill on the second reading. I know the principle of the bill is usually discussed, but I would ask hon. gentlemen to suspend their judgment on this bill till it goes into the Railway Committee until we can have an opportunity of having the promoters of this bill present who will explain to this House in a very much more lucid and satisfactory way than I can possibly do the merits of the road as well as particularly the geographical one which I submit are not the least of the considerations that should guide us to the building of the road. I hope, therefore, hon. gentlemen will permit the bill to have a second reading and go to committee.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I think the House would be acting inconsistently if it went back on giving the second reading to this bill. While I admit that the question of encouraging the trade of the United States into the Yukon territory did have some effect upon the minds of hon. gentlemen, and a little on my mind too, though I admit that there were other questions of more serious importance, such as the immense quantity of land there we were giving way to Mackenzie & Mann. Now this is a bill that asks for no subsidy; it does not ask even for the privilege of bonding the road, as has been stated. It is the duty of this House to be consistent with its action last night to encourage the building of a road into that section, more especially on account of the dangers that were pointed out to us last night by the leader of the House of people starving there and of preventing bloodshed taking place in that country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that he could not send in a policeman or ammunition, and that the whole country would be under the control of the United States if this road is built while we have no Canadian roads.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I admit all that, if they would act towards us as they did when we were sending them through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, but there are a great many Americans there and it does not follow that they would travel in with their accoutrements; they could go in there as civilians, and the Yukon territory would certainly be in a better position even in that way than it is at present. Moreover, it will have a further effect; it will prevent Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, or any other company from taking advantage of the situation and asking the government for a bonus or a subsidy in order to build a road into that country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What about the Edmonton route?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I am in favour of the Edmonton route; I am in favour of a road from Ashcroft or any of these places in British Columbia; but at the same time, I think that we would be doing a very improper thing in this House if in this House we were to reject the application of a wealthy company who are seeking the privilege simply of building a road from a United States port into this Yukon territory where we have quite an advantage; the moment they enter our country through the Alaska district, where it joins Canada, we can impose a duty on imports; we have a customs-house and the railway would not be entirely in the hands of the Americans. For this reason I feel that, acting consistently with my vote last night, it is my duty to support the second reading of this bill.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—A bill must be very faulty indeed if in this House you do not allow it to go to committee. We have heard a great deal about how the people are going to starve in that Yukon country. That was one reason why we were asked to give away millions of acres of land to build a railway from the Stikine to Teslin Lake. Now, as I look at it, I want the government to take the responsibility of these starving people. They have the power in their own hands to prevent it——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Now?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Now. In the first place my hon. friend the Minister of Justice asks that this bill be not read for six months. Why not let it be read the second time and send it to the committee? He has the power in his own hands to kill it elsewhere if it passes this House. He can call that confiding majority at the other end of the building to defeat this bill. I, for one, shall vote to send this to the Railway Committee, and put it through this House and let the responsibility rest on the proper shoulders, because the government have the power in their own hands, if they dare to exercise it before the people of this country, to defeat a bill to authorize the construction of a railway that is not going to cost the country anything.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It authorizes a capital of 18 millions of dollars for a tramway.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There were 14 millions on the 150 miles.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Well, are we going to pay it? These people only ask permission to spend their own money, and they are opposed by a government which, without consulting anybody, without advertising for tenders wanted to give away the people's inheritance for accomplishing the same object. Let the government call on their mechanical majority in another place to reject this bill, if they like; I shall vote not only for the second reading and to send it to committee, but I will give it all the support I can in the committee and in this House in order to leave the responsibility on the proper shoulders. I would not for a moment presume to advise this Senate what they should do; but I tell them this, in order to be consistent with themselves they ought to pass this bill, and leave the responsibility with the government in the other House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must first express my regret, not that the hon. gentleman moved the six months' hoist, because that is the privilege of every member, but at the reasons which the hon. gentleman gave for making the motion. Before referring to anything else, I should like to point out what, to my mind, is of very grave importance to the country. The hon. gentleman moved the six months' hoist on the ground that this railway has its western terminus in United States territory. The contention of the Canadian government, and the contention of the British government so far as we know, is that Pyramid Harbour, Dyea and Skagway are in Canadian territory. Now if the six months' hoist is carried by the Senate on the ground that the place from which the projected railway is to start from the coast is not in Canadian territory, will it not be a direct palpable acknowledgment of the contention of the United States government that the boundary line runs farther to the north and east than we contend it does? and is it not virtually a surrender of the contention which we are now making, and have been making, that we own two or three million acres of land or rocks, or whatever it may be, that are now in the possession of the United States? How would we be met—how would the arbitrators be met—if we were to put such a statement on record? The arbitrators would be met first with a declaration that the United States have been in possession of that territory, floating their flag over it for a number of years; and then the next contention would be that the Senate of Canada rejected a bill for the construction of a railway, upon the grounds that that portion of Alaska from which it was to start was in United States territory? Should we affirm by our votes that we acknowledge that contention? The hon. Minister of Justice, one of the most prominent members of the cabinet, whose opinion would be asked upon a question of this kind, being a question of law, would it not be said that he had himself acknowledged, by the motion he had made and the vote which he had demanded in one of the highest legislative bodies in the country, that that country did not belong to us. I am not prepared to say what course I would pursue upon this bill or any other. There is a great deal of force, to my mind, in the remark made by the hon. member for Monck. However, that is a question we can discuss in the future, and I put it to the Senate and to my hon. friend himself, knowing the character of the United States negotiators whenever there is any contention as to rights between any country and themselves, and more particularly between Canadian rights and United States rights, whether this is not placing in their hands a very strong argument in favour of their contention?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman says no. What does this motion mean? You are asked to vote for the motion which he has placed before the Senate. Why? Because he says the starting point of this railway is in the United States, while Canadians claim and are prepared to contend before any tribunal or arbitration that it is not in the United States, but belongs to Canada; and our representatives can be met, and will be met, if I know anything of United States diplomacy and diplomats, with the statement that the Minister of Justice, the highest legal authority in Canada, made a declaration in the Senate that that disputed strip of country was in the United States, and that he succeeded in carrying a motion for the rejection of a bill for that reason, thereby acknowledging that we had no territorial rights; and the vote which he asks us to record commits the Senate of Canada to that declaration. I need not say that when we look back into past history we find that in all international transactions the United States take every little advantage that can be taken. We have had boundary disputes with them before, and we know there is nothing that stands in the way of United States diplomats when they want to secure a portion of this country. If there was no other reason for rejecting the motion of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, I think that alone would justify the Senate in saying no, we will not commit ourselves even inferentially or indirectly to the declaration which has been made. I think it is very likely my hon. friend, when he made his motion, never thought of that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is not accurately stating what I said. I was speaking of the territory in the United States, not with regard to any legal claim we may set up.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand that very well. I do not want to play upon technicalities.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is what the hon. gentleman is doing.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think my hon. friend will accuse me of quibbling in the matter. I say the inference will be drawn by those who negotiate in the future, if we affirm the statement made by my hon. friend that we have surrendered, as far as our votes go, our right to that territory.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I should like to ask my hon. friend if we should permit a road to be built from that point to the Yukon country, and the effect would be to build it at once within the territory held by the United States, whether he would not strengthen the United States contention infinitely more in that way than by simply affirming for the present that that territory is in the possession of the United States?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I say most distinctly not. If we act upon our contention and lay down the principle in the charter for the construction of the road, it is an assumption of our right to that territory. It would be only a stronger affirmation of the principle we lay down, that we have a right to authorize the construction of a railway in the territory that we claim.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Just the reverse.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am afraid my hon. friend and myself, in this as in other matters, will have to continue to differ. I leave it to the Senate to say whether I am correct or not. I think it would be better to adjourn the debate in order that we may consider this question from the different standpoints that have been raised, more particularly from the point which I have taken the liberty to indicate to my hon. friend. It may be presumption on my part as an ordinary layman to attempt to teach, or even to suggest, what the law is on questions of this kind; but I claim to possess a little common sense, and knowing the character of the people with whom we have to deal, if they can draw inferences from statements which are made by so high an authority as the Minister of Justice, they will be taken advantage of by the people of the United States when this question comes to be settled. I am not going into the general argument as to the Canadian route any more. I can understand my hon. friend from de Lanaudière (Mr. Bellerose) and my hon. friend from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) in the position they took. They claim that no road should be built except from an undisputed Canadian point, whether it be on the Pacific slope, in British Columbia, or from some point in the North-west. While they act on that principle, no one can find fault with them. The superlative loyalty of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice is somewhat amusing. I am not speaking of my own. I stand on that question in the same position as the hon. gentleman from Shell River. Our past record will speak for us. But when my hon. friend speaks of the imposition of a duty at Skagway or Dyea he intimates that our neighbours are ready to act on the principle of non-intercourse.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If we go with a cargo of goods to Pyramid Harbour, a port which is open all the year round, and place the goods in bond to be shipped through to Canada, to be consumed in Canada and not in the United States, and the authorities there say no, we will not permit you to bond the goods going through, neither will we permit you to employ a United States officer to accompany them as is done now in the southern parts of British Columbia and has also been done in the eastern portions of Canada in past years, that is nothing more nor less than a declaration of non-intercourse. They can do precisely the same thing I believe at Wrangel if they are so disposed, without interfering with what you call the navigation of the river. But even if they cannot do so, they can put other obstructions in the way. As the hon. gentleman from Shell River has pointed out, if the United States government desire, as they do and have been doing for half a century, to send goods up the Yukon River, they have to cross the Canadian boundary before they can reach those portions of Alaska which have lately been discovered to possess placer mines and other rich deposits. Now, supposing they would say to us at Pyramid Harbour, "you shall not go beyond this unless you pay duty," all we have to do, if retaliation becomes necessary, is to simply say to these people when they reach the boundary line of the Yukon, "thus far you go, but no further without paying duty," and then if they would carry out the customs regulations, and the interpretation put upon customs laws, the moment they reached the Alaskan border they would again charge duty, because the principle of the custom law is this, that the moment goods brought into a country pay duty, they then become de facto the goods of that country, and if returned to the country in which they were manufactured or grown, they have then to pay duty again ; or in other words, if any one from the United States comes here and buys a horse from you, and takes it to the United States, he pays duty there ; and if you go to the United States six hours afterwards, and buy that horse and bring it back to Canada again, you buy a United States horse, bought in the United States territory, and you have to pay the duty on it, as if it had been foaled in the United States. So that, taking the position of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, I venture the assertion —though with some little hesitancy—that it is as untenable a position as any man could take who has the slightest knowledge of the workings and operations of Customs Acts. I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that when you speak of the Customs Act and the tariff you are speaking of two distinct and different things. The tariff Act is an Act which imposes on goods coming from one country to another a certain tax. The Customs Act is an Act which regulates the trade of the country, and the manner in which it should be carried on. My voice would not permit me last night to point that out to the hon. Minister of Justice. When he spoke of the Customs Act he meant the tariff. I must confess that I felt a little amused when, in answer to the hon. gentleman from Shell River, the Minister of Justice said, "What? At eighteen million dollars?" Now to those who knew nothing about the matter, it would imply that the eighteen million was to come out of the pockets of the people of the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It does not matter at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It matters to us whether Mr. Hamilton Smith and his friends put their hands in their own pockets, and take out eighteen million dollars, and build a road up there, or if you come to us and say, "I want eighteen million dollars to build that road." Perhaps it would make no difference to the hon. gentleman ; he may be rich, but to ordinary mortals it is a very different matter. I am not going to discuss the merits of this bill. I will act upon the suggestion that I first threw out, and, rather than have a decisive vote one way or another in the House on the question of a six months' hoist—I don't think it will be carried—I will take the opportunity of moving the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My reasons for opposing this bill are not personal. I recognize the directors named in the bill as not only highly respectable, but occupying a high financial position, and able to properly carry out the undertaking; but the main objection is that it militates against the construction of a Canadian route. If this bill becomes law, the very existence of it is at all times an embarrassment to the promoters of a railway through Canadian territory. There is no doubt about it that to reach Dawson it is much cheaper to go in by this route than by the Stikine, or through any of the inlets in British Columbia. But our policy—and we thought the policy of the country—was to establish an all-Canadian route.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Better begin somewhere else than at Wrangel.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was to meet the present emergency, as has been explained over and over again. It was not intended that it was to be eventually the terminus of the line. Hon. gentlemen will give the government credit for some degree of penetration. If hon. gentlemen will refer to the 5th section of the contract they will see that the contractors were to have the preference for a given number of years of the right to construct the extension of the line. We regarded it as a matter of very great urgency that we should get in at once, but to commence the line at one of the inlets in British Columbia would have involved a very long delay—perhaps two or three years.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Did not the government give authority to these contractors to build a road from Pyramid Harbour?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, we refused. We said we would not build it for five years. We thought in five years we would have an all-Canadian route, but if you build from Pyramid Harbour you will not have an all-Canadian route.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Let the bill pass here and the responsibility will be assumed in the other House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think we should have some intelligent opinions on the subject ourselves. The hon. gentleman says when we object to this bill we give the persons, who are to be hereafter named to discuss the question of boundary, an opportunity of saying it was a concession on our part. The fact of the road being built and large investments having been made by United States citizens, as they would be United States citizens, would indicate a very much stronger possession, because it would be contended that a large expenditure of money had been made.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman places a wrong construction entirely on paragraph 11. My hon. friend has really given the power to build from the Lynn Canal, but states that that power shall not be exercised except by the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That does not affect the question at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman said it did not give the government power.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The main objection is that it is contrary to public policy. It would deprive us of the opportunity of building a road through Canadian territory, because if that road is constructed at once it cuts off all the advantages a Canadian route would have. It would no doubt shorten the distance very materially, and, so far as this question of boundary is concerned, hon. gentlemen will recollect that for over twenty years Canada has been pressing the United States to agree to a boundary. They have steadily refused from year to year to enter upon the question, and have simply forced their own possession further back every year. We were just on the eve of a collision. The mounted police supporting the customs authorities took possession of what we thought was the extreme eastern limits of the boundary, the height of land, yet the United States officers say, "you should move, and, if you do not, we will make the customs laws so difficult for you to overcome, that you will select some other route." Ninety-five per cent of the whole trade of that country is now in the hands of the United States. We are endeavouring to secure some part of it for Canada.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—You are paying too much for it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You cannot pay too much for it. It is important from two points of view. It is necessary for our people having some standing in that country, and for participation in the advantages that flow from the trade of that country. I have no doubt whatever it is worth a million dollars to the two companies that now have the exclusive trade, that we threw out that bill last night. I venture to say that it is worth a million dollars to the Alaska Company and the American Commercial Agency. Hon. gentlemen know very well, if they read the papers and the accounts from that country, that not four or five prices, but ten prices are charged for everything. There is not $5,000 worth of goods in and around Dawson that is not in the hands of United States traders. They charge whatever price they like. A barrel of flour was sold at $100, which was bought originally for $5.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Is there only one United States company?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Two companies. They have the whole trade of that country. We got a little of it a short time ago, under the plea that we were going to build a road in over Canadian territory. The argument of the hon. gentleman from Shell River sounds very well, but he refuses to recognize conditions. One would say they have to travel so much further through your territory, surely you can bring pressure enough to bear on them to allow you reasonable advantages across their borders. But that is not the fact. We cannot quarrel with the United States. We do not propose to bring on a local rupture. We have treated them in the most generous way possible. We have allowed their miners to go in there and take up about 90 per cent of the wealth of the Yukon. It is largely in the hands of Americans. No nation could have been more generous to another nation than Canada has been to the United States, and yet you see the difficulties we have encountered. A member of the government went to Washington to make an arrangement. They were very plausible at Washington, and they saw the reasonableness of our proposals; but we find the regulations they made are not carried out. Every few months we are threatened with the abolition of the bonding system. It is not now on any firm basis. The Grand Trunk Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway stocks get a shock every now and then, when influences are brought to bear at Washington. If we had some standing at Washington, there would be some force in the argument of the hon. gentleman; but when we are entirely in their hands, as we were until a few days ago when we succeeded in getting access to the Yukon through the Stikine, we had to accede to whatever conditions they chose to impose. And now if you do not take a United States officer to accompany you across the United States fringe of country, you have to pay 5 per cent duty. It is very unfair and very unreasonable.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not see what that has to do with the question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the whole point. If this bill becomes law and this road is built, you will not be able to build a road through Canada, because there will not be traffic enough to make it pay. The hon. gentleman is such a theorist he will not observe conditions. If the hon. gentleman's theory was correct, why should we have a line running to St. John and Halifax, when it is cheaper to get our goods through by New York and Portland.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Portland stands in the same position to Canada that Pyramid Harbour does to the Yukon, because it is the nearest ocean port to the point of consumption. Pyramid Harbour is the nearest point you can get to by sea to reach Dawson.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—If this road will serve the purpose, why on earth do we want a road through Canadian territory that will cost a great amount of money?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—For the reason that we have no control over the United States end of the road, and they would impose just such conditions as they pleased. If you wanted to send in a regiment of soldiers, you could not do it.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That will not be necessary.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman is right about that. He threw a certain responsibility on this Senate less than 24 hours ago. On us rests the responsibility of defeating that bill. I say to the hon. gentleman that the responsibility is on him if he does not let this bill pass, because it is in his hands. If there is going to be any starvation in that country, and the government defeat this bill, when it is in their hands, they are responsible.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This line is not going to be built by the 1st September, and there is no justification for the bill on that ground. If this bill becomes law it reduces the opportunity for our financing any independent line through British territory, and if this road is once built, it is not at all probable that any road will be built through Canadian territory, except at the actual expense of the government. There is the whole point in a nutshell. It is for this House to say whether they are going to place the government and people of this country in that position.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—With regard to the authority given to contractors to build from the Lynn Canal, I should like to correct the hon. Secretary of State. Clause 2 of the contract says that the company has authority also to build a line of railway from the waters of Lynn Canal to Fort Selkirk, or thereabouts by way of Chilkat Pass.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Go on.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON :—

> Also branch line of railway from any points on the company's railways to any property owned by the company, also lines of railway from any navigable waters to any property owned by the company; provided that the power to to build said line from Lynn Canal to Fort Selkirk, and said branch lines and said lines from navigable waters shall not be exercised without the consent of the Governor General in Council.

You are giving that power, and next year you may relax it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We do not propose to relax it. The reason for that is that the contractors wanted to build a road from Pyramid Harbour. They said: "We will build from Pyramid Harbour, and we will not want anything like that subsidy." We said "no, we want our road on Canadian territory built first."

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—They did not want any bonus at all then?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, they wanted a much less subsidy.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—While I do not think this bill should pass into law in exactly its present form, yet I feel in favour of letting the bill have its second reading and go to committee. The Secretary of State has urged that this road should not be built, because it has its terminus in Pyramid Harbour, which is, at least, in disputed territory; it is not known whether this belongs to Great Britain or the United States. I should like to say, in addition to what I said the other day, that, in my judgment, looking at the commercial advantages of this road, we must recognize the fact that it cannot be very long before this road will have to be built. It will be a commercial necessity. The Secretary of State says that we should leave it till we have an all-Canadian route—that we should have the all-Canadian route first. What advantage would it be to build an all-Canadian route first? We cannot operate an all-Canadian road with any profit whatever after this road is built, and the only way you can induce capitalists to invest in an all-Canadian route is to guarantee them against the building of a competing road on this line. Besides, it appears to me that the government, or those who oppose this bill, whether government supporters or not, have very much changed their opinion since last session. Last session two companies were incorporated to build lines from the Pacific coast to the Yukon territory, and both those companies started in the Lynn Canal, and so far as I am aware, there was no objection by any person, of either political party, to these lines, because their terminus on the Pacific coast was on territory the ownership of which was doubtful. I endeavoured to point out, in my observations a few days ago, the immense disparity between the commercial advantages of this route and the route which the government proposed by the Stikine and Teslin Railway. It must be evident to everybody that in the interests of the Yukon territory, those who go in there should have the shortest, easiest and cheapest mode of ingress and egress. It must also be in the interest of the people who go there that their trade should be transported both in and out in the speediest and cheapest possible manner. Now, there can be no question and any one who looks at the map cannot doubt that a road constructed on this line will afford facilities which no other line from the Pacific coast—I am speaking of those lines solely now—could possibly afford. As a comparison between this line and the Stikine-Teslin railway route ——

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the Stikine-Teslin route has been disposed of.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I am arguing about this bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is arguing on the bill, which was defeated yesterday.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—If the government have abandoned the idea of communication by that route, I am willing to drop it. The advantage of the route from the head of the Lynn Canal is that it avoids the whole transportation up the Stikine River for 150 miles, and the transportation from Lake Teslin to the junction of the Lewes and Yukon Rivers, a distance of about 400 miles. This, I say, is probably as favourable an all-Canadian route as we could get from the Pacific coast, but the cost of transport over that route, considering these disadvantages, would be probably double what it would be over the line contemplated by this bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then the hon. gentleman's meaning is that an all-Canadian route is not to our advantage, and that this is the best road from the Pacific coast that can be constructed for Canada.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. If he has reached that conclusion from what I have said it was not what I wished to convey. What I was trying to say was this, that the cost of getting in, whether for passengers or freight, by the all-Canadian route, would be very much more than by a route such as is proposed by this bill, and whatever may be the interest of Canada, I was arguing for the interest of the Yukon territory and the people who went in there that they should have the cheapest and shortest and best road possible. I hope I have made myself understood. With regard to this question of interfering with Canadian trade which, if I understand the hon. leader of the House and the hon. Secretary of State as well, is their main objection to this bill. Their desire is to retain this trade for Canada in some way, and if they allow the construction of this road instead of accomplishing that end they think it will divert the trade to the United States. In my opinion these hon. gentlemen have utterly failed to establish that point. Supposing this road is built, the ocean is free to all. Steamers can communicate with the road as well from Vancouver and Victoria as from San Francisco. The distance is shorter, and they should be able to take Canadian freights to the ocean terminus of this road and deliver them cheaper in the Yukon region than the Americans can. The people who operate the railway will certainly make no distinction against Canadians, so far as freight rates are concerned. In the one case, if the United States goods cross the line they will have to pay duty and the Canadian goods will go in free. The hon. Secretary of State referred a moment ago to these regulations which he says the United States, impose, requiring every person going in with Canadian goods from Skagway and Dyea to have a United States officer accompanying them at a cost of nine dollars a day. I saw a report in the papers not long ago that the arrangement made with the minister at Washington was working satisfactorily.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I may be mistaken. That was the newspaper report. At all events, that arrangement is rendered necessary simply because there is no railway. They have to transport those goods through United States territory where there is no railway, and that renders it necessary that they should be accompanied by a United States officer while, if there was a railway from that port, and supposing it is United States territory, the goods would be taken from the ocean steamer, placed on a car, sealed up and go through without any cost whatever. The whole cost results from the very fact that we have no railway and the building of this railway will obviate that very difficulty. The hon. leader of the House suggested that this railway and the transportation of freight over it would, in some way, be under the control of the United States officials. I cannot understand how he establishes that point. This will be a railway chartered by this parliament; if it is built it will be under the control of this parliament. It will be subject to any conditions which the Railway Committee of the Privy Council may see fit to make, and they will certainly have it in their power to prevent any discrimination over this road which would be against the interests of the Canadian people. I favour the second reading of this bill and its going to committee. I think it should be amended, if it is allowed to pass. The amount of capital has been spoken of. I am not prepared to express an opinion at the present time as to whether that is too much or not. They ask for a variety of powers to build wharfs and docks and to engage in mining operations. That is a matter which will have to be dealt with by the committee, and if the capital is too much it should be reduced. There is one other point which should be considered. As I stated at the outset, in my opinion at least, to meet the present condition of things in that section of the country, a railroad somewhere in this locality is needed and should be built as speedily as possible. The government will find, if they refuse to charter a road now, that some road will have to be built and will be built in a short time. I think, therefore, that if this bill is allowed to pass there should be some provision compelling the company to enter upon the work of construction at once and push it forward with all possible rapidity. They ask for five years.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED. I might say to my hon. friend that in the letter I recently received from Hamilton Smith he said that in the event of their company being given power to build the road, they would be prepared to construct as much as 100 miles of the line this season.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That is a matter which would have to be considered in committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am opposed to the motion to adjourn the debate. We have spent the whole afternoon discussing this bill. I think we all know now pretty nearly how we should vote, and I object to the proposal to adjourn, because it would mean that we should probably spend another afternoon discussing the matter, and then if the bill should ultimately go to the committee, they would have to spend a good deal of time over it. The matter has been sufficiently discussed now to enable hon. gentlemen to give an intelligent vote on the subject, and it will save the time of the committee and the House if the opinion of the majority is that the bill should not be read the second time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I wish to say a few words on the motion for the adjournment of the discussion. I am opposed to that motion. The House last night rejected the government proposition. I want to know, my colleagues want to know, and the country will want to know, whether this House is marking out what it regards as a necessary public policy on this question by which, instead of an all-Canadian route, there shall be a road built from a point in the United States into the Yukon. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), who is supporting this bill, as well as the hon. gentleman who has moved it, declares that this is a proper line on which to build a road, and that if it is built the trade will go this way. The hon. gentlemen consider that this is a shorter and more direct road into the Yukon country—at all events, to the portion of it which is settled—than the all-Canadian route, and so the hon. gentleman proposes that there shall be first built a road from the United States territory into the Yukon country, which would for all time control the trade; and if it became necessary later, supposing we had the good fortune to retain the country without an insurrection or disturbance, to build an all-Canadian road, it would not only have to be heavily subsidized to be built, but would also have to be equally heavily subsidized in order to be maintained. For, if the hon. gentleman is right, a road built through Canadian territory into that country is a road which, because of its length, neither Canada nor the United States would sustain. And that also is the contention of the hon. member from Shell River (Mr. Boulton). Now, I say if that were true, are you going to overlook the important question as to whether you will retain in your own hands the means of maintaining your authority in that country? There is no use shutting our eyes to the fact that, if the road is built into the Yukon country from a United States point, or a point in the possession of the United States; the use of it by the people of Canada will depend wholly upon the forbearance and the policy of the United States in that regard. Now, we know what pressure is used by the people living on the western coast of the United States; we know that even where we have agreed upon regulations with the United States, and have made large concessions to them in order to secure facilities for our own trade, the pressure of public opinion of those who are interested in San Francisco and Seattle has been such that the United States have not been able to carry out the regulations agreed upon. I say, in the face of that, let us not disguise from our eyes the actual situation. You are proposing for all commercial purposes to annex that territory to the United States, and if you incur the expenses of government, it is an expense of government without any other advantage than the mere honour of governing. I am not willing that that shall be our position, and if the Senate of Canada is prepared to sustain a measure which points in that direction and which is a matter of public policy, the sooner we know it the better. My hon. friend has deprecated the idea that I should have alluded to the fact that this territory, at this initial point, is in the possession of the United States. It is so; we cannot disguise from our eyes the fact. We are dealing with the United States, in respect of admission into our country, because that portion of territory at the head of Lynn Canal is in their possession, and if you were to start a railway from that point, and it should be a commercial success, as hon. gentlemen have mentioned on that side of the House, what would be the effect? Large towns of United States people would be built up at Dyea, Skagway and Pyramid Harbour who would be loyal to the government of the United States; and whatever might be your legal claim, not only would the possession continue in the United States, but the legal claim would go with the possession, for you may depend upon this, that if you have a large United States population and a United States city established there, maintained by the trade and commerce which the Canadian territory behind gives to the inhabitants of that city, you are practically assisting in the conveyance of that country to the United States. I am not willing to take that position. My hon. friend says that my loyalty is a new-born loyalty. I deny that; I have never expressed any other sentiment with regard to the maintenance of the integrity of the empire and the maintenance of our rights with respect to the United States than those I have expressed here since this discussion began. I have said there is not a rock, even if it were not larger than sufficient for a fisherman to dry his net upon, if it belongs to us, but that I would maintain our possession to it. Further than that, I say that no more disastrous course could be adopted in respect to the future of this country, no mistake that the English government has ever made, would so contribute to putting impediments in the way of our prosperity and our interest upon the Pacific coast, as the passage of the bill which the hon. gentleman has now before us. I am not prepared to adjourn this debate. I want to know, and the government want to know, what the position of the Senate is upon this question, for, so far as we are concerned, this proposal differs as widely as day does from night from any proposition which the government can support.

The Senate divided on the amendment to adjourn the debate, which was agreed to on the following vote :—

MOUNTED POLICE PENSION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (13) "An Act to amend the Mounted Police Pension Act." He said: As the law stands at present, a mounted policeman has to serve 25 years before he is entitled to superannuation. It has been found a rather long period and it is proposed to substitute 20 years service instead of 25. That is the only change in the law—the substitution of 25 for 20—the effect being that a policeman after serving 20 years will be entitled to superannuation.

Hon Mr. POWER—I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State exactly what this allowance is. Is it a pension, as is given in the British army, or a superannuation allowance such as is given in the Civil Service?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know the provision; I will ascertain before the bill goes to committee.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is in the line of a pension.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I think 20 years is perhaps too long.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

GOVERNMENT HARBOURS, PIERS AND BREAKWATERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill(28) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting government harbours, piers and breakwaters." He said: This bill makes certain amendments in two sections of the Act, chapter 84 of the Consolidated Statutes, I will read the section as it stands and point out the changes that are made. Section 2 reads:

The Governor in Council may appoint or direct such officers or persons as he thinks proper, who shall have, under the direction of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the charge of the works hereby placed under the management and control of the said minister, and who shall collect the tolls and dues thereon; and the Governor in Council may determine the remuneration to be allowed them respectively for such services and such remuneration.

These are the additional words "shall be retained from the tolls and dues collected." That is the only change in that section. Then section 5 is also changed. "After deducting remuneration mentioned in section 2 of this Act" then the words are added "the remainder if any." At the end of the section the additional words are "and such expenditure has been incurred." They are just such changes as are necessary to render the administration of the law more efficient.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

CERTIFICATES TO MASTERS AND MATES OF SHIPS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (37) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting certificates to Masters and Mates of Ships." He said: This bill contains certain amendments to section 17, and an additional section. The law as it now stands reads:—"If upon any investigation duly authorized by the government under the Salvage Act," and so on, and the charge is: "If upon any investigation duly authorized by the minister under the Wrecks and Salvage Act." It is purely a matter of departmental administration. There is no object in being obliged to go to the Governor in Council for authority to make the investigation. It has been provided it shall be done under the investigation of the minister. The Act ends with section 25 as it now stands, and it is proposed that this additional section shall be added:

The said Act is hereby further amended by adding the following sections thereto after section 25:—

25. The minister, upon a report of a duly appointed and qualified examiner of masters and mates, may grant a temporary certificate as master to an applicant sufficiently qualified by his knowledge and experience to take charge of a steamboat of not more than ten tons, gross tonnage, and certificated to carry not more than ten passengers, plying within specified limits in the minor inland waters of Canada,—which steamboat and limits shall be described in the certificate.

(2.) Such temporary certificate may be issued and be in force for a term not exceeding one year, but may be suspended or cancelled for cause by the minister.

(3.) For every such temporary certificate the applicant shall pay the sum of five dollars.

(4.) No person who holds a certificate issued under this section, and no person who employs him as holding such certificate, shall be liable to any of the penalties provided by this Act if he is acting on the vessel and within the limits specified in the said certificate.

This provision has become necessary because all that the law ought to require, all the skill and knowledge that it bestows upon the party is experience on a small boat running on some inland waters, requiring no knowledge of navigation, requiring simply the mechanical knowledge of the person who has charge of an engine. Under this section, the minister will be authorized to issue a certificate to such party, being simply the practical experience that is required, and not the experience of a skilled navigator, and his power of course is confined to the vessels of the class and on the waters that are described. In some instances vexatious proceedings have been taken against parties possessing all the skill that is required, and there is no option with the magistrate, although he may know the person was qualified for the work he was engaged in, but to impose a fine. This enables the certificate to be issued in such cases, and it seems to be a necessary and just protection against vexatious proceedings.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—What tonnage did the hon. gentleman say?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Ten tons.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The size is certainly very small. This change in the Act, in my opinion, requires an individual who has charge of that boat to be always in her and no person else can take charge of her. It is only a pleasure boat, anyway, ten tons, and no one can take that boat anywhere, not half a mile, except it has a certificated master. We know that the engineering skill required for managing a little boat like that does not amount to anything. It only requires a little common sense. This will necessitate a master being on the vessel all the time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Under the law as it now stands, the party requires to pass a regular examination, and have a certificate.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—For that sized boat?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, or any size. This is a liberalization of the law—an extension of the right, not a restriction, and if it does not go as far as my hon. friend desires, it still goes in the direction he mentioned.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

SAFETY OF CERTAIN FISHERMEN BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (G) "An Act for better securing the safety of certain fishermen."

(In the Committee.)

On the second subsection, second clause,

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I would suggest that the hon. gentleman exempt the fishermen fishing in the straits of Northumberland from the operation of this clause. The straits are narrow, and there is no necessity for such a measure there. They only go out for a mile or so. I consider this is absolutely necessary for fishermen fishing on the banks out of sight of land, and in that case, the provision is not sufficient. That is, there is not sufficient water or bread. The expense of a larger supply of bread would be trifling: but I would suggest that the fishermen in the straits of Northumberlend should be exempt from the operation of the Act, and the provisions might be increased for the bank fishermen.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman will see, if he looks at the first clause of the bill, that it hardly affects fishermen in the strait of Northumberland. It relates to deep sea and bank fishermen only, and would not affect the fishermen the hon. gentleman spoke of.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—There are banks in the straits.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was distinctly understood, when this bill was before the Senate in former sessions, that it would not affect such fishermen as the hon. gentleman mentions. With respect to the quantity of water and bread, it might in some cases be desirable to have a larger quantity, but this was the quantity agreed on by the House when the bill was discussed before. There was quite a discussion on the subject; several members took part in it, and this was the quantity fixed. I thought, as the bill had gone through that session, it was better not to change in quantity.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—There are several banks in the straits and boats go out there to set their trawls and could easily get back to their vessels or to shore. So far as provision for boats on the banks is concerned, it is only where a storm, or fog comes on, and they lose their vessel that a supply is needed. A boat may be driven about for days or weeks, and sometimes the men are found dead in their dories for want of provisions.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. MASSON, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

CANADIAN YUKON MINING REGULATIONS BILL.

WITHDRAWN.

The Order of the Day being called for the second reading of Bill (E) "An Act to amend the Canadian Mining Regulations for the Yukon."

Hon. Mr. BOULTON said: Since I moved the first reading of this bill on the 11th March, I find that the object of the bill has been attained in so far as the amendments are concerned. The object of the bill was to put Canadian miners on a footing of equality with United States miners. Since the first reading I see that a concurrent committee of the Senate and House of Congress in Washington has practically granted all that was asked for in this bill. Now the Canadian miner and the United States miner have equal rights in Alaska, and that is certainly a position that we welcome with very great pleasure. The United States and Canada have joined interests in the new region that is being developed, and I am quite sure that is a remarkably good evidence of the disposition they are showing. I ask permission to withdraw the bill.

The bill was withdrawn.

UNION BANK OF CANADA BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved the second reading of Bill (24) "An Act to amend the Charter of the Union Bank of Canada."

He said: This bill is simply to change the shares of the Union Bank, which are now sixty dollars, to one hundred dollars. This was unanimously approved of by a resolution passed at the general meeting of the shareholders in June last. It also provides for a disposition of one share, or a fractional part, that may be held by any shareholder after the change has been made.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

HUDSON'S BAY AND PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved the second reading of Bill (22) "An Act respecting the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Company." He said: This is a bill for the purpose of amending some of the clauses in a charter that has already been granted to this company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. gentleman might give us a little more information.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The object of this bill is to repeal certain portions of the clause and substitute therefor the following:

The company may lay out, construct and operate by electricity or steam power, or both, a railway of the gauge of four feet eight and one-half inches, from a point at or near Port Churchill, on Hudson's Bay, through the territory north of the Churchill River, to deep water at or near Fond du Lac, on Lake Athabasca, and from Port Churchill aforesaid, on Hudson's Bay, through the territory north of the Nelson River to to the Grand Rapids of the Saskatchewan river, near the north-west end of Lake Winnipeg; thence through the territory of Saskatchewan to Prince Albert, in the said territory; thence continuing through the said territory and the territory of Alberta to Edmonton, in the last mentioned territory; and may also lay out, construct and operate a line from Edmonton to a point on the boundary of British Columbia at or near the Yellow Head Pass.

It is to connect the waters of the Hudson Bay with Edmonton; it is merely a little rearrangement of the original charter. It has been passed by the House of Commons, and the House of Commons amended it by making the terminus at Edmonton instead of at the Pacific coast, as was contained in the original charter.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (74) "An Act further to amend the Petroleum Inspection Act."—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (29) "An Act respecting the Federal Life Assurance Company of Ontario, and to change its name to the Federal Life Assurance Company of Canada."—(Hon. Mr. Cox.)

Bill (73) "An Act further to amend the Gas Inspection Act."—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (75) "An Act further to amend the Inland Revenue Act." He said: This is to define the expression "beer," "wash" or "wort," and makes the terms clearer for the officers charged with the collection of the duties. It also reduces the quantity movable in one package to ten gallons; at present the quantity is not less than twenty-five standard gallons. It was found that the trade are anxious that that quantity should be so reduced and so there is no objection to it. The third paragraph is the mere introduction of certain words in order to make the Act clearer.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a second time.

ALBERTA AND YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (H) "An Act incorporating the Alberta and Yukon Railway, Navigation and Mining Company." He said: This is a bill having in view the construction of a road skirting the foothills of the Rocky Mountains, with branches extending to Calgary and Edmonton, and thence into the Peace River and Yukon districts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Has any survey or estimate been made as yet?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Nothing definite.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No plans?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When we go into the Railway Committee it is time enough to submit them.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

DOMINION BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (41) "An Act respecting the Dominion Building and Loan Association." He said: This is a company which was incorporated under the Revised Statutes of Ontario as a building and loan association. Some two years ago, I think it was, it received a charter from the Dominion government, and I understand that the business of the company has become very large, and they do not think the name of the company is altogether suitable to company as it now stands. They propose to change the name of the company from "The Dominion Building and Loan Company" to the "Dominion Loan Company."

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

PACIFIC AND YUKON RAILWAY, NAVIGATION AND MINING CO.'S BILL.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the House adjourns I would like to fix a day for the second reading of this bill, the debate on which was adjourned this afternoon. In coversation with the clerk of the House, he seems to be under the impression that there is no precedent for re-instating this bill upon the order paper, and that it necessitates a notice of motion for its restoration. It seems to me a precedent should be established or that this point should be cleared up, so that no difficulty would hereafter arise in regard to it. Our rules do not specifically make provision as to what shall become of a bill that has been adjourned. I find it laid down in Bourinot, at page 306:

> If a bill on the Order Paper is taken up and the debate thereon adjourned it does not go to the foot of the list of the next day, but keeps the proper place on the public bills and orders to which it is entitled under the rules just cited.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That has no application to this case.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I submit it has. On page 304 Bourinot says :

The Orders of the Day are divided into "government orders" and "public bills and orders." All government measures appear in the former; all motions and bills in the hands of private members appear in the latter.

Hon. Mr POWER—They have a special hour for private bills.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I say that the analogy is one which is peculiarly applicable in this case and which we should follow.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would just call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the matter he has cited has no relevancy to the question which came up this afternoon. What he is reading about is a debate, not a bill, and my hon. friends will see that the motion made this afternoon was that this debate should be adjourned.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We are talking about a debate, not a bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the debate was adjourned and there was no period to which it was adjourned, and so the motion of my hon. friend disappears from the order paper altogether.

Hon. Mr POWER—The proper course for the hon. gentleman from Calgary to pursue would be to put a notice on the paper that he would move to have this motion for the second reading of his bill placed on the order paper for some particular day. It is off the order paper, but the hon. gentleman can get it on again by giving a regular notice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no doubt about that, but it seems to me that when a debate is adjourned it necessarily comes on after the close of business upon the order paper of that day.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was adjourned sine die.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It was simply adjourned.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The easier way is to give notice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then I give notice that I will move to have the bill placed on the order paper for Monday next, and that it be the first order of the day.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (32) "An Act respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company."—(Hon. Mr. Clemow)."

The Senate adiourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 1st April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

LIQUOR PERMITS IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I beg to give notice that I will—

Ask the government on Monday next who advised the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories to grant the liquor permits given in the return laid before the Senate on the 29th of March last, also who got the permit for taking liquor into the Yukon district on the 27th November last or thereabout, with number of gallons covered by such permits, and who recommended the Lieutenant Governor to grant them.

The custom, in the olden times, under the administration of Lieut. Governor Dewdney was to limit the quantity to a maximum of two gallons as a rule, and there was no sale in connection with it. It was for domestic, or medicinal or mechanical purposes, and no man could get a permit from the Lieut. Governor to bring two gallons or any small quantity of liquor into the territories without having somebody to recommend him as a proper person to bring the liquor in. In the return brought in the other day I notice the quantities run as high as 4,000 gallons and somebody had to recommend the party getting the permit to the Lieut. Governor of the North-west territories. I understand it has been issued by the recommendation of the Department of the Interior. I have taken a little trouble to inquire, and I want to know if this information is correct and who gave the recommendation which authorized the government to issue the permit.

CORRESPONDENCE AND MEMORIALS FROM PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT OF P.E.I.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all correspondence and memorials from the members of the Provincial Government of Prince Edward Island who composed the recent delegation from that province; and will inquire what action the Federal Government has taken in response to such applications?—(Mr. Macdonald, P.E.I.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I ask my hon. friend not to press that motion, for the reason that we have received the papers from Prince Edward Island in which the claims of that government against the government of Canada are set forth, but no reply has been made by this government, nor has the government had time to consider the papers and statements. It would be unusual to bring down the statements on the one side without having the other. In fact, the correspondence on the whole subject is still incomplete, and therefore I hope my hon. friend will not press his motion under these circumstances.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I will allow the motion to stand till this day week.

SAFETY OF CERTAIN FISHERMEN BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the third reading of Bill (G), "An Act for better securing the safety of certain fishermen."

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I should like to ask the hon. member for Halifax if there is any machinery in this bill which will enforce the carrying out of the clauses.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is the same machinery which exists to enforce other provisions of the Fisheries Act; there is a penalty imposed for the non-observance of the law which can be imposed at the instance of any person.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Is there any provision that compels the inspection of vessels before they leave, in order to ascertain whether they have the compasses and the requisite supply of food and water?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The owner of any vessel which goes to sea without these is liable to a fine of $200; and the captain who puts a boat out to sea without the compass and the required amount of food and water is also liable to a penalty of the same kind; and these penalties are imposed under the provisions of the Fisheries Act.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed.

INSPECTION OF STEAMBOATS AND LICENSING OF ENGINEER'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (39) "An Act respecting the Inspection of Steamboats and the Examination and Licensing of Engineers employed on them." He said: This is a bill for the purpose of codifying the law relating to the inspection of steamboats and the examination and licensing of engineers. Since the last genenral Act on the subject the law has been amended almost every year until it is rather difficult to discover what the Act does mean, and so it was codified. The changes are, in many instances, only verbal. There is no material change in the bill, but it can be gone more fully into in committee.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (53) "An Act to incorporate the Prudential Life Assurance Company of Canada."—(Mr. Vidal.)

MOUNTED POLICE PENSION BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (13), "An Act to amend the Mounted Police Pension Act, 1889."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The only change in this is the reduction of the term of service from twenty-five to twenty years to entitle a mounted policeman to be superannuated. The amount of the superannuation is arrived at by taking one-fiftieth of the annual pay for each completed year and allowing the superannuation on that basis.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Why do you not bring them under the regular Superannuation Act?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have not been contributing to the superannuation fund. I find there will be really very few entitled to superannuation under this legislation. Practically only seven men could take advantage of the Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is under the present Act?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, under the 20 years. I do not know that there would be any under the law as it stands now; there is a clause that after 15 years service, if a man becomes disabled and incapable of further service, he is entitled to superannuation on the same basis. I was making a calculation of what it would be, assuming a man served 20 years at 50 cents a day, and it would amount to about $74 a year. I am taking his income at $183. One-fiftieth of that is $3.66; multiplying it by 20 make $74.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Does the mounted policeman get any grant of land?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I believe not.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—He ought to get a grant of land.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN, from the Committee, reported the bill without amendment.

GOVERNMENT HARBOURS, PIERS, AND BREAKWATERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (38), "An Act further to amend the Act respecting government harbours, piers and breakwaters."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As I mentioned to the House yesterday, the only changes made in the law by this bill are the concluding words of the section, "shall be retained from the tolls and dues collected." It is the substituted clause 2. That necessitates a corresponding change in section 5, which is embraced in clause 2 of this bill—"after deducting the remuneration mentioned in section 2 of this Act "the remainder if any." Those are the new words. And the concluding words "such expenditure" are new.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What defect in the law necessitates the change?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The clause reads:

> The Governor in Council may appoint or direct such officers or persons as he thinks proper, who shall have, under the direction of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the charge of the works hereby placed under the management and control of the said Minister, and who shall collect the tolls and dues thereon; and the Governor in Council may determine the remuneration to be allowed them respectively for such services.

And out of that collection there is authority given to retain from the tolls and dues collected.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Out of what fund is this remuneration paid now?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I fancy that a special charge has to be made.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There is a tariff generally.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And in this case there is authority to retain and pay it, which, under the existing regulations, cannot be done.

Hon. Mr. WOOD, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

A SUGGESTION.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would like to make a suggestion which has been frequently made and not observed, that the amendments proposed to be made in government Bills should be printed in italics, so that members would not have to refer to the statutes to ascertain how the amendments affected the original Bill. It would be quite as easy for the government to have the amendments denoted by italics as by the mode now adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or in parenthesis.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would be very difficult to carry out the proposal. I can quite recognize its value, but bills are changed so frequently in the House of Commons, and amendments made there, and the bill from the House is printed from the final amendment, and it would cause delay if the new part had to be printed in italics.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You do not mean to reprint the old bill, and then put the new clauses in italics?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No. In the previous bill there were two lines at the end of the section which constituted the amendment. If we adopted some such suggestion as I have made, any member looking over the bill could ascertain what the amendment is without referring to the statutes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are frequently lines struck out. For instance, I have a bill in my hand, and if we printed this in the way suggested it would make it rather a caricature.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It was adopted in reference to the Criminal Code Amendment Bill, and was found very convenient.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was referred to a committee of both Houses, and the amendments, as they were indicated in the bill, were amendments that were suggested by that committee.

PETROLEUM INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a committee of whole on Bill (74) "An Act further to amend the Petroleum Inspection Act.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The law as it now stands in section 22 affecting the penalties for breaches of the Petroleum Inspection Act reads this way:

> Every person who keeps or offers for sale or use in Canada any petroleum or naphtha, if in packages not marked as herein before described is guilty of an offence, etc.

The new words are "or has in his possession." It is to cover any possible plea which may be put in, and to make it more comprehensive.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does that refer to petroleum that may be in the possession of a man in a household, or would the man having a can of oil in his possession be liable?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A man buys inspected oil.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does this bill increase the flash test?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; it is simply making the words more general in the event of a prosecution. A man might have it in his possession, and might say I have not it in use. The fact that he had it in his possession, is evidence that he had it for improper purposes.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I should like to see a clause added increasing the flash test.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It could not be put in this bill.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Some three years ago the flash test was reduced, and out in the west we found it very inconvenient. I would suggest that the government might take into consideration the advisability of increasing the flash test.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will mention it to the Minister. But my recollection is we had this flash test under consideration, and hon. gentlemen will recollect that we were some time in doubt as to the effect of the change, and it was found in the law as it stood many years ago, an error had been committed, and we were simply rectifying the error. There was no reduction of the flash test in reality.

IN COMMITTEE.

Bill (73) "An Act further to amend the Gas Inspection Act."—(Hon. Mr. Scott).

INLAND REVENUE BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole on Bill (75) "An Act further to amend the Inland Revenue Act.'

(In the Committee.)

On the second clause,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The second clause of this bill reduces the quantity of liquor that may be removed from 25 to 10 gallons. The trade desires this amendment, and no objection presents itself why this amendment should not be agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think that we should really have some further information upon this point. I have no doubt that when twenty-five gallons was fixed the department gave convincing and satisfactory reasons why no less quantity than twenty-five gallons should be allowed to be removed, and there is apparently some little objection to allowing a small keg to be removed from a warehouse. A man might carry it off under his arm. I think we should have a little further information as to why the department should change their minds. I have no doubt that the feeling of the dealers all along has been in favour of their being allowed to remove small packages. Why have the reasons become strong enough now to warrant the department in gratifying the desire of the dealers?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They say it will be much easier for them to withdraw ten gallon lots and the officials of the department see no objection to it. They say that it in no way affects the question of revenue, nor is there any more danger of the revenue being defrauded; and if they can, they think it quite reasonable to meet the demand of the trade.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am afraid that the Secretary of State has not shed very much additional light on the subject. I feel this way with respect to bills that come from the Inland Revenue Department, that there must be somebody in that department who devotes his holidays, probably, to devising alterations in the Inland Revenue law; every session we have a number of these alterations, and I do not think that the department should be permitted to make them unless a sufficient cause is shown; and I contend in the present instance no good and sufficient cause has been shown. I am not opposing this clause, but I should like to have from the department some explanation of the reason why they see fit to recommend the reduction of the quantity from 25 to 10 gallons.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is really no explanation that can not be easily understood. I suppose that year by year the department are learning from experience how far they can safely make concessions to the trade without any danger of the revenue suffering, and in this case they seem to think that the reduction from 25 to 10 gallon packages will not disturb the revenue or in any way affect the risk of fraud being practised. It is simply withdrawing 10 gallons instead of 25.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I concur in the opinion expressed by my hon. friend from Halifax, (Mr. Power), that this section of the Act was enacted, not for the protection of the revenue, but for the protection of the public at large, and it is the interest of the public that we are here to guard. It may be convenient for the Inland Revenue officials and those engaged in the liquor traffic to take out a smaller quantity than 25 gallons, but I think, as the hon. gentleman from Halifax says, that this section having been put here for a good reason in the first place, some good reason should be shown for making this change. Without such explanation I am opposed to the clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not see that it can make any difference to the public one way or the other. I cannot see how the public are interested whether it is taken out in 10 gallon packages or 25 gallon packages.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it does not affect any one, why make the change? The object must be to allow the distiller to sell spirit in quantities of ten gallons, instead of in 25 gallon packages. Is that it?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then this legislation is in the interest of the distiller.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The liquor is kept in bond, and the distiller, under this clause, will be allowed to take out ten gallons at a time, instead of 25 gallons.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

The Order of the Day being called,—

That when the Senate adjourns on Tuesday next, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 26th April, at 8.30 o'clock in the evening.—(Hon. Mr. Landry.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS said: I believe the usual practice is for the House to make a motion for an adjournment of this sort. I move that when the Senate adjourns on Tuesday next it do stand adjourned until Wednesday the 20th of April at 3 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to

YUKON TIMBER BERTHS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to—

Call the attention of the government to the Order in Council approved by the Governor in Council on the 28 day of February, 1898, and published in the Canada Gazette of the 26th day of March, 1898, being regulations for the disposal of timber berths in the provisional district of Yukon, which reads as follows:—

Clause 3. The area of a berth shall not exceed five square miles, and a berth shall not be less than one mile in breadth.

4. Not more than five berths of five square miles in the provisional district of Yukon shall be given to any one person or company.

5. A license to cut timber on the berth shall be issued yearly.

6. The licensee shall erect a saw-mill within a certain period to be fixed by the Minister of the Interior.

And will ask the government the following questions:—

In granting and laying out timber berths in the Yukon district, will provision be made to secure to the miners and pioneers in that district a supply of timber for the purpose of mining and fuel on the same conditions as the government now charge for timber?

Will the government deem it wise and proper, considering how sparsely timbered the Yukon district is, to limit the number of square miles of timber berths one person or company can take up?

Will the government or the person securing the berth, select the part of the district where the timber limit shall be situated?

He said: When I saw in the official Gazette the notice in reference to this matter with regard to timber limits in the Yukon country, I thought it was of very great importance, and that it would be my duty to bring it before this House and the ministers so that they could guard the interests of the miners in that country. We know very well that up in the Yukon country no mining can be done without burning a great deal of timber and fuel to thaw the frozen ground, and in the winter time a great deal of fuel is also required for domestic purposes. We can imagine the dissatisfaction and trouble it would create if a stranger came into the country and cut off the timber of the miners unless the government took care the limits were outside of the actual mining regions. Nothing could create a row or disturbance quicker than if those men found they were paying higher for their timber than they should pay. I hope the government will not endeavour to govern that country from an office in Ottawa. It is a perfect impossibility: you must govern it according to the conditions of the country, and timber limits of this kind could only be laid out properly and wisely by men who are on the ground, men of experience and men who know the country. The last question contains the gist of the whole matter—the selection of the timber limits. If it was outside of the mining district, it might not do any harm, but if it surrounds the mines, it will give a great deal of dissatisfaction and trouble.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am rather surprised at the observations of the hon. member from British Columbia, because those regulations are regulations not to cut timber to be manufactured for general exportation, but to cut timber for the use of the people who are in the Yukon district and not elsewhere. It would be quite impossible to engage in the manufacture of lumber in that section of the country with any scope of advantage for exportation.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We know that very well.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My. hon. friend says he knows that very well, so that he understands there is no danger or difficulty rising in that direction. Now what is the object? Why to furnish facilities for building the boats and shanties of those who are going into the country. The timber, if I understand it is merely on the southern border, in the vicinity of the lakes and the upper waters of the various tributaries of the Yukon River. Now the timber is very small, and the quantity of timber to the square mile is very limited indeed. Mills will be erected there and the mills for which these regulations provide will be very small ones, cutting a very limited quantity of lumber in the day. At the present time the parties going into that country are obliged to stop on their way and saw the lumber out of which their boats are to be built by which they are to carry their products down these tributaries of the Yukon. By permitting persons to go in with portable mills and to acquire a small area of timber, they will have the lumber cut and, in many cases, perhaps, boats built for sale to the parties who desire to get forward with as little delay as possible to their destination. Those timber limits are not in the vicinity of the mines where the mines are now situated. It may be that the quantity of timber in that country is limited ; it may be that the quantity required for the melting of the ice and for thawing the frost out of the gravel is not adequate for the miners' purposes—that may turn out to be the case ; but the miner can quite as well import timber for that purpose as he can import it for the purpose of building his boats and erecting his shanties to protect him against the inclemency of the severe frost and the long period over which the winter continues. There is no timber that will be cut under these regulations for any other purpose than for the use of the miners and for the use of the parties settling in the country carrying on trading operations with the miners, so that so far as the timber of that country is concerned, there is nothing in these regulations which would lead to waste. Whatever the resources of the country may be in this regard, they will be husbanded, and the most that can be made of them will be made of them. My hon. friend asks :

Will the government deem it wise and proper, considering how sparsely timbered the Yukon district is to limit the number of square miles of timber berths one person or company can take up.

Well, the government have done so in these regulations.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—One person can take up twenty-five square miles.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, that is not a large area.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is a large area in that country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Considering the small size of the timber it is not large. When men import mills into that country they would hardly do so unless they could get a sufficient area to keep them in operation for some period of time—for a few years. If you were to allow them only so small an area that they would exhaust it in the course of two or three years, it would never pay them to import a mill into the country. It would be better that there should be a few mills and that they should be employed for a number of years, than that there should be employed for a very short time. The timber for building purposes and for the construction of boats is likely to last longer under an arrangement of that sort. Then my hon. friend asks :

Will the government or the person securing the berth select the part of the district where the timber limit shall be situated.

The government in time, no doubt, will exercise a general oversight. When I say the government, I mean the authority which the government will establish in that country for the purpose that is on the ground and will have the best opportunity of judging where these limits can be granted with the least injury to the forest and to the greatest advantage of the mining population.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Can the minister say if any limits have been taken up at present ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot say. I have no doubt there are some being taken up, but to what extent it is impossible for me to inform my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman will see that the whole motive of my question is to preserve timber enough for the miners. The lumberman can take care of himself ; he can look out for his timber limit, but the miner, working hard all day, will find it impossible to look after the timber. He should have the timber preserved in the vicinity of the mines.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that this is all mining timber. The limit that a lumberman gets is of no value except for the use of the miner and the men trading with him. They require timber to erect houses in which to live and buildings in which supplies may be kept and from which supplies may be obtained. The whole of the timber is for the use of the inhabitants of the country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What my hon. friend calls the attention of the government to more particularly is the fact that a quantity of timber is required for thawing out the earth and for the use of the miner while carrying on his operations. The Minister of Justice has confined his remarks almost exclusively to the requirements of the miners for building purposes. That is not the point, I understand, to which my hon. friend from Victoria called attention. He points out the absolute necessity of preserving to the miner sufficient fuel to enable him to carry on his operations.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We cannot limit the purposes to which the timber may be applied. Let me illustrate: timber will be cut for the purpose of being used on the steamboats. My hon. friend would not suggest that cordwood should not be sold along any of the tributaries where boats will run. That will become as necessary as timber for the purpose of thawing out the frozen earth. All these provisions relate to the consumption of timber within the territory, and the government cannot pretend to say, nor ought it to undertake to say, to what purposes the timber shall be applied. It must be used to meet the necessity of the moment—it may be for building boats or for building houses, or to be used as fuel on steamboats, or for thawing out the frozen earth. All these things will regulate themselves. The only thing to be provided for is that the timber is not to be carried out of the country—it is there for the use of the mining population.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only difference will be that a person purchasing the wood for consumption on a steamboat or for building, or for thawing the earth, would have to pay for that to the limit holder just the same as he would, I presume, if he purchased the lumber that was sawn from the trees that were cut, so that he would become the landlord to that extent, at least, instead of the government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice on page 4 of the mining regulations—which I understand are the ones now in force—there is a provision which seems to contain a good deal of reference to the question asked by the hon. gentleman from Victoria. Speaking of the free miner's certificate the regulation reads:

> This certificate shall also grant to the holder thereof the privilege of fishing and shooting, subject to the provisions of any Act which has been passed or which may hereafter be passed for the protection of game and fish; also the privilege of cutting timber for actual necessities, for building houses, boats and for general mining operations; such timber, however, to be for the exclusive use of the miner himself, but such permission shall not extend to timber which may have been heretofore, or which may hereafter be granted to other persons or corporations.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a very good provision, but will that enable a miner to go upon a limit for which a man has paid? I think that it will not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, certainly not.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—The way to get over the difficulty will be to build the Edmonton route as quickly as possible. Coal is cheaper at Edmonton than any other place in Canada except Nova Scotia. It is said that it will take a longer time to build the Edmonton route because it is 800 miles further than the one favoured by the government. But if you have enough men you can build the road just as quickly as on the shorter route, and therefore I recommend the government to set to work to build the Edmonton route as soon as possible, and there will be no trouble about the timber, except such as is wanted for the building of boats and so on; but for heating purposes coal can be had in abundance between Edmonton and the Yukon, and that is why I would recommend the Edmonton route.

THE SALE OF LIQUOR IN YUKON DISTRICT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved:

> That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, all copies of telegrams or other instructions given to Major Walsh, respecting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Yukon district; also, for all instructions given to Major Walsh in the administration of his office under the government in the Yukon district.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

LIQUOR PERMITS IN YUKON DISTRICT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY rose to:

Ask the government, who advised the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories to grant the liquor permits given in the return laid before the Senate on the 29th March last; also, who got the permits for taking liquor into the Yukon district, on the 27th November last, or thereabouts, the number of gallons covered by such permits, and who recommended the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories to grant them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In reply to the hon. gentleman's question as to who advised the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories to grant liquor permits given in a return laid before the Senate on the 29th March, I believe it was the Department of the Interior, except in the case of the North American Transportation Company, and that I think the Lieutenant Governor granted on his own responsibility. My hon. friend asks the number of gallons covered by such permits and who recommended the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories to grant them. I am unable to give him that information.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has Mr. Walsh instructions under the authority which he has received from the department to grant liquor permits to take liquor into the North-west Territories in contravention of the ordinance and the powers of the North-west government?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend puts a question and a legal opinion along with it. I am not called upon to answer the legal opinion, and with regard to Major Walsh's instructions, I am unable to give him the information, but I will make inquiry.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have it on very good authority that Major Walsh has assumed the responsibility and power of issuing permits to take liquor into that country. I do not know what legal opinion I asked the hon. gentleman to consider. However, if I did ask for a legal opinion, I am quite sure that, as Minister of Justice, he would give it without fee or retainer.

COMMUNICATION WITH NAVIGABLE WATERS OF THE YUKON.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir JOHN CARLING moved:

That a special committee be appointed to inquire into the feasibility and probable cost of opening up direct communication during the present season, between the railway system of Canada and the navigable waters of the Yukon, and also as to the advantages which would flow therefrom to the trade of Canada; and that such committee be composed of the Honourable Messieurs Boulton, Bellerose, Cox, Drummond, Fiset, Lougheed, McCallum, Macdonald (Victoria), Macdonald (P.E.I.), MacInnes, Ogilvie, Perley, Primrose, Wood, and the mover, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

He said: My chief reason for making this motion is to assist the government, if possible, in ascertaining if a wagon road, or a pack road can be constructed this season so as to give access to the Yukon district from Edmonton, Prince Albert, Ashcroft, or some other point on the line of railway. I believe — and I think the country endorses the opinion—that a line from Edmonton to the Yukon, or perhaps some route in British Columbia is the correct and true route for the trade of eastern Canada. The distance from Edmonton to Dawson City, is something like 1,300 miles. I believe, from information that I can rely upon, that a wagon road is being constructed between Edmonton and the Peace River, a distance of 260 miles, which will be completed some time during this summer, and that 250 miles more of wagon road or pack road, if built, with the navigation that could be used, would bring us to the Pelly River, a distance of something like 1,000 miles from Edmonton. If that could be done, and if I am correct in the figures I have given, a pack road through to the upper waters of the Yukon can be completed during the present season, and cattle and horses and provisions can be taken through that way by a route which runs through this agricultural, wooded and gold bearing country from Edmonton to the Yukon. A committee was appointed by this House some ten years ago, of which Sir John Schultz was chairman, for the purpose of making an inquiry into the capabilities of that large section of country lying between Hudson Bay and the foot of the Rocky Mountains, an extent of country something like 1,200,000 square miles, a large portion of which abounds with minerals (gold, silver and copper), and large fields of petroleum, which have not yet been fully explored. If an examination of the kind which I suggest be made by competent men, there is no doubt that gold will be found in large quantities in the valley of the Peace River. Then, after travelling some 400 or 500 miles further through forest land, I believe there is a gold bearing country extending 700 miles north and south equal to the gold fields of the Yukon River. My figures come from a reliable source. I give them as they were given to me by Mr. Oliver:

Wagon road now in use, Edmonton to Peace River	260 miles.
Steam navigation of Peace River on Peace River to Fort St. John	140 "
Wagon road, St. John to Forks of Nelson	150 "
Steam navigation, down Nelson and up Liard to foot of rapids	135 "
Wagon road around rapids on Liard	35 "
Steam navigation on Liard through Rocky Mountains to foot of Brulé Portage	40 "
Wagon road, foot of Brulé Portage to head of Cranberry Portage	15 "
Navigation, head of Cranberry Portage to Frances Lake	175 "
Wagon road, Frances Lake to Pelly River	50 "
Total	1,000 miles.
Pack and cattle trail for driving cattle and horses, parallel to navigable stretches	440 miles.
Wagon road to be constructed	250 "
Wagon road already constructed	260 "
Total	950 miles.

Now, if it can be carried out—and I have no doubt it can be if the government are willing to undertake the work, and I am very glad to say that I have heard that a sum of $40,000 has been appropriated in the estimates to make a survey for a line of railway from Edmonton to the Yukon—if we can by a liberal expenditure of money during the present season make a pack road from Edmonton to Pelly River to give us access to the Yukon by navigation from Pelly River to Dawson City, we will have done a great deal for the people of this country. Nearly all the supplies taken into that country east of the Rocky Mountains would go by this route via Edmonton. To accomplish that an extra effort by the government of the country and by the parliament of Canada should be made to provide communication which would meet the wishes of the great majority of the people of this country. I need not say how anxious I am—and I am sure how anxious this House, and the people of Canada are—that proper communication should be established through that vast country from Edmonton to the Yukon There are routes that have been spoken of which are perhaps as good—over the Rocky Mountains from Ashcroft through gold districts that are now developed, or from Prince Albert—but the eyes of the people of Canada, east of the Rockies are now fixed upon a line from Edmonton as the best route that can possibly be opened up to give access to that gold country. Between Edmonton and the Yukon I feel confident that there are as rich gold fields to be developed as there are in the Yukon, when they become accessible. I hope the government will consent to this resolution, and that the committee will be appointed, and the necessary inquiries made, so that before the month of May steps shall be taken to open up a pack road and, if possible, to construct a telegraph line from Edmonton to the Yukon. The hon. minister may say that it will be expensive. No doubt it will be, but I am quite satisfied that the country is willing to expend any reasonable amount of money that may be required to open up that section of the country with a pack road and a telegraph line and later on to construct a railway suitable to the needs of the traffic, for which it would be used. A telegraph line can be established for about 200 or 250 dollars per mile right through that section of country. The poles can be easily got on the way, and the country is not hard to cross, and by having a telegraph line and a pack road enabling miners to go through with cattle and with horses, it will be a decided advantage to the large majority of the people of this country. I hope there will be no objection to this committee and that it will be appointed by a unanimous vote of the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This inquiry would be altogether useless for the purpose for which we are seeking communication with the Yukon district at the present time. The proposition of my hon. friend reminds me of Washington Irving's history of New York. It is a history from the beginning of the world to the end of the Dutch dynasty, for the greater portion of the history relates to a period when there was no Netherlands settlement in New York. My hon. friend proposes to begin the construction of a road nearly 1,500 miles away from the Yukon country for the purpose of obtaining admission to that country, when there is railway communication extending several hundred miles nearer to the Yukon than the point at which he proposes to start, and my hon. friend supposes that the people who want to go to the Yukon country are going to travel over a road consisting of water stretches with intervening wagon roads, rather than take the Canadian Pacific Railway as far as it can go in the direction of that country. I am rather surprised that my hon. friend should, at this late date, become a convert to the system of water stretches, and especially when they extend over with the intervening wagon roads, so long a stretch of country. Now my hon. friend speaks of the Liard River as one of the links in that highway which he intends to adopt in order to avoid going into British Columbia, which one would suppose is a region in which some pestilential disease had broken out of which my hon. friends on the opposite side of the House had an extraordinary dread. We have, first, the hon. member from British Columbia, who seemed anxious that trade and commerce should shun his province, and then that feeling is intensified by the discussion of every project which has been submitted to the consideration of this House. Now there can be little doubt that the easiest way into that country in Canadian territory, the most expeditious way, the way that would enable the population to come in there without the difficulties associated with long stretches of wagon roads, was the one which the government submitted to this House and which this House rejected, which consisted in part of navigable waters and in part of railway.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Water stretches.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend may regard the Pacific Ocean as a water stretch, but it is one which furnishes a good deal of room for navigation. Let me say further, that this is quite beside the question. I admit that favourable communication may at some time, perhaps no distant day, be obtained by some way east of the Rocky Mountains. One who looks at the map, who has studied the geography of that country, who has paid attention to the fertility of the soil and the amount of rain fall in the year, would say the natural point of beginning, is connection with the north-west extremity of the Dauphin road, or the Manitoba and North-western, and crossing the Saskatchewan country in the vicinity of Prince Albert, to extend the road on the north side of the river some little distance north of Edmonton and which could be connected with the Edmonton by a short link of railway. The North-west Territories will never be well settled by an agricultural population until that is done, because the railway construction, west of Regina at all events, and I might say almost west of Brandon, has been run through a dry district in which a large agricultural population is never likely to settle.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. The finest agricultural country in the North-west lies between Regina and Brandon.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—At all events, the most western limit of that district is Regina. When you get west of that you get into a dry district, and the rainfall is not sufficient every year to make the crops a certainty; but if you go into the district I speak of, you get into a country capable of sustaining a large agricultural population, and where the products of the soil are likely to be as certain as they are in any other district on the North American continent. Now the Peace River district is connected with that, and if our object is to let in a large agricultural population seeking settlement in that country, the sooner we can push forward that road to meet the requirements of that population the better, and the agricultural population in the north-west section of that country—that is of the Peace River district—would be enabled to furnish supplies of food and of other things that might be required by the miners in the Yukon country more cheaply than any other, because they would be nearer the neighbourhood of the gold fields than any other section of our population. But all those are matters looking to the future, not the immediate future but to a future that may be some years away from us yet. The population at the present time is moving in the direction of the Yukon country and if you do not furnish moderately fair facilities for getting into that country through British territory, they are likely to go to Lynn Inlet and cross from there through United States territory. Where have we in British territory the means of establishing expeditious communication for the people? I say from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake. We have that, and if the Senate thought it desirable that a step should be immediately taken for the extension of this road southward so as to connect with Observatory Inlet, then we would have a continuous road that would be used throughout the year, and that could be completed within the next eighteen months. There is a possible means of communication; and further than that, your road between Observatory Inlet and Telegraph Creek, all in British Columbia, would run through a mining district which is believed to be rich in mineral wealth and capable of supporting a large mining population, and to whom it would be necessary that facilities should be furnished by the British Columbia government, or by the government of Canada, or perhaps partly by both. Now my hon. friend proposes a resolution to do what? Why, to meet an immediate requirement, and that he proposes to do by a road which he says is 1,350 miles in length. Yes, if you could draw an astronomical line on the surface of the globe, it might not be more than 1,350 miles, but I venture to say that any line you build, and you may make it as straight as it is in your power to make it, would be at least 150 miles longer than my hon. friend mentioned. A wagon road constructed from Edmonton northward, while it might be advantageous for the settlement of the Peace River district, if we had a large population disposed to go thither, is of no value at this moment to enable us to make the Yukon country a country in which Canadian people can trade. For eastern Canada the British Columbia merchant is your distributor in that country, and must be so for some time to come. You cannot fix a point east of the Rocky Mountains for the next five years that can be a distributing point for Canadian merchandise. Either Victoria or Vancouver is the point to which you must go if you want a road which will enable your people to send the products of this country into the Yukon. Can you do it over a wagon road, in canoes running through rapids, conducted through them in some cases by the skill of the Indians, in other places portages where you cannot build a wagon road at the present time, where it would require an immense expenditure of money to lay the foundations of a road at all—in fact if you were to build a railway it would not be a much larger expenditure than would be required for that purpose? I ask of what value would communication of that kind be to the people of Canada in order to control the commerce of that distant country? It would be of no value whatever. I am not willing that there should be any delusion resting upon the minds of the mercantile classes of this country with regard to a project of this sort. Then, let me ask further, if we wish to retain political control of that country, what great amount of service would this road be? To march people a distance of 1,500 miles without any base of operation nearer than your starting point without the means of bringing in adequate supplies of food and military equipment of every sort, I ask what use would it be to you? Supposing that by September next you have forty or fifty thousand citizens of the Western States, men who have never paid much regard to law in their own country, men who are in a great measure a law unto themselves, who think that your regulations are unreasonable, who are disposed to assert their authority, who will respect the regulations you make as long as they think they meet their interests, and who will disregard them when they come to a contrary conclusion. I ask how are you to maintain control over these people at that distance, and of what use would the proposed road from Edmonton, of the character described by my hon. friend, be in the case? I say, with all respect to my hon. friend, that that road would be practically of no use to us. It may be of use in securing the settlement of the Peace River country in the first instance, but even for that purpose it would be of no practical value, unless you were to supersede it almost immediately by a railway constructed there. You cannot get people to-day to go fifty miles away from a railway and settle in a country. You have at this moment a considerable stretch of fertile territory between Yorkton and Prince Albert unoccupied, and why? Because it does not pay people to settle away from some railway station, where it would cost the whole value of their products to reach the nearest point of shipment

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We want to find out about this.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are some things about which you are already informed.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman was very wise the other day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend showed a great deal of wisdom upon the project submitted by the government to this House, and so he desires further light. I have not the slightest objection that light should be had. I have not the slightest disposition to prevent my hon. friend from London getting all the information he may desire. But I say that the information which he seeks is not information which will enable him to utilize the navigable waters, or any road which he may build, for the purpose of maintaining our advantages of trade in the Yukon country. That to my mind is perfectly clear, and I would say that any hon. gentleman who supports the government, who goes upon a committee making such a declaration, would be assisting my hon. friend and those associated with him in undertaking to leave upon the public mind the impression that this project, which is indicated here, is to be a substitute for that line of policy which the government submitted to the consideration of parliament. I say it is no substitution at all. It cannot be a substitution. It would practically either destroy the prospect of mining in that country, or it would destroy our control over the trade and over the government of the country. My hon. friend and those associated with him may undertake by a majority in this House to control the country and to give direction to the public policy in regard to it, but I wish to call his attention to this—and he has had a good deal of experience in the affairs of government—that this is a new departure in our constitutional system. Heretofore the administrative policy of the country has rested with the advisors of the Crown, sustained by a majority in the House of Commons. Usually the Senate—and especially when my hon. friend and those associated with him have been in office—has acquiesced in the policy of the government and in the decision of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—When it was right.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—On this occasion they have repudiated the policy of the government, and they have disregarded and set at defiance the opinion of the House of Commons, and now, as the next step, my hon. friend practically says "your views and your policy for securing admission into that country were all wrong, and the course marked out by this resolution ought to be adopted."

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—He simply wants information.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He may persist in that, but he cannot expect to lead the government and the House of Commons along the line which he has marked out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. Minister of Justice tell us the meaning of this item in the estimates to which my hon. friend from London referred on page 46, item 146 :

To defray expenses of an exploratory survey to ascertain the most practical route for an all-Canadian railway from some point on an existing railway to the Klondike district.

In view of the speech which he has just made will he tell me what that paragraph means ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that that is nothing more than what the hon. Secretary of State mentioned, that we proposed to survey that country, to explore it to see where a railway may be constructed.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is just what he wants.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But not for immediate use. We say if you are able to build a mile a day it would take five years to build that road, and what we propose to do is to obtain accurate surveys of the country, and to see where a road can be best built. We say the Peace River country is well suited for settlement and we expect it will be settled.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the object of this estimate is to accomplish what my hon. friend from London has moved for ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend will see the next item is for $35,000 for an exploratory survey of the Stikine route, so that the first $10,000 must be for some other object than making connection with the Klondike by a route on the Pacific coast.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, my hon. friend will persist in saying that the thirty or forty thousand dollars must be for a survey from some other point than the Stikine. Certainly it is. It is exploration of the country east of the Rocky Mountains. It is not with the expectation of obtaining immediate admission into the country that way. That is an impossibility, and the government do not propose to undertake impossibilities, but it is for the purpose of enabling the government to obtain the necessary information to know what are the possibilities of railway construction through that country whenever railway construction becomes necessary.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—And this committee will help you.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not the object of it. The words of my hon. friend's resolution are: "Probable cost of opening up direct communication during the present season."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not for the purpose of obtaining connection the present season.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So much the worse for the resolution.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see this resolution is to undertake an impossibility.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. leader of the government has taken exception to the motion made by my hon. friend from London, and in doing so it appears to me that he does not wish any light to be thrown upon one of the most important questions before the country to-day, that is the various routes and the most feasible and advantageous one, from a Canadian standpoint, into the Yukon district. My hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, will realize that no more important question can be brought up by either House of parliament than to endeavour to enlighten the public mind upon this very matter. The hon. Minister of Justice seems to view this route with a certain degree of jealousy because the government have got a counter proposition for a route on the Pacific coast.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not jealousy at all.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is the only motive that I can conceive that would prevent this House making an investigation and gaining information for the benefit of the government, and of the people to ascertain the practicability and the feasibility of a route from Edmonton.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are making an appropriation to get that information.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, that is a survey. I cannot conceive any more useful purpose to which this honourable House can be put than that which has been brought up for a discussion by the hon. senator from London. It is not in opposition to the government in any shape or form. We certainly threw out a bill that was brought before us in regard to this very question of routes and the construction of a railway, but it was not the question of a route or the construction of a railway that caused this honourable House to take an adverse view to that which the government held—it was the excessive cost of a short line of railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was not to cost a dollar.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If you do not consider the clothes on your back as worth anything, if you do not consider materials and commodities as being exactly the same as money, I can understand that contention. I consider the gold in that Yukon district as being equal to money. But that is not the question before us. The question is, what is the best thing for the development of that country? What will assist the labour that is going to be engaged in developing those resources for Canada? It is not what is best for the merchants in Montreal or Toronto that we have to consider in the development of that country; that will follow as a natural sequence. Let us assist the labour to make wealth, and then let the merchants compete for it, and let the government aid by providing an all-Canadian route into that country, and our merchants can beat anything in that country. The hon. Minister of Justice applied the term "water-stretches" to this road; I cannot see where that comes in at all. It is not a question of water-stretches. This committee is for the purpose of establishing a wagon trail right through. But as the hon. gentleman has referred to water-stretches, I should like to quote from a paper that I see is headed "our water-stretches," in order to show how this paper views the road by Teslin Lake and the Stikine River. The writer puts it in a kind of comical way and says :

"Well now," said the stranger as he was being shown round the city of Montreal, en route to the Klondike, "this is a pretty fine city, it looks wealthy." "Yes," was the answer. "You see the gold gets washed down by the C. P. R. and we collect it here. It is what you call a placer mine." "Ah yes, that is what I am going to find in the Yukon."

The above remarks were overheard and we determined to keep our eye on the adventurous stranger, as we journeyed together to the land of the setting sun, and perpetual day or night,

"I say, porter, you have a very comfortable car, this is a good road, is it like this all the way to Dawson City." We next overheard in our eavesdropping, "Why, yes sir," said the porter, "I have never been on the northern end of our line, but you will find it the same all through to Dawson City, just a picnic, always the same on the C.P.R."

The next time we were brought into contact was at Verdant Green, a station in Manitoba ; where he had telegraphed on to meet his brother.

"Why Fritz do you mean to say that it is you, why have you got those clothes on, have you been to a carnival or are you in disguise." "No Mordant, I have to work for my living or at least I do not work for my living, I work for the Canadian Pacific Railway and the government." "Is that so ? Do they give you an income ? No I give them an income, and yet they are on strike half the time." "You had better come along with me and get a placer mine." "Well no, you see, the Emperor, that is Van Horne, is sending up two of his kings to take possession of that country and they will take your blankets to cover their squaws, and it is a mighty cold country." "Well ta ta."

Vancouver. "This way sir, Canadian Pacific Railway steamer sir, Wetancoddle straight for the Yukon Are you bound for Stikine sir, or Dichere."

I'll stick you if you don't shut up.

"Got your license sir ?" "What license ?" License to work sir, to thaw the ground, the license to explore sir, for Mackenzie our sultan under Mann his grand vizier. The great McKenzie River called after him sir.

"Does this baggage contain your provisions sir," 'what provisions' ? "Food sir. No dining car on the C. P. R. north. 'That sir is my baggage.'

"Better trade it off sir, for half a ton of pork and half a ton of flour sir, ten cases of patent medicines, a pint of rum, a pick axe and a box of matches. Queer country this.

All aboard for Stikine and Tangle Island.

"Now sir this way for the great through route to the north pole.' 'Do you mean to say that we have to get onto another steamer.' "Yes sir, 150 miles to Stickthere." "Well I suppose I must go on." Yes sir, no return tickets on this route sir. Three days up stream. Stick there. Now sir change here, punts take you up to railway sir, only ten miles to Cable City. Cable City. Shall I carry you ashore sir ?" "Carry me anywhere, I don't wan't to stick here."

'All aboard for Pesky River railway, great through route to the north pole, get ahead of Nansen on this route sir, find Andree's balloon sir, make a great name sir.

Next day. Teslin Lake. "All aboard, sir. Lake steamer for Howtodrinka River, beautiful scenery, catch your own fish for dinner." "Well now, I thought this was a through route." "So it is, sir, through your pocket. Commence to take in your belt line for dinner." "Oh, where am I ?" "Must go on, sir, can't turn back, jam too great behind, plenty of companions, sir. Only one more change, sir, to river steamer on the Howtodrinka River, and then, sir, a chance to work for gold." "Are you sure that there are no more changes ?" "Quite sure, oh no, sir. I quite forgot, sir, a change of weather, sir."

The last we saw of our travelling companion was stepping out of a river boat to get over a portage and with tears in his eyes saying to himself, "Why did I leave home ? Oh, why did I leave home ?"

I merely read this in order to show you here what this paper is pointing out in a humorous way — what are our water stretches.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Those are the government water stretches.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, and we see that the term is far more applicable to the water stretches on that route than on the route that the hon. gentleman from London has referred to. There are no water stretches on the Edmonton route. It is proposed to make a wagon road. Now, I want to point out this : if the Mackenzie-Mann contract had gone through hastily, the railway would have got all the benefit of the transportation, the people would not have got any, they would have had to pay for the transportation. If you develop the Edmonton route, you cannot tell how many teams may be enabled next winter to go all the way into the Yukon River themselves, without any charges or without any cost ; and it is going to be an immense advantage to the country to gain the information that has been asked for by this committee. I cannot conceive at all why the government should oppose it ; it is not a costly thing, nor will it involve any trouble. It may establish the advantages of the Edmonton route to the people who live on the east side of the Rocky Mountains. I should like to call the attention of the government to this fact, that every member from the North-west Territories, even those who voted for the Glenora and Teslin Lake Railway contract, favours this Edmonton route. Now, are the government determined to govern that territory quite irrespective of the views of those who represent the people of that part of Canada, and purely according to their own views ? They cannot have the same practical knowledge of that country that those who live nearer the scene of action possess. Here is my hon. friend from Wolseley (Mr. Perley), my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed), and myself in this House, and there is my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Macdonald), all opposed to the development of the route under that contract.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I am not opposed to the route; I am opposed to giving four million acres of land for it. I say build ten Teslin Lake routes if you like, but do not give that land away.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What I said was "the development of that route under that contract." Then we have the hon. member from Alberta who is opposed to that contract and greatly in favour of the Edmonton route. We see in the Winnipeg Tribune, the organ of the member for Lisgar in the other House, that in his opinion the government acted hastily and with insufficient information in making the contract with Mackenzie & Mann. Although he is a supporter of the government and supported the contract, in order to make himself right with the people in his own constituency he is pointing out where the fault of the government lay.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Who is that?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Mr. Richardson. Another member from the west told me "I am opposed to the contract, but of course we have all to vote for the party; we have to stick together." Every representative from that western country favours the route indicated in the motion of my hon. friend from London (Sir John Carling). Is it fair for the government to denounce the action of those who are opposed to them in this House as being dictated by a partisan spirit and a desire to usurp the executive authority which rests with the government? The government surely will not say, while this branch of parliament is in existence, that the Senate have not the right to exercise their judgment on any question that comes before them. In the interest of that western country the object we should have in view is to bring the heavy produce of the west, the cattle, the wheat, the flour and everything raised there, into as close proximity to the mining lands as we possibly can; and not only that, but to bring the trade of eastern Canada to the mining country at the lowest possible cost. The leader of the House wants to take the whole of that trade across the continent and send it in by Teslin Lake. How can we conduct trade economically when we have to ship goods by rail across the continent, transfer them to ocean vessels, tranship to river steamer, transfer to the railroad at Glenora, tranship to lake steamers at Teslin Lake and convey them down to Dawson City, and then have only a summer route?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—What will the Edmonton route be?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—An all-rail route all through.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—All rail?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Certainly. Have you lost confidence in the ability of Canada to build railroads? We have built 16,000 miles of railways and are able to build a great many more. With the exception of two railroads out west, which are in litigation, every railroad in Canada is paying its way, so the government need not be afraid to undertake the construction of a railway from Edmonton to the Yukon district. With that road we would have a better route than any that could be had from the Pacific coast. I do not put myself in antagonism to the development of a route on the Pacific coast, but let us ascertain the relative merits of those competing routes. What the government proposes to do is this: to build a railway from Observatory Inlet, on Portland Canal, right up to Teslin Lake, and that would be only a summer route. Supposing the government were to expend their money on that, would they be likely to spend a dollar on the Edmonton route, which would compete with the western route? I say they would not. It is for us, who live in the western country, to take time by the forelock to investigate the Edmonton route so as to bring public opinion to bear on the government—that is, if the government care anything about public opinion. I believe that the public opinion of the country is with the Senate in the action they took on the Mackenzie & Mann contract, and against the government for entering into that contract on very short notice, without asking for tenders and on the very eve of the meeting of parliament. Therefore the Senate, consisting of old and experienced politicians and statesmen, should use their judgment to try and gauge for themselves what is in accord with public opinion, and I firmly believe that public opinion will be with the Senate in the formation of a committee of this kind, the object of which is to throw more light on the subject which is uppermost in the minds of the people at the present time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The discussion, particularly the speech of the hon. gentleman from Shell River (Mr. Boulton), is rather aside from the proposition submitted to us by the hon. gentleman from London. That proposition is to inquire into the feasibility of "securing direct communication with the Yukon country during the present season." That is the whole pith of the proposition. I ask any hon. gentleman whether it is at all possible if you spend half a million, or even a million dollars, on the Edmonton route you could make it possible to reach the Yukon country by that line during the present season? Certainly not. I say so with the information I have been able to get, and I have looked for information everywhere that I could obtain it. I fully appreciate the enormous advantage to Canada of opening up the route via Edmonton, because we have agricultural lands to a very considerable distance north of Edmonton, but the distance from Edmonton to Dawson is 1,600 miles and it has been found impossible for even small parties to get through that way in less time than six months. There is positive proof of that, and it is idle to say that during the present season we could utilize the route by Edmonton. The whole point of the proposal submitted by the government to parliament was the importance of having a line of communication into that country during the present year. I will just quote one or two figures to show hon. gentlemen the immense importance of keeping that point in view. It is hoped that 50,000 people will go into that country this year. They will require to take at least 50,000 tons of provisions and supplies, apart altogether from machinery and the various implements needed in that country. Will hon. gentlemen believe that to-day you cannot make a contract to take anything to Dawson City under three or four hundred dollars a ton?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—How long will that last? Until navigation opens.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it will last longer, and the price will increase. I believe you will not be able to get freight carried through for less than $500 a ton.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Not after navigation opens?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is utterly impossible to get it up the Yukon. You could not make a contract to-day to deliver 10,000 tons of supplies in Dawson during the coming season for less than $300 a ton.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C)—That is only 1½ cent a pound.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It will cost $15,000,000 at that rate to get 50,000 tons in there this year. You just begin to realize what it means. Our whole plea in building that connection between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake was that we should be able to open communication for at least two months by rail to Teslin Lake, and you could float any quantity of stuff down from Teslin Lake to Dawson City, because you could have a line of boats leaving every five minutes if necessary, and of course they are building boats on the lakes and streams up there.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask one question? He speaks of the enormous amount of supplies which would go up this year. Supposing that Yukon Railway Bill had been passed the other day, would it have made any difference as to the means of getting up there?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—That railway was not to be completed till September, and I heard the contractors say—and I do not suppose it is any violation of confidence to state it now—that while they would have had it partially built by September, it would not be completely finished, so that it would make no difference.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They told us they would forfeit that quarter of a million if they had not the road ready to carry passengers and freight by September. Time was the essence of the contract, and contracts were made to deliver stuff up to the first of September. Of course, they could have run during the winter months, and it would be a very easy matter to run sleigh roads from Teslin Lake.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—To where?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Right through to Dawson.

Hon. Mr. MACMILLAN—Six hundred miles ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Did the hon. gentleman see the statement made in the Toronto Globe on Saturday by Mr. Wade, that it had to be thoroughly appreciated and understood that, in the winter time, no means of communication can be had by any means excepting by horses or dogs or men going out ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before next winter there will be at least two or three lines of communication there by stage carrying passengers through. To-day a contract has been made by Mr. Richardson to carry the United States mail through Canadian territory by permission of Canada, I think fortnightly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where from ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It will go in somewhere along the border, Pyramid Harbour, or Dyea, or Skagway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—By the Dalton route ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know what route, but it will go through Canadian territory. It will go through to Circle City and Canadian points.

There is another company formed, and there is a bill now before the House, which proposes to run a line of stages—an express company.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Where ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They will enter at Lake Bennett.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am glad to hear it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the Stikine route is not opened, the objective point is Lake Bennett.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Does the hon. gentleman mean to say there is any sort of contract, either now being made, or in contemplation, to run a stage route from Teslin Lake through following the river there to Dawson City ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. I do not know the point : they strike either Lake Bennett or some point on the Lynn Canal.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is the Dalton trail.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not at all. It goes through the Lynn Canal. It is a United States contract to carry the United States mail. They carry it through their own territory, and they get permission from us and it goes on to our territory immediately. The fringe of territory there is a comparatively narrow one, and they carry it on down to Dawson City and through to Circle City. I see the United States government are paying over $50,000. I do not recollect the exact figures. I merely quote that to show that that is the feasible route, that people have been over it, and are making preparations to carry freight and passengers through—that is the only route they say, by which they can be brought in. Even at $300 a ton, 50,000 tons will cost $15,000,000, and you will see what the miners have to pay. It costs them $15 or $20 a day to live.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How much would it have been reduced if the railway were constructed ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certainly it would be less than half.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—All I can say is our teams from the North-west Territories will undertake to carry freight through at $300 a ton.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is plenty of opportunity to do it. They want a responsible company that will carry through freight to Dawson City for $300 a ton. I understand the prices have gone up since the bill was rejected. I am so advised on good authority. It becomes a question of very great moment, going into that country.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—How could the defeat of the bill affect the present rates ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It does. They put up the rates. It is the Yukon River that is affected.

Hon. Mr. MILLER — Your contract would not be fulfilled till next September.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The freights now being brought in are for next year. You cannot deliver a pound of freight before the first of July next year.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is right.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It does not alter the point.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Had the road been built, it would at once have brought down the price of freights, because you could move in freights by sleigh from Teslin Lake at a less cost than the cost of freight delivered without the road to Dawson.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—How far is it from Teslin Lake?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Six hundred miles to Dawson.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Does not the hon. gentleman know that a team could not haul enough provisions to feed them?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Well, I do not know. The bill was to be presented to this House asking for authority to establish a stage line. The parties have been over the ground and are familiar with the difficulties.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—A stage line from Teslin Lake or Lynn Canal?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It makes very little difference. It is through Canadian territory; whether it goes from Lake Bennett or Teslin Lake makes very little difference. They are both running under similar conditions. Both have the same difficulties to encounter, but that is not the point. We are met with the objection that it is not feasible: I say it will be feasible. If you get your freight across from Stikine to Teslin Lake, then you could move it on down. At all events, you would have the two months navigation to go on with. I have no objection, nor could the government have any objection, to an inquiry about the Edmonton route. They say it is absolutely futile for the present. The proposal is "the feasibility of a route during the present season." The hon. gentleman must recognize that that would be absolutely impossible.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The motion does not say the Edmonton route.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I quite admit that, but the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution spoke of the Edmonton route, and spoke of it as the all-Canadian route. I fully appreciate its importance, and we would all like to see a railway constructed from Edmonton. It would no doubt be an advantage to Canada, but are we prepared to incur an enormous expenditure for the developing of the Yukon country for the transitory period of prosperity that will evolve during the time the gold is found there? If the gold mining is to continue for twenty years, then it is of importance we should expend a very considerable amount in order to have an all-Canadian route into this district. But is any hon gentleman prepared to say it would be wise in us to spend ten or twenty millions before we know more about the country? What does the proposal mean? The expenditure of $40,000,000, and the hon. gentleman calmly speaks of spending $40,000,000 on the road to Dawson.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We spent $300,000,000 on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but we opened the country and we opened the mines.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—What good would the gold mines be to the maritime provinces?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is nothing but the gold that attracts people to these mining districts, and when once the gold is gone the place is deserted. Does anybody go in there for anything but gold? People are very solicitous about the miner; the miner must be protected. It is only the miner, and who is he? He is a speculator, and in nine cases out of ten he is a foreign speculator. A gentleman who had been up there said he met a man who had come from Switzerland, a poor miserable creature who could not earn a dollar, and he went up there and made $50,000, and was going home to live on it. He found a pocket, found $50,000 and put it in his own pocket, and went away with it. That is only one case, but I mention that as an illustration of what is going on every hour, and here we are so solicitous and anxious about the poor miner who goes in there, who is a foreigner, and wants to get the gold, and leave the "accursed country," as he would call it, as soon as possible. Yet we are so sensitive about him, that we entirely ignore the enormous benefit the people of Canada may get from that by our making some sacrifice of the miners' interests in that country. It matters not to the people of this country very much how the mines are developed from the way we look at it. If you can have it in Canadian hands it will be much better, as the money is likely to flow into Canadian channels; but now we have thrown the country open to all the world and, as I said before, without any doubt at least 90 per cent of the people who are going in there are foreigners.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Look at the licenses and the duties and the royalty the country gets.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Why, hon. gentlemen, we are going to spend this year over half a million dollars for administration in that country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You must attach much importance to the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Could we leave it alone? Let us be reasonable, let us take some course that will be sustained by common sense. We have to do something with the country, we have to protect the people who go in there; we have to make inquiries as to the capacity of the country; and this Senate would be the first to condemn us if we went on blindly.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You were going at it blindly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We were not going it blindly. We know very well if railway access had been obtained into that country, the Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann contract only gave them rights over 5 per cent of the country, and from what Mr. Ogilvie said a day or two ago in London, the whole country will probably turn out just as rich, but, as he said, it will take from ten to fifteen years to make the discovery. He pointed out that since 1886 they had only made discoveries along the Klondike and the Bonanza and streams immediately tributary. He could not tell whether the shores along the Stuart and Indian River and dozens of other rivers might not turn out as rich. No investigation has been made or can be made until you have 100,000 people there, and even that will not be sufficient. There was an advantage in the Mackenzie & Mann contract in that they would have induced people to put money into it. They had to employ labour; that labour would consume Canadian products and there is where our advantage is, and where the substantial benefits to the people of Canada will be in this matter. Hon. gentlemen all seem to be keenly alive to the interests of the miner. I think the people of Canada have to be particularly interested in that country. The idea of building a railway from Edmonton at once at a cost of $20,000 a mile without our knowing anything about it! Why the total cost would be $32,000,000.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—No one is asking you to do that.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We want to find out if the government can land ten thousand tons of provisions at the elbow of the Liard. The hon. gentleman knows that we can go by the Mackenzie and down the Liard; that is 800 miles on the road.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have tried to read everything that was published and I have seen some of the reports of parties who came through there—and I certainly do not want to reflect in the slightest on the benefit of the Edmonton route; on the contrary, my prejudice is in favour of it as being Canadian, and opening up a country that is valuable, wholly apart from mines—but I have seen most damaging reports by parties that have been through there. And there is that fact of the prospecting party which left last September and who have not been heard of. We get advices from Dawson City within five or six weeks. I had the names of the party, but one of the officers was recognized as being a man who had had considerable experience in the North-west and who ought to know pretty well the value of the route; but there is the fact. Hon. gentlemen who are familiar with the transportation service of the Hudson's Bay Company there must recognize that they have always had to get their stock in there a year in advance. We have to recognize that fact. The hon. gentleman's proposal to inquire into the value of the Edmonton route is a very good one, but it is not valuable as enabling us to get in supplies this year. I am already informed that orders have been cancelled all over Canada because there will be no railway to carry them.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Would the railway have carried them?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, from the month of September. We know pretty well that two months' operations on a railway would carry a very large amount of freight; and if hon. gentlemen will read the contract with Mackenzie & Mann they will see that if the road was not in proper condition for running on the 1st September they would have forfeited a quarter of a million of dollars which they had put up in the Bank of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—This is a very singular discussion which is before the Senate just now, and what good can come of it I can hardly make out. It appears that the Senate have decided, by a very pronounced majority, that the scheme proposed by the government should not become law. That is settled. The hon. member from London proposes that an investigation shall be held to give us more information as to the best way of getting into that country. This is strenuously opposed by the members of the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Then I do not know what the speeches of the two hon. gentlemen amount to if they do not mean that they are opposed to the appointment of this committee. Now, it appears the desire of the government is to get immediate access into the Yukon country. And it is absolutely important and of great necessity to get access to that country—for what purpose? Why, to get supplies to the great number of miners and speculators in that country and those who are now anxious to go there. It appears to me, from the facilities already provided, that there are as many people in there now as can live—enough there for the present; we don't want to get a roadway there to bring in a much greater number to that country just now, not by any means. It seems to me more necessary, if they cannot live there, to provide a way of their getting out; but as they are there now, they will be able to find their way out in the same way they found their way in. One thing this Senate has decided, not against a route from the Pacific Ocean, but against this gamble which more than one member of the government has admitted they entered into. The government not only entered into it, but they took into partnership with them Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and played the game with marked cards—against whom? Against the people of Canada, the people of the Yukon district. The people put up all the stakes, and the gamble was between these gentlemen. Now this House has decided that that shall not take place. So far as I am concerned, I am quite willing, if the government, from the information they have been able to get—and I take it for granted they have been able to get better and more precise information than this House has been able to procure—can propose any other system, and I would suggest that if they are going to get access into that country by an all-Canadian route, it is at a Canadian port down on the Pacific coast they should commence their line. They should never think of commencing their line in the middle of the mountains 300 miles away from the Pacific coast. Let them commence their line at Observatory Inlet, or Portland Canal, and build their railway from there until they get up to Teslin Lake. That, in my opinion, is the common sense view of it, and if they wish to undertake this matter as a government work, and to make the resources of that country pay for the railway, then I say if they want a monopoly on behalf of the government until the amount of the traffic on that road pays for its construction, I would have no objection to granting that monopoly, and I believe if the traffic amounts to anything like what the hon. Secretary of State has told us, it will be in less than two years they would be able to recoup every dollar of the cost of the railway and the great mining area of that country will be preserved to the people of Canada going in there. The illustration has been given about this Swiss who went out there with nothing and left the country with $50,000. That is a very great advertisement for Canada. If a poor, emaciated creature, hardly able to draw his carcass along, could obtain that much, what could an Englishman, a Scotchman or an Irishman do going in there well equipped to dig up this gold? I am satisfied that this House, (although we have been charged with having taken a most decided stand against the government for party purposes and from political prejudices for which statement I say they have no justification) are prepared to assist the government in every possible way we can in getting legitimate access into that country if they came down with a reasonable scheme, but not to gamble away the gold mines of that country. Any other system that presents itself to our good sense will receive a favourable consideration and the support of this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Was the objection from your standpoint to the grant of land or to the route?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—When I was speaking on the second reading of the bill I said I objected to it on almost every point. I objected to it because the Stikine River is not a navigable river, such as is required for the traffic of that country, and I objected to it because it commenced in the middle of the country instead of commencing at the coast. I objected to giving away 5,000,000 acres of the richest gold fields in that country—because it would come to that and not 3,750,000 acres as was stated—as a gamble. I further objected to it because it was giving to these contractors the privilege of mining in that country—for a royalty of one per cent, while the government are charging the poor miner 10 per cent, and if there is any one thing that would goad the people of that country to rebel against the government and give them trouble in preserving peace and harmony in that country, it is just that discrimination which you would have given to these rich men and it would have taken more than the mounted police to preserve order in that country.

Hon. Hr. O'DONOHOE—I desire to say, in justification of my course on this question, that I think the government has made a mistake from beginning to end, and that they are endeavouring to justify their errors by forcing upon the Senate of Canada that which the Senate never can support. We have known the Senate in the past to object to a measure strongly recommended by one of the famous statesmen that we have had. The Senate stood firm on that occasion; there was no flinching at all. I refer to the defeat of the Salisbury Short Line Bill.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—There was no similarity at all between that case and the defeat of the Stikine-Teslin Railway Bill.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—If the hon. gentleman wishes to make that point he can do so afterwards. There is no man in the government to-day more thoroughly Liberal than I am, and none more in favour of the Liberal party. I have spent the best years of my life in support of that party, but I will not be in this House and give a vote that is contrary to the dignity and honesty of the Senate. The Secretary of State said everything he could to diminish the value of those lands in the Yukon territory and stated that we were giving away something that amounted to nothing. Where is his evidence? What evidence is produced in this House to maintain any of his positions? None at all. He tells us this, that and the other story about the subject, but furnishes no evidence. If any knowledge has been brought before this assembly it has been furnished by the paid servants of the government, whom we should credit even when their statements are opposed to the statements we hear from the ministers Every one in this House knows about as much on the subject as the ministers know. The only authorities we have that we can credit are Mr. Ogilvie and Mr. Jennings, and their evidence the ministers repudiates. These employes of the government say that the Yukon country is rich in gold and its indications; the government repudiates that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, the government never did anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—The hon. gentleman himself stated that there was nothing in the land we were giving away.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said if only five per cent of the country was good it was enormously rich. I said if only a half of one per cent was good it was enormously rich. What I said was that gold could only be found in certain localities which I described.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—The government are forcing upon this House statements in support of which they have no evidence. For myself I am a government supporter.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—Yes, a warm supporter of the government, but I am here to give my opinion and vote upon the merits of every measure which comes before this honourable body. I am not going to give up to party. My hon. friend the Secretary of State knows as much about the value of that country as any other member of the Senate, and no more. He is going it blind; he is working in the dark, in contravention of the first principles of the party of which he is a member. The doctrine of the Liberal party has always been that the public lands and public assets of this country should only be disposed of by public tender. I am perfectly satisfied that the Senate of Canada will be true to the interests of the people and refuse to give away the public lands without affording every one an opportunity to tender for them. There is the greatest breach of the principles of the Reform party in disposing of the public lands without calling for tenders. My hon. friend, the Secretary of State, has not given more service to the party and its principles than I have done, but I am here not to recognize party or party principles, but only to do what is right. We are a judicial body and we should govern our conduct according to the rules which are so well understood by the hon. leader of the government in this House. I, for one, however much it may be against the party, tell them they must drop this contract and advertise it in a proper manner. Let them take time; there is nothing to be lost by it, but there is everything to be lost by giving a contract in the dark as we are asked to do now. I shall vote against every feature of the measure until the contract is duly advertised and the public have been afforded an opportunity of competing. Much has been said of giving Canada the benefit of it; why Canada is getting no benefit out of this matter at all. The United States will have all the benefit. They are the parties who will have the controlling power. They are on the ocean and all the purchases that will be made for the mining settlements will come from there and not from us. The whole thing is wrong. If we are true to ourselves and true to the interests of Canada we shall ignore every step that is taken in urging this measure. It is wrong from beginning to end, and probably in the near future we shall learn who are concerned and who are at the bottom of this deal—it is a deal, it is a steal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. The hon. gentleman perhaps has been absent during the last few days; if he had been here he would have been aware that this bill, against the second reading of which he is speaking, received its six months hoist last Thursday by a large majority.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I was here and I voted with the majority.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then I do not understand why the hon. gentleman is giving us a speech which would have been proper then, but which is inappropriate now. The subject before the House is the committee proposed by the hon. gentleman from London. I have no very special objection for the appointment of a committee for the purpose of getting information. I do not think there is any particular necessity for it. It is not necessary that one should call attention again to what has been said and made perfectly clear by two or three other gentlemen who preceded me, to the effect that there is no possible way of opening up communication during the present season between the railway system of Canada and the navigable waters of the Yukon. The only way in which it could be possible at all would be by going from the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, on the Pacific coast, to Lynn Inlet. It is barely possible that some road might be constructed from the head of Lynn Inlet during the present season though that would not be, I imagine, the kind of road that the hon. gentleman who is moving for the committee wishes. He has indicated that the road he wishes is from Edmonton. It is perfectly clear the hon. gentleman's committee cannot do what he purposes they shall do. It is utterly impossible to open up communication during the present season between Edmonton and the Yukon country. In fact, it would take the whole of the present season for any party that the government would send out to travel the distance from Edmonton to Yukon. I do not propose to say anything more about the committee. I think the hon. gentleman had better amend his resolution by leaving out words "during the present season," because they are absurd in the resolution. I wish also to call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he has omitted from the committee the name of an hon. gentleman who, I think, knows more about that region than any other member of this House. I have no doubt there are hon. members who would be quite willing to make way for the hon. gentleman from Cariboo (Mr. Reid). He knows more about that country than any other member in the House. It is all very fine for hon. gentlemen like the hon. member from Shell River to talk as though they had a monopoly of the information about the North-west and the means of getting to the Yukon: I do not profess to know much about it myself, but I think the committee might direct their attention to other means of getting in there. Probably a road through the Yellow Head Pass and running north between the Rocky Mountains and the coast range might be, on the whole, a better way of getting into that country than up the Peace River. I say the hon. gentleman from Cariboo knows more about that whole country and its agricultural and mining interests than any other member of the House, and I regret that I do not see his name on the list of the proposed committee.

Hon. Sir JOHN CARLING—I have no objection whatever to add the name of the hon. gentleman from Cariboo to the committee, as suggested by the hon. gentleman, and also I have no objection to striking out the words "during the present season." I was very much surprised at the speech of the hon. leader of the House stating that the Senate wished to take the government of the country out of the hands of the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir JOHN CARLING—What does this resolution say? It says:

> That a special committee be appointed to inquire into the feasibility and probable cost of opening up direct communication during the present season, between the railway system of Canada and the navigable waters of the Yukon, and also as to the advantages which would flow therefrom to the trade of Canada.

Has the hon. gentleman any objection to having an inquiry made into the best and most feasible route that can be recommended to the government? We have no desire to take the business of the country out of the hands of the government; but this House has the right to inquire which is the best route, and which would be to the greatest advantage of the trade of Canada. That is the object of this committee. The Senate is not dictating to the other House, but is simply asking that a committee be appointed to make inquiry as to the feasibility and probable cost of opening up direct communication with the Yukon gold fields. The hon. Secretary of State ridiculed the idea of asking that an expenditure of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 should be made to build a railway from Edmonton to the Yukon. I am not asking anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I was answering the hon. member for Shell River. He suggested that we should build it.

Hon. Sir JOHN CARLING—What I have stated here to-day is that a wagon road is already being constructed, and will be finished this season, from Edmonton to the Peace River, and that there would only be 250 miles more of road to be built during the season to make the route complete to the Pelly River. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that it is not possible between now and the first of October to construct a pack road so that horses could travel and cattle be driven in? I think hon. gentlemen will agree that it is quite possible to build 250 miles of pack trail, and to have it ready for traffic this season. There is the route from Ashcroft, British Columbia, and the Prince Albert route. All these routes may be considered and inquired into by the committee, and their report be made to the Senate, and the government and the country will have the advantage of all the information gathered by the committee for them. I have no objection to the words "for this season" being left out, although I am quite satisfied that a pack road could be completed in time to be of service this season. I have the authority of the member for Alberta, a strong supporter of the government in the other House, that there is no difficulty whatever in making a pack road 250 miles during the present season, so that it could be utilized by the people that are going in. I am told that at Edmonton there were over 200 people starting on foot and with horses to go to the Yukon district. The Pelly River is navigable and it is only 1,000 miles from Edmonton, not as the crow flies, but by the different routes that have been travelled by experienced men in that district, and 250 miles of the pack road has been built. It only requires 250 miles more to complete the pack road and then we have the navigable streams. I hope there will be no objection to the adoption of the motion which I ask to have amended by striking out the words "this season" and adding Mr. Reid's name to the committee.

The motion as amended was agreed to.

MOUNTED POLICE PENSION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of Bill (13) "An Act to amend the Mounted Police Pension Act."

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I believe the remarks that I am about to make should have been made on the second reading, but I will state them now. I do not believe the pension given to the members of the mounted police is nearly enough. They must be 20 years in the service to earn the pension. That means 20 years away from civilized life and their friends. They cannot get married and cannot have the comforts of a home. And what dangers are they exposed to? I remember a Nova Scotia man telling me that he went once to arrest a murderer among the Indians. The criminal was among his own people. It was for the murder of a brother Indian, but the Indians do not think that a very great crime. Their sympathies were entirely with the murderer. Apart from the danger to his life, what are the services which a mounted policeman performs? He has to do the work of a servant and feed and groom his own horse. After serving 20 years, he receives this paltry pittance. Why not grant him some land as well? Why not give every mounted policeman an acre of gold land in the Yukon? Certainly he deserves it much better than the contractors selected by the government. I believe I am too late to move any amendment, but I hope the government will bring in a bill to increase the pension. The House will agree with me that the amount is not sufficient.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I fully appreciate all that the hon. gentleman has expressed in reference to the hardships these men have to endure, although they are less now than in former years. But the hon. gentleman no doubt supported the proposition that a mounted policeman should have to serve 25 years before getting a pension. What we are doing now is to reduce the term. The Act as it stands was passed a short time ago and received the hon. gentleman's approval. We are reducing the term of service to 20 years.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—What is the pension?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—One-fiftieth of the amount. I think it originally was one dollar and then reduced to 75 cents. I know it is very low, 50 or 60 cents, but they have extras, rations and one thing and another. I shall be happy to bring the matter under the attention of the hon. minister who has charge of it.

The motion was agreed to.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of Bill (75) "An Act further to amend the Inland Revenue Act."

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Before the bill becomes law, I wish to make a few remarks with regard to it. I was not in my place when the bill received the second reading. I am very much surprised at the conduct of the government, and I may tell the House that the time has now arrived in the history of this parliament when it takes a great deal to astonish me in regard to the conduct of the government in fulfilling their pledges to the people of Canada. This bill is introduced for the purpose of reducing the quantity of liquor that may be sold by the distillers to any party. Under the Inland Revenue Act, which this bill proposes to amend, hon. gentlemen will see that the regulations of the late government were that no spirit should be moved at any one time from any distillery in casks or packages containing less than 25 gallons each. This bill proposes to reduce the quantity to ten gallons. I am astonished at this government, because I did expect that some of the many pledges they made to the country, and the reforms they promised to inaugurate when they got in power, would be carried out. But they have not carried out any of their pledges, and of all their sins of omission this is the most grevious one. The hon. minister laughs. It is no laughing matter. There will be tears shed by the wives and mothers of the men going to the Yukon where liquor will be sold, as I will show you later on. Under the old regulations 25 gallons was the least quantity of liquor that could be sold by the distiller to a private person. This regulation reduces the quantity to ten gallons. What will be the result? Instead of discouraging the drinking of intoxicating liquors this will have the effect of encouraging it. Every one knows that it would be quite impossible for a great many men to get 25 gallons, whereas many of them could get a ten gallon keg and put it away in the cellar. I say that this Act will tend more to encourage drunkenness and rioting than any other Act I know of. It is contrary to every principle of prohibition, and yet these gentlemen, when in opposition, made the country believe they were in favour of prohibition. I wish to read what the Reform party laid down as their platform when they inaugurated their prohibition policy. Sir John Thompson was an honest man and told the temperance people what he would do. The Reform party seized the opportunity and framed this ingeniously worded document.

Whereas public attention is at present much directed to the admittedly great evil of intemperance, it is desirable that the mind of the people should be clearly ascertained on this question of prohibition by a Dominion plebiscite.

They undertake to tell the people of this country that this is a great evil. They tell them in that very paragraph that they put in their platform that it is a great evil which they will check by every means in their power. I had the honour of accompanying a delegation of clergymen and most respectable men in Canada and a large number of ladies, in the short session of 1896, and my hon. friend from Sarnia was there as chairman of that delegation asking the government, of which Sir Wilfrid Laurier was leader, to carry out their pledge on the plebiscite question. The hon. gentleman there and then told them that in twenty municipalities of the province of Quebec they had prohibition. He told them he was strongly in favour of it, but not in favour of introducing legislation that session, because that session had not been called for the purpose of legislating, but that the following session he would introduce a bill providing for a plebiscite on the prohibition question. The country is justified in excusing the premier for not introducing the measure that session, but he should introduce it this session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—And the hon. gentleman said if the people of Canada voted for prohibition at the next session, he would introduce a bill to enact a prohibitory law. The hon. Minister of Agriculture was with him, and he congratulated them on having a government that was in favour of prohibition, and promised that they soon would have such an Act upon the statute-book. What is the result? With all these declarations, notwithstanding all the liquor they have sent into the Yukon country, they are here by this very Act endeavouring to make it easier for people to obtain whisky if they desire it. They have reduced the number of gallons, which a distiller may sell in one package, from twenty-five to ten; so that, if a man is disposed to drink whisky, he can put it in his cellar and drink it at will. If there is anything more calculated to encourage drinking in this country, I am not aware of it. The hon. gentleman should withdraw the bill and let the law stand as it is. If he does not, it will show that he is catering to the liquor people and promoting intemperance. I wish to make a few remarks with reference to the liquor going into the Klondike. I may tell the hon. gentleman that in this very city of Ottawa at present, a petition is being signed asking the government to stay their hand and send no liquor in there. One man has obtained a permit to take 1,437 gallons into that district; another to take 600; another, 200; another, 1,000, in all, over 11,000 gallons. I venture to say that every one of these men smuggled in as much more, which would make it 22,000 gallons, and when adulterated with water, there would be 44,000 gallons of liquor to be sold or given away in the Yukon district.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You do not object to the water.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Yes, I do. They will adulterate the water of that river by putting the whisky into it and spoiling it. I desire to say, further, and I challenge contradiction, that during all the time that Mr. Dewdney was Governor of the North-west Territories he never issued one sale permit during the years from 1883 to 1888. The only permits given were one or two gallon permits, to take in liquor required for medicinal purposes, and he was soundly abused by one class of people because he would not admit more liquor, and by the other side because he admitted any at all. He used the permit system with care and caution. He refused a permit for liquor recommended by the Duke of Argyll and one or two other noblemen, and also refused a recommendation from Sir William Van Horne. I know that he refused the permits because he believed the men were even then drinking to too great an extent. The government are undertaking to let liquor be taken into that country. I am sorry to hear the hon. gentleman say that there are likely to be 45,000 people in that country this summer, many of them men of the lowest order, yet they are sending liquor into the Dawson region to debauch, corrupt and debase the people of that country when they know that the temperance sentiment of Canada is opposed to their doing so. I am astonished to think that men occupying the position they do, and who were returned to power on the pledge and on the supposition that they were going to adopt and enforce prohibitory legislation should adopt such a policy. They have poured whisky into that country and opened the flood gates of crime. They are sending policemen to guard and preserve order and at the same time promoting crime and debauchery. It will take ten times as many policemen to preserve order amongst a drunken, lawless element as would be required if you had no liquor. It is like setting your house on fire and then sending for a fireman. Hon. gentlemen made a great ado the other day about starvation at Dawson. If there is anything that will cause starvation in that far off country it is the liquor traffic. Men will waste their time in drinking and give their provisions and their money for that which will not sustain life; the result will be that that class of men will starve to death, because where provisions cost so much, charity will not be so very largely extended to that class of people. The government talk about the danger of starvation. I can well understand how that starvation will take place, when they have sent 40,000 gallons of liquor into the Klondike country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Where did the hon. gentleman get that statement?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I have your own figures here. The returns you gave the other day were not correct. It is enough to make one blush with shame to know that the government of this Christian country has given permits for the sale of liquor in that country. Did any one ever hear tell of the late government giving a sale permit? I say it was impossible for eight years, to my own personal knowledge, for any one to get a glass of liquor in the whole of the Canadian North-west Territories, and this government, which made such great pretensions to righteousness, has undertaken to issue permits which will result in the debauching of the people in that country. The government stand condemned to-day before the people of Canada, before the women of Canada—the better half of humanity—who are praying every night and every morning for the welfare and preservation of their sons and husbands who have gone to that far country. This government came into office shouting all the day long, holy! holy! holy! and now they are issuing permits to take liquor into that country to debase and demoralize the people in the vilest manner possible. Whisky has gone in there and is going to be sold, and policemen have been sent up to preserve order. What will they do? They will go from place to place and see that one man does not shoot the other. I read a letter from a policeman the other day, written to his father here, in which he says: "We stand by; money is stolen in many places and gambling goes on, but it keeps us busy to see that one man does not actually kill the other." Gambling has hitherto been condemned by the laws of Canada, but I see that this government actually used the word gambling as applied to their own transactions;

it is one of the words used in their contracts. I say, hon. gentlemen, that the time has come when the government should be called upon to keep the promises they made to the people of Canada. We can all remember how they shouted loud and long their promises of purity and holiness in administering the government of the country if they were put in power. I challenge and defy them to say that they have carried out one single promise they made to the electors of Canada. They occupy a false position. The people of my own town are talking about whisky going to the Klondike, and some are astonished to find that they are supporting a government whose policy is to sanction such a traffic to make a few dollars for the treasury. Only the other day I received a letter from a person in California asking if I was in favour of granting permits to sell liquor in the Yukon territory. I said, no, I will approve of no man taking liquor into the Klondike. But here is the Minister of the Interior, a temperance man, who shouts loud and often at temperance meetings in his own country, authorizing the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories to issue permits for whisky to be taken into the Klondike, and then we find the government placing in the estimates a large amount for the purpose of preserving order. Did any mortal man ever hear of such inconsistency? In their own interest the government should withdraw this bill. The fact that they are making this amendment in the law shows that they are not desirous of carrying out the wishes of the people of Canada. It shows, now that they have the power of making laws in their own hands, they are encouraging the use of intoxicating liquors and making it easier for people to get liquor. I should like to see this bill defeated, and the liquor traffic kept within its present bounds. I hope when the government get the petition of the temperance people all over Canada, asking them to hold their hands and send no more whisky to the Yukon, that they will grant their prayer. But it is too late to wholly stop the traffic; the government have opened wide the flood gates and poured whisky into that country already. If they were to take more provisions and less liquor to the Yukon, it would be very much better for humanity's sake. If they would do this, there would not be so many starving people, and money would not be wasted in the purchase of liquor and maintaining gambling dens. I hope, hon. gentlemen, that the government will not press this bill for a third reading, but that they will withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not propose to follow the hon gentleman in all his diatribes against the government; they are evidently based upon political prejudice. Any one who listened to his observations and knows the fact can come to no other conclusion. The members of this government, before the change of government, gave no pledge that they were going to introduce more stringent liquor laws that were in existence; they promised that a plebiscite should be taken, and it has been announced that that would be done within a very short time. When the late government were issuing permits into that country, the hon. gentleman's voice was entirely silent. It was all well enough then.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—They were issued for only two gallons.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will read what the late government did. On the 26th June, 1895, the Alaska Commercial Company got a permit for 1,000 gallons. On July 3rd they got another permit for 1,000 gallons. On the 10th July, 1896, the North American Transportation Company got a permit for 1,000 gallons, and on the same day, 10th July, the Alaska Trading Company got a permit for 3,940 gallons. That was before the change of government.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I think it was wrong.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman found no fault with them. On the same day there was a permit granted for 2,500 gallons of ale and claret.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I do not think that return is correct, because there were no people in the country then.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman does not believe that this is correct, but if he chooses to consult the public accounts he will find the items there. He will find there were permits for nearly six thousand gallons issued a few days before the change of government; and at that time it must be remembered that the population of that country was very much less that it is to-day, not one-fourth. Then the hon. gentleman has the returns from that date down to 1897. He will find that there has been about the same quantity issued since the change of government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Were not those permits issued by the government of the North-West Territories? I understand the authority was vested in the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories to issue permits for certain purposes. That was never authorized by a federal law or by instructions from the department at Ottawa. I was not in the government at that time, but that is my impression as to the law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understood that it was through the Department of the Interior.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But that is only your impression?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; I was told so by Mr. Sifton, and I have no doubt that is true. In the return I get there was one quantity for which $1,250 was paid on the 26th June, 1897. The Lieutenant Governor was asked for the quantity, but no answer was received. This would indicate that they were not all formally from the Lieutenant-Governor, but had really originated here. However, I will look at the correspondence. I am advised there has been no departure from the order that prevailed under the government. The Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories, or his Council, really exercised no prerogative rights in the Yukon district—that is clear, although it nominally came under their control.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not nominally.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It did not, as a matter of fact. They were not going to any expense in connection with that country, and it was at the instance of the Department of the Interior that permits were granted. That is what I am advised by the Department of the Interior. I suppose I could look up the correspondence. I asked for information from the Minister of the Interior. Now, hon. gentlemen will see that since June, 1897, this government issued permits for very little liquor to be taken into that country. On August 7th William Chambers got a permit for 1,000 gallons; August 20th Sullivan, McLeod and McPhee got permits for 500 gallons, August 30th one Menzies for 500 gallons; February 24th another man got a permit for 8 gallons, and on March 21st Dr. J. E. Rimer got an order for 50 gallons. These two latter were marked "for personal use." Now, in reference to the matter that is immediately under the consideration of the House, the hon. gentleman attacks this bill as a menace to the temperance sentiment of the country. I deny that absolutely and emphatically. In the first place, it is no part of the policy of the government; it is purely a departmental matter. I never heard of the bill, nor did any of my colleagues, until it came into the Senate here. The hon. gentleman knows very well that the deputy heads come in direct contact with the trade and are well aware of the changes that ought to be made to meet the convenience of the public. My hon. friend allowed his imagination to carry him away as to the evils which would ensue in the direction of intemperance if this bill should be passed. I deny that this bill is in that direction. I have just as good a right to draw the conclusion that it is more dangerous for a man to take twenty-five gallons than ten gallons. The liquor goes to the wholesale men from the distilleries and bonded warehouses. I do not know enough about the trade to give an absolute opinion; but that is the impression I had formed. It is not a question of the retail trade. Of course through the retail trade the evils of intemperance by selling smaller quantities are increased. The hon. gentleman may relieve his mind of any idea that it was one of the purposes of the bill to make it impossible that liquor could be obtained on easier terms. That was not the intention at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has not read the permits that were given in 1897; he has confined himself to 1896.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I commenced at 26th June, 1895, and the quantity issued by the late government in that period—less than 13 months—was 9,000 gallons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If you had gone a little further and read 1897 you would have found that on 5th May, permits were issued for 4,157 and 2,000 gallons to one company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the Alaska Commercial Company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—However, coming back to the bill itself, which is the principal point, would the hon. gentleman tell us the cause for the change from twenty-five to ten gallons?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The reason given by the department was that the object is to meet the requirements of the trade, there being no objection thereto from a revenue standpoint.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to compliment the government on their departure from former practices of governing the country. The hon. Secretary of State has just told us that neither himself nor his colleague knew anything about this bill till it came to the House. That is one of the benefits arising from individual government of departments. Here is a bill involving not only details of administration, but a principle and a policy, and the Minister of Inland Revenue frames a bill changing the whole policy of the government in reference to the taking of liquor out of bond and also changing a number of other clauses of which the hon. gentleman and his colleague know nothing at all. I never would have thought of accusing the government of permitting this course.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The bill rested with the Minister of Inland Revenue, and I think the head of the department might at least have authority enough, if he thought it wise, to meet the demands of the trade by reducing the quantity in the packages from twenty-five to ten gallons.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

SECOND READING.

Bill (32) "An Act respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company"—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

HEYWARD DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN moved the adoption of the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Heyward Relief Bill. He said: The evidence before the committee has proved and fully established the allegations and facts set forth in the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned.

DOMINION BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATION BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (41) "An Act respecting the Dominion Building and Loan Association" without amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are two professional gentlemen here from Toronto looking after this bill, and as the House is about to adjourn for some time, I think a good deal is to be said in favour of suspending the 70th rule and reading this bill the third time presently. I therefore move that the 70th rule be suspended.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This bill has a title which has been objected to by two institutions already in existence, the Dominion Saving and Investment Society and the Canada Permanent Loan Society. Now the use of the word "permanent" is objected to by the one, and the use of the word "Dominion" by the other, as being likely to lead to confusion. I understand these companies have already received communication showing that confusion may take place. It seems to me that the parties who are seeking this legislation ought not to be so obstinate with regard to the title of the company that they wish to adopt. I do not think it is fair that a new institution should undertake to adopt a name resembling that of an existing institution, and my opinion is that the matter has not been adequately represented to the committee. I was written to by the Dominion Savings and Investment Society of London, calling attention to the fact that the use of the word "Dominion" in this bill makes the name so like theirs that confusion is likely to result; and the use of the other word "permanent," that is already in the name of the Canada Permanent Loan Society, is likely also to lead to some confusion. Now, I admit that a prescriptive right to the use of a word cannot be acquired, yet it is a well recognized rule in the incorporation of institutions of this sort, that when a name is likely to conflict with that of an existing institution, it is due to the public and to the existing institution that the name should be different so that confusion may be avoided. This matter has not been, perhaps, adequately considered and fully represented to the committee.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—While I agree very much with the views of the hon. Minister of Justice with regard to the propriety of allowing the name, yet I am bound to say that the matter was very fully discussed before the committee. Counsel were heard on both sides and the committee, without any dissenting voice, passed the bill without amendment. Therefore, I have nothing else to do but to report it. But I think there is a still more serious question involved—the question of jurisdiction—that is, whether this parliament has any right whatever to deal with an Ontario charter as it is dealt with there. I suggested that the consideration of the bill should be postponed until the matter could be more fully discussed but the committee passed the bill without amendment, and I can only so report it.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I perfectly agree with what has fallen from the hon. Minister of Justice. There is a society in Nova Scotia known as the Nova Scotia Permanent Building Society, which my hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. McKay) will give information about. It has been in existence forty or fifty years, and a short time ago got permission to do business in other parts of Canada. It is scarcely fair to charter another company with a similar name, and therefore I agree with the Minister of Justice that the third reading should be deferred. Otherwise I shall oppose the suspension of the rule.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think that there is a great deal of force in the objection made by my hon. colleague.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear. I did not think you would.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It shows that I must be right when the hon. gentleman and I so agree. The name of the institution in which my hon. friend is interested is the Nova Scotia Permanent Building and Loan Society and Savings Fund, and hon. gentlemen will see that there is not much danger of its being confounded with the Dominion Permanent Loan Company. The resemblance must be greater before the older company has a right to complain. The hon. Minister of Justice seems to think that because the word "permanent" appears in the name of this company, and that it is also in the names of other companies, that is a sufficient reason why this company should not be allowed to use the word "permanent" in its name. It does not seem to me that "permanent" is a word that any company should have a right to copyright. It is a word in common use and indicates a quality which is common to a great many companies. There are scores of permanent loan companies in the country, and I fail to see that there is any reason why this company should not be permitted to call itself a permanent loan company as well as the companies which are now in existence. Then as to the word "Dominion"; we have scores of companies in Canada into the names of which the word "Dominion" enters, and I do not think that is a sufficient objection to keep the bill from passing. As the chairman has said, the question of the name was fully considered in committee, and the committee were nearly unanimous in the decision they arrived at to report the bill without any amendment. Then if I may be allowed to say a word on the question of jurisdiction, to which the hon. chairman of the committee referred, I may say that this bill now before us is not a measure which transfers this company from the jurisdiction of the legislature of Ontario to the jurisdiction of this parliament. This is a bill to amend, as I understand it, an Act which was passed last year, and the change of jurisdiction, whether rightly or wrongly, has already taken place and the object of this bill is simply to give a company a name which is more suitable to its character than the name which it bore before.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I am almost equally interested in both these companies. I certainly stand somewhat indifferent between them. While the word "permanent" might not be objectionable, I think the compound word "Dominion permanent" and "Canada permanent" might be liable to lead to confusion. Dominion means Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The name is different. However, I move that this bill be read the third time at the next sitting of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

UNION BANK OF CANADA BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (24) "An Act to amend the charter of the Union Bank of Canada," with an amendment.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—In the absence of the hon. gentleman who has this bill in charge, I beg to move that the amendment be now concured in.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I should like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that there is a bank in Halifax which has existed for some forty odd years and which is called the Union Bank of Halifax. It is a very great pity that any new bank should be started with the same name as this. The notes of these banks will circulate all through the Dominion and there should not be two banks of the same name. The objection is self-evident.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It will make no difference where the notes are circulated. The government sees that there is proper security for the issue of notes.

The motion was agreed to.

TOBIQUE MANUFACTURING COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Baird, moved the second reading of Bill (K): "An Act to incorporate the Tobique Manufacturing Company."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Has the bill been printed?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I am informed it has been printed, but it has not been distributed, and the movers of it wish to have it passed so as not to lose time. I do not think there is any objection to the bill and it may as well be read now and considered in committee afterwards.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I should like to see the bill. I judge from the title that it is a local bill, and should, therefore, be under the jurisdiction of some province rather than under the jurisdiction of this parliament.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Then I have no objection to let it stand.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—However, as it will go to committee it may be read the second time.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

CERTIFICATES TO MASTERS AND MATES OF SHIPS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (37) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting Certificates to Masters and Mates of Ships."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the adoption of the second clause. He said: I read a statement to the House when this bill was under discussion that the provision of this clause is for the purpose of extending the law as to persons who may obtain certificates. It provides that an applicant sufficiently qualified by his knowledge and experience may receive a certificate to take charge of a steamboat of not more than ten tons.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Is it intended to apply to tug boats?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—To boats of not more than ten tons. I do not know of any tugs of that size.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to call the attention of the government to a matter in connection with this bill. The object of this chapter of the Revised Statutes respecting certificates to masters and mates of ships is, of course, to provide that where the voyage a large ship is to take is of a serious character and would naturally require a skilled master to undertake it, the master shall have a certificate and, in most cases, the mate shall have a certificate too. If any hon. gentleman will look at the first section of chap. 73 of the Revised Statutes, which the bill before us proposes to amend, he will see that in paragraph "E" of that the expression "sea-going ships" is said to include "every ship employed in trading or going between some port or place in Canada and some port or place out of Canada not being a port or place in Newfoundland or in the United States of America"; and under "G" "coasting voyage" includes a voyage between Canada and Newfoundland or the United States of America; so that a vessel might go from any place in Canada to a port or any place in Newfoundland or to the United States of America under the original provisions of the Act chap. 73 Revised Statutes. Then if a vessel was to go to England, for instance, or to South America, the voyage would be looked upon as being of a more important character and requiring greater qualifications on the part of the master, and he had to have a certificate. In 1889 this parliament passed an amendment to this Act and made the following change in substitution for paragraph "E," which I have just read:

The expression "sea-going ship" includes every ship employed in trading or going between some port or place in Canada, and some port or place out of Canada not being a port or place in Newfoundland, or in St. Pierre, or Miquelon, or in the United States of America, or in Bermuda, or in any part of the West Indian Islands, or on the east coast of South or Central America; and the expression "coasting voyage," is extended to meet the change.

Hon. gentlemen will see that by an Act passed in 1880, the voyage to St. Pierre and Miquelon, the voyage to Bermuda or any of the West India Islands, or any port on the east coast of Central or South America, were all made coasting voyages. I cannot understand why a voyage to the east coast of South America should be made a coasting voyage more than a voyage to Europe. The truth is that the voyage from our Atlantic coast to England is a voyage that does not require as much skill as one to Central America or the east coast of South America. Then, in 1894, a further amendment was made. If hon. gentlemen will look at chapter 42 of the statutes of 1894, they will find the following:—

The expression "sea-going ships" includes every ship employed in trading or going between the same port or place in Canada, and the same port or place out of Canada not being a port or place in Newfoundland, or St. Pierre, Miquelon, or in the United States of America, or in the West Indies or South America, or in Central America or Mexico.

The expression "coasting voyage" includes a voyage between Canada and Newfoundland, or St. Pierre or Miquelon, or a port or place in the United States of America, or in the West Indies or South America, or in Central America or Mexico.

And the expression South America means any port or place on the mainland or adjacent islands between the south-eastern extremity of French Guiana and the Isthmus of Panama in the Pacific Ocean following the coast line by way of Cape Horn.

So it is a coasting voyage from Montreal to a port in Mexico on the Pacific coast, while it is not a coasting voyage from Montreal or Quebec across to Ireland. It seems to me that, to be logical, we should say that a coasting voyage shall be a coasting voyage, or that these certificates shall not be required at all, nothing beyond a coaster's certificate. And if it be necessary that a ship going to England shall have a certified master, surely it is just as necessary to a ship going round Cape Horn to Lower California or some port in Mexico or Central America shall have a certified master. I felt it was my duty to call the attention of the government to the very illogical and unsatisfactory condition in which the law now stands.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I think that must be owing to the fact that "coasting voyage" is a very uncertain term. For instance, supposing an English vessel were to go to New York and sail from there round Cape Horn to San Francisco, the United States authorities might say that is a coasting voyage and you cannot carry a cargo. In England if you sail from Kinsale to John O'Groat's House you can carry freight, but the United States government, with the very great love they have for us, will tell you that an English vessel could not go from New York to San Francisco, although it is a voyage of 6,000 miles, because it is a "coasting voyage."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I might say to the hon. gentleman, I remember very well the discussion which took place in the House of Commons when those amendments to this statute were under consideration. I think Sir Hibbert Tupper was the Minister of Marine and Fisheries at the time, and those amendments were proposed by him. I dare say the facts are well remembered by the leader of the opposition. I cannot say what induced him to propose the amendments, but I suppose the men of the maritime provinces, engaged in sailing, were found to have the necessary practical skill to enable them to take charge of vessels sailing to the coast of South America and the West India Islands and Central America, although they could not have passed the required examinations under the law as it then stood and obtain the necessary certificate. I cannot say how that may be, but I assume that is the case. What view my colleague, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, may take of the question raised by the hon. member for Halifax I cannot say, but that matter is not touched by anything that is in this bill. We simply extend to parties without an examination the privilege of obtaining temporary certificates for sailing very small steamers, those under ten tons and capable of carrying not more than ten passengers, whose voyage must be on inland waters; and this amendment is made because it has been found necessary to give them protection against the penalties that might otherwise be imposed on them for not holding certificates.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—There must be some examination, I should think, before granting a certificate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The examination is not a literary one, but in order to see if they have the necessary experience. I remember a case on the River Thames where a party was subjected to a very heavy fine, although he had as much experience in the navigation of the river as any one who could pass a high literary examination. It is to meet cases of that sort that this amendment to the bill is proposed.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Could the hon. leader of the House say just what the minor inland bodies of water of Canada embrace? Would it apply to such places as the Bay of Fundy?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that the bill applies to vessels of not more than ten tons, and of course in the very nature of things those vessels are confined to inland waters. No one would care to trust his life in the open sea or in the Bay of Fundy in a little steamer of not more than ten tons burden.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I think there are small boats and tugs on the Straits of Northumberland, and I know that this very question came up a few years ago, and there was a good deal of difficulty about it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They would be inland waters, but it is a narrow question.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That is just the question I was raising, whether the harbours in places like Halifax would be considered inland waters.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I take it they would.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I was not sure about that. I thought possibly the expression might only include lakes and rivers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The provision is a good one and I can give an illustration similar to the one mentioned by the Minister of Justice. When I was a member of the government it came up before us. There was a small tug on what is known as the Mississippi, a stream that you could almost jump across, connecting with the waters of the Madawaska, which empties into the Ottawa. That vessel did nothing but carry grain from the new settlements on the free grants down to the mill at a place called Denison's Bridge. They could not afford to employ a certificated engineer, such as is necessary under the law, but I know we found some difficulty at that time, and were unable, on account of the strong and strenuous opposition to any change, to amend the law. This amendment will meet that case exactly where the boat is on an inland water and no danger can arise.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I should like to call the minister's attention again to the point I have just raised. I know there are some small tugs, which go from one place to another along the northern coast of New Brunswick. They are careful to go in fine weather, and and some of them are used for towing small deal rafts, and that sort of thing. I supposed this was intended to apply to those cases, and it will unless the wording "minor inland waters" shuts them out. I think it is desirable they should be included.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The words of the bill are "plying within specified limits in the minor inland waters of Canada." The certificate must be for a voyage within a specified limit, and there will be no difficulty.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I approve of the bill, but I simply wanted to be sure that it would apply in the case I have mentioned.

INSPECTION OF STEAMBOATS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (39) "An Act respecting the Inspection of Steamboats and the examination and licensing of Engineers employed on them."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This bill is a codification of the various Acts respecting the inspection of steamboats and the examination and licensing of engineers. The last general Act, as found in the revised statutes of Canada, was codified in 1886. Since that time, in every year but one, amendments have been made to the Act until it became rather confusing as to what the law really was governing the inspection of steamboats, and the various Acts have, therefore, been codified. There is no change until we reach "l" in the interpretation clause

(l.) The expression "passenger steamboat" means any steamboat carrying any person other than the master and crew, the owner, his family and the servants connected with his household; except steam yachts used exclusively for pleasure or private use without hire of any kind.

The expression "tug boat" means a steamboat used exclusively for towing purposes. It will be observed that the interpretation clause has been enlarged to include tug boats.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How will the enlargement of paragraph "l" affect the bill passed during this session lowering the standard of engineers where they navigate with small steamers carrying passengers on the back lakes and rivers? I remember calling the attention of the hon. gentleman to one of the streams running from the Mississippi down to the Madawaska. This will not interfere with that I suppose?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 20.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is very slight change in that.

20. Whenever the engine of any steamboat is stopped for [over five minutes,] the engineer or the master or person in charge of such steamboat shall open the safety valve, so as to keep the steam in the boiler below the pressure limited by the inspector's certificate,—and every person who violates any provision of this section shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars.

The existing Act says "ten pounds below," it now reads "below the pressure limited by the inspector's certificate," and the penalty is changed from $100 to $200.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does clause 20 give the inspector the option to define what the pressure shall be? Does he give the certificate in proportion to the size and strength and horse power of the engine?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That does not bear on that point.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. You see under the old law it declared only ten pounds and now it leaves it optional with this inspector to declare what the pressure shall be. That leaves it exclusively in the discretion of the inspector, does it not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The inspector gives a certificate for a certain pressure of steam, and then if the engineer stops for five minutes, instead of, as formerly, keeping the pressure ten pounds below the high limit he simply keeps it below, it leaves it in the discretion of the engineer to say how many pounds below the limit it shall be when the boat is stopped, but it must be below the limit.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But by this law the limit is defined by the inspector and not provided for by law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is left discretionary. It must be below, of course.

The clause was adopted.

On subsection 2 of clause 35.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it intended that a person employed to keep watch or put in charge of the engine room in the absence of the engineer shall be an engineer.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let us assume for a moment that an incompetent man is put in charge; in law, he is considered an engineer and if considerable damage accrues from his being there, the owner of the boat is exempt from the consequences of putting an incompetent man in charge.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—That is covered by clause 35 which provides that "no person shall employ another as engineer, and no person shall serve as engineer unless the person employed or serving as engineer holds a certificate of competency."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He is a locum tenens, but he must have all the qualifications.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like my hon. friend to point out the clause which requires him to have qualifications. He is simply a watchman.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He must have the qualifications under section 35.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then why do you not state such person keeping watch or charge of the engine shall have the qualifications described in section 35? He is not put there as an engineer.

Hon Mr. SCOTT—No one could be put in charge unless he had the qualifications of an engineer.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The subsection could be qualified by saying that he shall hold a certificate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The meaning of the subsection is this: in a steamboat which is required to have only one engineer, if the engineer is obliged, for any reason, to leave the engine room temporarily, he can leave some one in charge; and it would be a great mistake to require that man to hold an engineer's certificate.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—This measure is not to apply to boats under a certain size. It seems to me that any one who is entrusted with the charge of an engine in a boat of the character described in this clause, should have the qualifications of an engineer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It clearly says this, that you can put any person in charge of the engine room of any steamboat, and then it goes on to say that while serving and employed as an engineer, while keeping such watch or while in charge he shall have all the powers of an engineer who has a certificate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That clause had better stand until to-morrow. I will get some further explanation about it.

Subsection 2 was allowed to stand.

On clause 48, defining the owners' and masters' liability for non-observance of the Act.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—This seems to be a peremptory clause. Some provision should exist for notifying the owner of the vessel.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the law as it stands to-day? What is the punishment for infraction of the law?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is a new clause giving greater powers for the enforcement of the law.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—It provides that "if the penalty is not paid forthwith" the steamer shall be liable to be seized and sold by any chief officer of customs or any other person thereto directed.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There must be a conviction first.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The clause ought to provide that the vessel should be sold only after due advertisement.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—That is exactly my meaning.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Some notice of the sale should be given, because otherwise the customs officer who seized the vessel might sell it without giving due notice, and it might be bought in for a trifle.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Any officer who would do that would be dismissed by the department forthwith.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That would not be any consolation to the owner.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—These powers are never exercised in that way.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Secretary of State is in error in saying that these powers are never exercised. The greatest difficulty in disposing of vessels forfeited for infractions of the customs laws has been to find a purchaser. The Customs Department has found it difficult to get one-twentieth part of the value of a vessel when sold in the locality where it is owned, and hence the necessity of either removing the vessel from the locality where it is owned to some other part of the Dominion or, by giving due notice all over the country, directing the attention of those engaged in the trade to the sale. My experience has been the same as that of the hon. gentleman from Halifax; there has been great difficulty in finding purchasers for vessels to be sold under such circumstances, and they have often lain there until they rotted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why should not my hon. friend adopt the law of the particular province in which the seizure is made?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no; the laws for enforcing the penalties by the department must be uniform and independent.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—Under this clause, the owner of a boat might charter the boat to a man, and that man, having no fear, disobeys the law, and a conviction is secured against him, and the property is sold without any notice to the owner.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is a highly improbable case. The Crown never takes such active steps against parties. Business of that kind goes on for months and years, as we all know, and the party is guilty of an infraction of the law, but the Crown is always supposed to exercise its powers with some degree of discretion and prudence.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 52.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the old section, except the word "minister" is substituted for "Governor in Council." It is to avoid the necessity of going to council for an Order in Council for an investigation. It is a departmental matter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under section 52, has the person charged a right to also take part in that investigation, and to call witnesses in his defence?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think so. The Crown makes a full and fair investigation of all the facts.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It does not seem to contemplate it in that section.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You cannot make an investigation and hear only one side.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He seems to be invested with the power of summoning the witnesses, and he may summon whatever witnesses he chooses.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a part of the old law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—With that very important exception. You place the whole power in the hands of the minister administering the department, instead of compelling him to report to council and getting authority for making the investigation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is purely a departmental matter, and should not be in the hands of the council.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would not admit that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The council will be governed entirely by the minister in a matter of that sort.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 57.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Clause 57 says, "The Acts mentioned in the firstschedule to this Act are hereby repealed."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why not say that those Acts should not apply, instead of repealing the former Acts? You undertake to repeal the Merchants Shipping Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, the vessels are under our control.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suppose the intention is that those Acts should not apply to Canada, so far as they are inconsistent with this Act?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, that is it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But you have used the expression "repeal." You cannot repeal that Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You can repeal it, so far as Canada is concerned. It operates now, and ceases to operate when this Act comes into force. That is a repeal.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does it apply to Canada by reason of Canadian legislation, or is it one of those Imperial acts which apply to the whole of the colonies?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is an Imperial act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then you cannot use the word "repeal" with regard to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, under the powers given to us we can repeal it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It surely does not say the Canadian parliament has the power to repeal any portion of that Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes. When we pass laws inconsistent with it, we are supplanting it.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 35.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think we might adopt subsection two of clause 35 which was objected to. The practice, it seems, prevails to some extent of employing a person in the way suggested by subsection two, and this is intended to make that regulation in the first part of the section, relating to the qualification of engineers, apply to those persons who are temporarily employed to discharge the duties of an engineer. So that any person keeping watch or in charge of the engine room of any steamboat, mentioned in this section, while in motion shall be deemed to be serving and employed as an engineer while keeping such watch or while so in charge. The clause declaring that such person shall be deemed to be an engineer, serving as an engineer, comes within the earlier portion of the section and he must have a certificate in order that he may discharge these duties.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—That is the view I took of it and I approve of the section. I went a little further than the section and suggested that in order to make it absolutely clear we should insert the words "and hold a certificate as such."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I feel that I was mistaken.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I differ with the hon. Minister of Justice, because section 35 contemplates the employment of a person in the capacity of an engineer, and it says when you employ a person in the capacity of an engineer that he shall possess certain qualifications. Subsection two contemplates something entirely different. It contemplates the engineer being absent for the time being. Then it says :

Any person keeping watch or in charge the engine room of any steamboat mentioned in this section shall be deemed to be serving and employed as engineer while keeping such watch, or while so in charge.

Why should he be deemed to be serving as engineer if he is a properly certificated engineer ? I do not object to the section itself, but I do object that such a person should be deemed to be an engineer, while under the section he may not be an engineer, and that the owner should enjoy immunity from damages by reason of his placing such a person in charge of that vessel.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is just what the section does not do. He being deemed to be an engineer has imposed upon him the necessity of having an engineer's qualifications :—

No person shall employ another as engineer, and no person shall serve as engineer on any passenger steamboat, of whatever tonnage, or on any freight steamboat of over one hundred and fifty tons gross, unless the person employed or serving as engineer holds a certificate.

Subsection two declares that the person discharging certain duties in the engine room shall be deemed to be an engineer. If he is deemed to be an engineer, then he must have a certificate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If he is a properly qualified engineer, why should he be "deemed" to be an engineer ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The reason is that many steamboats take one engineer and put parties temporarily in charge, in the way spoken of, and these parties were not engineers and were not to be deemed engineers. This brings the party so employed within the definition of an engineer and says he must have the qualifications.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that is the meaning why not make it read "any person being duly qualified as an engineer and keeping watch in the engine room" and so on ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The object is to prevent parties being put in charge unless duly qualified.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—No engine should ever be put in charge of a person who is not duly qualified.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And that is the intention of the clause.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the bill and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

PACIFIC AND YUKON RAILWAY NAVIGATION AND MINING COMPANY'S BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved,—

That the bill intituled: "An Act to incorporate the Pacific and Yukon Railway, Navigation and Mining Company," be restored to the Orders of the Day for a second reading, "together with the motion in amendment of the Honourable Mr. Mills that the said bill be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months," and that it be made the first order of the day.

He said: The motion before the House to-day, as hon. gentlemen are doubtless aware, is for the restoration upon the order paper of the second reading of a bill to incorporate the Pacific and Yukon Railway Navigation and Mining Company. This matter has been fully discussed in its various phases—and more particularly when I moved the second reading of the bill a few days previous to the adjournment—that it would be entirely unnecessary for me to enter upon a discussion of the bill at this stage. I, however, should like to say that the feeling of the House, when the adjournment of this debate was carried was in favour of the bill having a second reading, and I am satisfied that if, upon that occasion, the feeling of the House had been tested there would have been an expression in accordance with the statement I have just made. It is a most unusual thing that a private bill of this character should be discussed as to its principle on the second reading, particularly when the bill itself is so free from anything of an obnoxious character as this bill is. We invariably have sent such bills to the Railway Committee, where due explanation can be made by the promoters, and where if it is considered desirable the bill can be thrown out. I presume if this motion is carried it will place the bill upon the order paper for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not going to oppose the putting of this motion upon the paper, but I am still opposed to the hon. gentleman's bill. I believe that if the bill becomes law, it will seriously stand in the way of the possibility of building a railway upon Canadian soil, and while promoting United States trade, if constructed, it will prove a serious impediment to the extension of our trade into a part of Canadian territory. For that reason, and also for the political considerations which I mentioned when the hon. gentleman moved the second reading of this bill, I am still opposed to the object which this measure is intended to accomplish.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not my intention to discuss the merits of this bill or to reply to the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Justice, but I desire to call the attention of the House to the rule pertaining to the adjournment of a debate. When I moved that the debate upon this question be adjourned without fixing a day for continuing the debate, I supposed that it would have remained upon the notice paper, as is the practice in the House of Commons, but after the motion was carried and the House adjourned, I was informed by the clerk that, no day having been set for the consideration of the question, it necessarily fell to the ground. Such was not my intention when I made the motion, nor did I suppose for a moment that the non-fixing of a day for the resuming of the debate was tantamount to removing it from the order paper, or, in other words, killing the bill. It would be well if we had some positive rule in reference to a question of this kind, or, if not a rule, that it should be understood by every senator that when he moves the adjournment of a debate, he must of necessity mention a date when it shall be resumed, otherwise, it would enable any member to kill a bill, as is done by moving that a committee rise without reporting. I do not know any ruling on the subject which would justify the interpretation which has been put upon our rules. The explanation made by those who have kept the records in the past has been that it has been the practice. Whatever may have been the practice, it should be distinctly understood that no member of the House in the future, no matter what his parliamentary experience may be, shall be placed in such a position.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The hon. Minister of Justice has just given as a reason for opposing this bill that the passage of it would hamper the action of the government. That is a very serious statement, and one which this House should take into consideration. The government should state to parliament what they contemplate doing, so as to put this House in a position to appreciate whether they should vote for this bill or not.

The motion was agreed to.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF CHARLES RUSSELL, SOLICITOR.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired,—

1. Is Mr. Charles Russell, of London, England, solicitor, in the employment of the government, or has he been so at any time since the 1st July, 1896?
2. What is the nature of such employment, and what are the services rendered by Mr. Russell?
3. What is the salary or what are the emoluments attached to such employment?
4. Has the government, at any time from the 1st July, 1896, to this date, paid any sum of money to the said Charles Russell?
5. What amounts were so paid, what were the dates of such payments, what was the nature of the services so paid for?
6. Did the government make these payments on its own motion, or were regular claims addressed to it?
7. Are there any claims remaining payable or any amounts still due?
8. If so, for what amount and for what service?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The replies are as follows:—

1 and 2. Yes; the firm of Day, Russell & Co., of which Mr. Charles Russell is a member, is employed as solicitors for the government in the United Kingdom.

3. No salary, but ordinary solicitor's fees.

4. Yes, advance of £100 on account of Queen's Counsel Case.

5. January, 1897; July 23rd, 1897, advance of £400 upon general account.

January 3rd, 1898, £35 19s. on account of Canada Sugar Refining Company v. The Queen.

January 13th, 1898, £238 8s. 2d. Queen's Counsel Case.

6. Except in the case of advances payments have been made upon accounts rendered.

7. Yes.

8. There are outstanding accounts rendered to the government for £1,713 6s. 8d. on account of the Fisheries Case and the Tariffs question.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do those fees include counsel fees?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Those are the solicitor's fees.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not including counsel fees?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot say as to that.

INSPECTION OF STEAMBOATS AND LICENSING OF ENGINEERS' BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (39) "An Act respecting the Inspection of Steamboats and the examination and licensing of Engineers employed on them."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 48.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When this bill was before the committee yesterday clauses 48 and 56 were reserved. In the opinion of many hon. gentlemen it was thought that the powers conferred by clause 48 were too large and too wide to be given to an officer of the customs, or any other person designated by the minister, to sell any vessel seized for violation of the provisions of the Act. I have, in accordance with the criticisms pronounced by many hon. gentlemen, endeavoured to meet the objections which were urged by the introduction of words at the 39th line of the 48th section. The clause reads: "Such steamboat shall, if the penalty is not paid forthwith, be liable to be seized and sold." I have added the words: "After such reasonable notice as the minister may, in each case, prescribe," leaving it with the minister to say what notice shall be given. It would be very difficult to define a time, because I am advised the expense from day to day would be so serious that practically the value of the vessel might be eaten up, and the only safe course would be to leave it in the discretion of the minister to name such reasonable time as he thought was sufficient, in the interest of the parties, to enable them to come forward and pay the fine.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—How would the notice be given? In the Gazette or in some of the local papers?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would be given in a way that would reach the public.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I think that is a necessary provision. Without it a steamboat might be sold without the parties knowing it at all. Often parties lease a steamer, or it is mortgaged, and without this provision the mortgagee would lose whatever claim he might have against that boat. It could be sold without his knowledge or consent. Therefore, it is necessary that some provision should be made, as suggested by the hon. Secretary of State, and I think some time should be fixed. Parties might be out of the country, or some considerable distance from the seizure. Many vessels are chartered in that way, and mortgaged to parties, and the boats might be sold without the mortgagees knowing anything about it.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Rideau, that a certain time should be given, say a fortnight or thirty days, and it should be advertised in the local papers, or the official Gazette. I believe the local papers in the districts where that boat has been navigating would be the proper places to advertise.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where she has been seized.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No injury will arise under the proposed amendment. Of course it would be the object of the minister of the department to see that all parties interested have fair notice. There could be no disposition on the part of the department to force a sale, or to sacrifice property of that kind, and the vessel in the meantime would be tied up, and considerable expense would be going on from day to day. Of course the crew would be retained.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You must, in that case, leave a pretty wide discretion with the minister. You may add, if you like, "reasonable notice to be published in the local papers."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me if you insert such words as "reasonable notice to the parties interested," it would meet the views already expressed. As was pointed out by the hon. gentleman from Rideau, a conviction may be secured, for instance, against the charterer of a steamboat, who may have no property in the boat, and it can be sold without the knowledge of the owner or lessee. Consequently there is no one so deeply interested in the boat as the owner, and yet there is no provision by which the owner may become seized with knowledge. I would suggest that the hon. minister make that clause read: "reasonable notice to all parties interested."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That might create a serious difficulty. What I have added is "after reasonable notice in a local newspaper."

Hon. Mr. POWER—The difficulty is that the owner of the ship may be in another portion of the Dominion and may not see the local newspaper.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or he may be in Europe.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I concur in what the hon. Secretary of State says with respect to the minister, that is while the present government is in power, but we may have in the future some minister in whom we have not the same confidence. There is this further difficulty with respect to the minister fixing the time in each case; it will take some time for the minister to fix the date, and how is the notice that he has fixed a certain time to reach the parties interested? I think, with the hon. member from Rideau, that the better way would be to fix some short time in the bill, stating the very least notice that is to be given. The hon. Secretary of State seems to think that there is very strong objection to any appreciable delay. I turn to section 234 of the Customs Act and find that when vessels, vehicles, goods and other things have been seized and forfeited under the Act, they may be sold within one month from the seizure. In the Customs Act they did not consider one month too long. I do not propose to move an amendment, but I would suggest that the following words be inserted in the 39th line, "after not less than one week's public notice."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I have not made a very thorough study of the clause, but it seems to me that the people we want to protect are those who have vested rights.

Would it not be possible to give a notice to the parties interested, whose names appear as mortgagees or owners wherever the boat is registered ?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I concur in the view expressed by the last speaker. Any one who is interested in a steamer or vessel would appear as such on the register, and the best way to meet the objection which has been raised would be to provide that notice be served on all who appear on the register of the vessels as interested.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I mean a notice of the sale in order that the parties interested may be there to look after their own interests.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You cannot define it, there are so many difficulties in the way. It is not likely that the power would be exercised except in a very extreme case, and it would be the desire of the department that every one interested should have notice. You may tie it up with such strict rules and regulations that no sale would be legal.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I showed this bill to some of my friends, who are quite familiar with these matters, and they tell me that it is a difficult measure to understand. I would suggest, therefore, that it be allowed to stand for four or five days in order that some of the clauses may be made more intelligible.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Many of the vessels whose captains violate the law are owned in Europe.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They would be registered here.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know that, but should not notice be given to the owners where they live. Otherwise the vessel might be sold without their knowing that there was an infraction of the law.

Hon. Mr. DANURAND—Would it not be well to provide that reasonable notice be given to owners and mortgagees ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I think we had better leave it as it is.

The amendment was agreed to and the clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 57.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This clause was allowed to stand yesterday. Since then I have looked up the Merchants' Shipping Act and I find that we possess the power to repeal so much of the provisions of that Act as relates to ships registered in Canada.

The clause was adopted.

Hon Mr. FORGET—One of the provisions of this bill on which I should like to have an explanation is sub-clause three of clause three which reads as follows :

> The Governor in Council may direct that this Act or certain provisions thereof shall apply to, or shall not apply to, any steamboat or class of steamboats registered elsewhere than in Canada.

As hon. gentlemen know, there is a company called the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, which has been in existence over fifty years, and which controls practically the trade between Toronto and Chicoutimi. A year ago a company in Kingston, having some boats, established an opposition line from Kingston to Montreal, and all their boats are registered in the United States. I should like to know if the Governor in Council could exercise the option to exempt that company from the operation of this Act, while they have not the option of doing anything for us.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is quite impossible for me to foreshadow what the Governor in Council would do. All I can say is that that has been the law for a great number of years. This bill is not new in any sense. The last codification took place in 1886, and since that time every year, except the year 1895, changes have been made in the Act until it became very confused. This is simply a codification, re-enacting as nearly as possible the sections as they stood. The Governor in Council in the last four years has taken no action in the case which the hon. gentleman has mentioned, and it is quite unlikely that any action will be taken now. They will follow some well defined rule in the department. I do not know why such wide powers were given to the Governor in Council, but we did not wish to change them in codifying the law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It strikes me that this clause is intended to exempt foreign vessels coming into port and sailing through our waters. Would it not apply to foreign vessels coming from a foreign port to a Canadian port and then having to pass through foreign water to another port? It strikes me that that may be the intention of the clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, and an Order in Council has been passed in that particular case applying the Act.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 35.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, further considered the effect of clause 35, that is, the subsection which we discussed yesterday, when my hon. friend the Minister of Justice declared that the person keeping watch, or in charge of the engine room of any steamboat mentioned in this section, while in motion, shall be deemed to be serving and employed as an engineer while keeping such watch or while so in charge. The minister's contention was that the person so employed must have a certificate of competency under the 35th clause. Does the hon. Minister of Justice still adhere to that view?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I have been reading the French version of the bill and it is as plain as can be. It means that if, after the vessel has left the wharf, the engineer for some reason or other deserts the engine-room, then the man who takes charge of the engine room, even if he is not qualified as an engineer, is to be considered under this Act as an engineer?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I will leave it to my French colleagues if that is not correct.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is confusing two things which are quite distinct. I will read the whole clause over and I think hon. gentlemen will see that the construction I put upon it is the right one:

35. No person shall employ another as engineer, and no person shall serve as engineer on any passenger steamboat, of whatever tonnage, or on any freight steamboat of over one hundred and fifty tons gross, unless the person employed or serving as engineer holds a certificate of competency granted under this Act or under the Acts of the United Kingdom for the grade in which he is to be employed, or for a higher grade; and every person who offends against this section shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars: Provided, however, that if a steamboat leaves a port with a complement of engineers, and on her voyage is deprived of their services, or the services of any of them, without the consent, fault or collusion of the master, owner or any one interested in the steamboat, the deficiency may be temporarily supplied until engineers holding such certificates can be obtained.

That is a provision for a necessity that may arise and which was necessary and reasonable to provide for. Then comes subsection 2, which was the subject of controversy yesterday:

2. Any person keeping watch or in charge of the engine-room of any steamboat mentioned in this section, while in motion, shall be deemed to be serving and employed as engineer while keeping such watch, or while so in charge.

That section refers mainly to the primary part, not to the proviso of the subsection which precedes. The proviso deals with cases that arise after the vessel has left its port of starting and loses the engineers that were in charge, without the consent, fault or collusion of the master. Subsection 2 is intended to prevent any violation of section 1, and it says that a person keeping watch, or in charge of an engine-room of a steamboat mentioned in this section while in motion, shall be deemed to be an engineer. If he is deemed to be an engineer, he must have the certificate of an engineer, or he is liable to the fine provided for if he is not, or undertakes to act as such without having such certificate, but there is no doubt that, under the proviso, a person in the engine-room upon a boat, where the engineers had left her, might so act without a certificate under the proviso, just as anybody else might so act under that proviso as a matter of necessity, because there would be no engineer at all on board, and the proviso covers that case. The object of this section is to prevent the employment of such a party in the engine-room who is not an engineer with a certificate.

Hon. Mr. SANFORD—If the hon. minister would eliminate that subsection the clause would be very effective. I have studied the matter and asked the opinion of others. There is nothing in that clause that accomplishes anything. It simply leaves in doubt the true position of the man who is in charge of that engine. Your first clause clearly defines that that man must be an engineer with the proper qualifications. Your second clause intimates the possibility of his being something or somebody. If that clause were omitted there could be no question in regard to the working of the law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The very object of putting this clause in was to remove the doubt, for it was said a person who was temporarily in charge of the steamboat should not be considered an engineer so as to take him out of the provision of subsection one. It was to remedy that that this provision was inserted. It is said he is to be an engineer and then he must have the engineer's certificate.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—But if he is an engineer why should he be "deemed" to be an engineer?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the point.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The reason is clear. It was said before this section was framed that he need not be an engineer, and, by deeming him to be an engineer, you bring him within the qualifications and under the disabilities of engineers.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—He must be an engineer if he is in the engine-room when the boat is in motion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The object of the subsection is this: It has been found very often that an engineer wants to leave the engine-room for a few moments, and puts a man in charge who does not hold a certificate. There is no way of reaching that man. You may reach the engineer by dismissing him, but you cannot punish the man who takes the place of the engineer, because he says "I hold no certificate as an engineer." Any man who is put in charge temporarily will be regarded as an engineer, and subject to the penalty provided in that clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That implies that you must have two engineers on board every boat.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That may be.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The interpretation clause A defines what a steamboat is, and that includes "any boat that is propelled by steam." We know that there are a large number of small vessels, plenty of small vessels, running on the different bays in the Dominion that have but one engineer. It is clear that this amendment does not mean what the hon. gentleman has indicated. Supposing an engineer on board one of the small boats takes sick and is obliged to go into the cabin, and remain there, or supposing he dies on the route, and there is no certificated engineer on the boat, who is to take his place? This clause was intended to meet cases of absolute necessity, and by this clause, if they are serving while the boat is in motion, you make them engineers, because you declare they shall be deemed to be engineers without certificate. If he has a certificate of competency, as provided in clause 35, then there is no necessity for declaring he is an engineer. My hon. friend says they are in the habit of putting men in charge of the engine-room who have not certificates, and consequently they are not liable to the penalties. To my mind that clause is expressly to meet such cases of emergency, where the engineer for any cause has to leave the engine-room.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is provided for in the proviso.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, that any person put in charge of the engine-room while the vessel is in motion, in cases of emergency to which I have alluded, shall be deemed to be an engineer without a certificate of competency.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I do not think that second clause is anything more than a definition of what constitutes an engineer, and what is the work by which we recognize him. That clause number 2 describes what work the man must do to constitute him an engineer, in order that the law may reach him—that if he infringe he may be condemned. I looked to see if there was any definition in the Act, and I fail to see it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You will find it in clause 35, line 41—"An engineer is a person who holds a certificate of competency."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But that second clause describes the acts by which a man will be recognized as doing the work of an engineer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—And I think that that clause is simply there in order that those who do that work shall be constituted engineers, and if they do not comply with the conditions of the Act, then they are infringing.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No doubt that is the case.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I ask, if so many divergent views can be expressed upon this particular clause, why we should not adopt some language by which there could be an agreement as to the meaning of the clause? It seems to me, if my hon. friend attempted to pass through this House any puzzling language, he has successfully evolved that puzzle in the language of subsection two. If it has the meaning my hon. friend says it has, why not use the words "any engineer."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That would not meet the cause at all. With regard to the case of smaller vessels, we carried the provision through this House a few days ago. With regard to the kind of vessels described here you define the class of persons that will be put in charge. They are engineers, and they are to have certificates as such. Then you make a provision that in case of accident and so on, if an engineer should be disabled, or if an engineer should desert a vessel, that the persons who are, from necessity, in charge of the vessel may bring her into port and may act as engineers without incurring the penalties of the Act. Take the next step, which is mentioned in subsection two, "any person keeping watch, etc." Now persons were put in charge of vessels temporarily without having an engineer's certificate, and it was held that they need not have an engineer's certificate in order that they might discharge the duties here mentioned—not cases of accident or necessity such as are dealt with in the proviso, but ordinarily the proprietors of a vessel employ but one engineer, and you require, under the provisions of this Act, that such a vessel as is here spoken of shall have more than one engineer, and you require it for the reason that this subsection two removes a doubt of which persons took advantage, which served as a pretext for putting a person in charge who did not hold an engineer's certificate to do the engineer's work and I do not see that the language can be made plainer. What is the effect of it? That if he is so deemed by law and he has not an engineer's certificate, he incurs the penalties prescribed by the Act in this same section.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it contemplated there should be more than one engineer on every boat?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is clear from the provisions of the Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is, if you put anybody else in charge to discharge the duties of an engineer, he must be an engineer and be liable to the penalties.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The two conditions must follow the position taken by my hon. friend; in the first place there must be two engineers on board that boat and both certificated engineers.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then the view which we take of it must be correct, because if there is only one engineer, and he has absented himself, certainly the person called upon to take charge of the engine-room, is no engineer.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, and he has no right to act as such.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You say such person taking charge must be a certificated engineer?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, certainly.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then every boat must carry two certificated engineers. If that be the case, if these men have the qualifications of being certificated engineers, why should subsection two be inserted at all?

Hon. Mr. SANFORD—The clause would be proper if the hon. minister would allow one word to be inserted, and make the clause read thus:

> Any person keeping watch, or in charge of the engine-room of any steamboat mentioned in this section, while in motion, shall carry a certificate when serving and employed as engineer.

If you use the term "certificated man" there would be no question as to what his position is.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—I should like to put a question to this House. If it takes more than half a dozen lawyers to throw confusion into that clause, how many more would it take to make it clear?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have all been seeking to put definitions on it other than the definition that the person who drafted it designed. It was drafted to meet the case which I mentioned. The engineers in charge were apt to leave the engine-room and place a man in charge who held no certificate, and when you attempted to punish the man for taking charge of the engine he said: "you have no way of fining me; I am not a certificated engineer and am not liable to the penalty."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Did the hon. gentleman say it was drafted by an engineer?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, but the gentleman who drafted it had in view cases reported to the department where engineers were in the habit of leaving the engine-room for a few moments and putting a man in charge who was not an engineer, and when an attempt was made to fine him the answer was: "I am not an engineer; you cannot fine me." It was to meet that particular case that this clause was drafted, and to my mind you cannot make it any clearer than it is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there not a penalty imposed upon the owners of vessels who send their vessels to sea without an engineer?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes; but this was to punish a man taking charge of a vessel without a certificate.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—If an engineer is sick at sea he appoints another man to take his place?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—That man is liable to all the penalties of an engineer. He is placed there, and is incompetent, and it is not his fault, yet he is liable.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; that is a mistake. The proviso is to meet the case submitted to the House. The boat goes to sea and the engineer takes sick, and the captain puts a man in charge. There is no penalty for that, and we provide for it in this section. If a boat is deprived of the services of her engineers, the deficiency may be temporarily supplied until engineers holding certificates can be obtained. That meets the case.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Must the person keeping watch or in charge of the engine-room under subsection two have a certificate?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes; he is liable to a penalty if he has not.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Has he to pass an examination?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yesterday I took the same view as the hon. leader of the opposition did, but after the explanation later on by the hon. Minister of Justice, I could not help feeling that I had been mistaken. The object of the section is this: the man who kept watch over the engine-room, or was in charge of the engine-room during the engineer's absence was not doing an engineer's work, and he did not need to be qualified as an engineer. The object of the sub-clause is to provide that that work of keeping watch over the engine and engine-room during the absence of the regular engineer shall be held to be the work of an engineer, and that, therefore, it cannot be performed by any man who does not hold a certificate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And he is liable to a penalty.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It does not read that way to me, because it says here:

> Provided where a steamboat leaves a port with a complement of engineers and on her voyage is deprived of their services or the services of any of them, without the consent, fault or collusion of the master, owner or any one interested in the steamboat the deficiency may be temporarily supplied until engineers holding such certificates can be obtained.

My hon. friend tells me that any person keeping watch, or in charge of an engine room, as mentioned in this section, while the vessel is in motion, shall be deemed to be serving and employed as an engineer while keeping watch, or so in charge. My hon. friend told me that he had to be a certificated engineer and pass an examination.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Or be in the exception of the proviso.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that the proviso covers the case of an emergency. The previous portion of the Act defines who is to have charge. He must be a certificated engineer. He is liable to fine under this Act if he is not, but a provision is made to meet exigencies mentioned there in the proviso. But subsection two, which we have been discussing, forms no part of that proviso.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You said just now that he was to be a certificated engineer. I do not see how he can be if he is merely a handy man.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Why not have the proviso after section two? Perhaps it would be more explicit.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I want to know whether the watchman is to be a certificated engineer?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Then if so he is to be amenable to all the duties specified.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The object of the clause is to prevent the employment of one who is not an engineer.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Then the boat must keep an engineer and one who can act as one?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Then who is to take the place of the engineer?

Hon. Mr. MASSON—In a small affair like this, when gentlemen of the legal profession say that the clause is subject to different interpretations, have we not reason to ask the Minister of Justice to frame a clause that will be understood? If they cannot understand the clause how are the rest of us to understand it?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Under this clause the engineer can put the fireman in charge.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—If sub-section 2 was eliminated altogether from the bill, then it would be perfectly plain and clear. I am quite satisfied that that subsection clouds the whole matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Take the case of an engineer who places an uncertificated person in charge, while he goes away for a short time. You have no control over the uncertificated person because he is not an engineer. The object of this subsection is to put him in a position to be punished, because he has no right to undertake that work unless he is certificated.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE — The objection raised by the Secretary of State is because we cannot punish the man who takes charge of the boat under such circumstances. Look at the thirty-fifth section. It provides that no person shall employ another as engineer, and no person shall serve as engineer on any passenger steamboat unless the person employed or serving as engineer holds a certificate of competency. Then there is a penalty of $100 provided for violation of that provision. There is a remedy here if the person takes charge of the boat without having a certificate.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The object which the minister has in view is a good one, but I should like to understand, for I confess I do not understand yet, if it is the intention of the government by this subsection 2, in the case of a small freight boat for instance, which only carries one engineer, to make it imperative upon that engineer to be in the engine-room, absolutely in charge of the engine during any particular voyage; for instance, whether he could go out for ten or fifteen minutes to get his dinner? As I understand from the Minister of Justice, if the engineer is taken sick, or unable to discharge his duties, or is knocked overboard, or anything of that kind happens, a person may be temporarily placed in charge until a certificated engineer can be obtained; but the point which I am not clear about is, whether the government wish, by this section, to provide that in case the engineer is not taken sick, or is not knocked overboard, he is obliged to be absolutely in charge of the engine, every hour and minute of the day, from the commencement of the voyage to the end of it? These boats often make short voyages, lasting ten, twelve or eighteen hours, and only take one engineer. That engineer has to go out half an hour for his dinner and half an hour for his supper. Can he not leave another man, who does not hold a certificate, in charge? I suppose that is permitted?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Then if it is the intention of the government to make it imperative that that engineer shall remain in the engine-room during the whole of the voyage, the clause is clear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It only applies to vessels over 150 tons register.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I understand that. Take a boat of 250 tons register; she would not take two engineers for a short voyage and it is a physical impossibility for the engineer in charge to be in the engine-room every minute of the voyage.

Mr. Mr. MILLS—The object of the clause is perfectly clear. Section 35 down to subsection one has been law all along. The proviso has been a part of the law all along. It deals with cases of necessity which may arise and the person who is serving is excused under those circumstances. Where a boat is deprived of the services of a competent engineer then the services of another man is allowed. That has been the law all along. But it has been the practice, on some steamers, to put an incompetent person in charge of the engine. He might, if it is a passenger boat, put in jeopardy the lives of those on board, and accidents have happened through the incompetency of parties in charge of the engine-room, and it has been argued that they need not be engineers in such cases, being put only temporarily in charge. Subsection 2 is intended to meet such cases. An incompetent man has no right to be in charge of the engine where no necessity has arisen. Now, if he is deemed to be serving as an engineer and employed as an engineer, he must have an engineer's certificate, and he cannot excuse himself by saying "I was only temporarily in charge."

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—But if this second man has all the qualifications, he is just as well able to qualify as the engineer.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This section does not apply to such a one. It is not necessary to have two, but you cannot put a person in charge who is not competent.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This proviso makes provision for employing a person without an engineer's certificate, under certain circumstances. Subsection two declares that he shall be considered an engineer. The language used in the proviso implies very clearly that, under those circumstances, you can employ a man who has not a certificate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is conceded?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under certain circumstances you can appoint a man who has not a certificate to act, and those circumstances are when the vessel has been deprived, through the causes mentioned in the 35th clause, of the services of an engineer. Then the second paragraph declares that the person so acting—

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no; it does not apply to the same case at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I say that under certain circumstances you can appoint a man who has not a certificate to act. And then the second paragraph declares that the person so serving shall be deemed to be an engineer.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that it is perfectly consistent. Supposing a man is in charge of the engine-room temporarily, and there is an engineer on board who has put him in charge, if there is an engineer on board who ought to have been put temporarily in charge, but is ill and disabled from discharging his duties, then the party put in charge of the engine would be protected by the proviso. That is clear enough?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But supposing that the vessel started out with the necessary complement of engineers, and the party put in charge of the engine-room as watch has no certificate, and the emergency has not arisen for which the proviso makes the necessary provision, he is liable to be fined, and he ought to be fined.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So are the owners liable to fine.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Clause 26 provides:

Every steamboat registered in Canada, or to which this Act applies, shall carry at least one life buoy with a proper heaving line attached, in some convenient place where it can be easily got at for use in case of accident.

Why not have the boats which carry the same Canadian passengers on the St. Lawrence River have the same life saving appliances?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We can only legislate for this country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That law has stood for the last twelve years. It is section 33 of the old Act.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I was not here when that Act was passed, and if to-day we see a mistake in the law, we should amend it and put it right.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We cannot make provision for foreign vessels that temporarily come in here. We cannot regulate their discipline.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—They are not foreign vessels. They are vessels doing a Canadian trade, but registered in the United States. Why are they registered there? Because these boats were bought in the United States to do the Canadian trade, and to save the tax they keep them registered there, and they are used and make their money in Canada. By this clause you require us to comply with a certain rule and you do not require them to follow the same rule.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—There is nothing more necessary on board a steamer than a life preserver, but we have no control over foreign vessels. If they are registered in this country, the Act applies, and not otherwise. Certainly they are not allowed to do a coasting trade in this country unless they are registered in Canada. I should like to see it applied to every vessel, if possible.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I am glad the hon. gentleman has brought up this matter of the coasting trade. The coasting laws have not been observed in Canada. Take a Canadian vessel which starts from Kingston and goes over to Clayton and from Clayton to the Thousand Islands. That vessel has no right to take a passenger from the Thousand Islands. Take now a United States vessel which starts from Kingston and after touching at Clayton it has a right to bring that Kingston passenger to Montreal, because it has touched at a United States port. The Americans will not allow us to do the same thing, but I say if the hon. the Secretary of State will promise me that these boats, which are registered in the United States, will not be allowed to do a coasting trade in Canada, I shall be satisfied. They are taking our Canadian passengers from one Canadian port to another Canadian port, and they have not been stopped.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—They should not be allowed to do that.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—The statement of the hon. gentleman is something new to me. I am well aware that a British vessel going to the United States could not carry passengers or freight in the way the hon. gentleman has described, and I think we should treat our neighbours in the same way that they treat us. Our people are dealt very harshly with when they go to the United States, and I do not see why we should accord to foreigners rights which they do not accord to us. It is something new to me to find that foreign vessels are granted this right in the Dominion of Canada. I was not aware of it before. With regard to clause 26, which requires each vessel to carry a life buoy, I think it is a very good provision indeed. In our own province, and I think in other places also, vessels carrying passengers are bound to carry a life buoy for every passenger they carry or are entitled to carry, and they should be required, in all cases, to carry one life buoy for each passenger.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—My understanding of the law is that you are obliged to carry a life buoy. In place of carrying one, the vessel should be required to carry two or three put up in different parts of the vessel.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Why should we allow a United States vessel to carry a Canadian passenger from Kingston to Montreal without having a life buoy?

The CHAIRMAN—This discussion is out of order.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman had the unanimous consent of the House to take up this clause, and he can do so and speak as often as he pleases upon it.

The CHAIRMAN—True, but he dropped that clause and went to another altogether, which he had not asked the consent of the House to discuss.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I was not present yesterday, but I found on reading the bill this morning that there were a good many clauses which I should like to refer to. I wanted the indulgence of the House to go back to two or three clauses, and this is one of them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The discussion has broadened beyond the limits of the bill. The hon. gentleman is proposing that we shall introduce a matter of policy in this bill, the question of the coasting laws, which has no possible connection with the bill under discussion. While we are willing to give as wide latitude as possible in considering the bill, there must be some limit to it. The hon. gentleman was criticising the conduct of the government with respect to a question of policy which has not been changed—which has been continued on the same lines for the last fifteen or twenty years. It is not germane to the bill.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I suppose the hon. gentleman is aware of the fact that if a Canadian vessel goes to the United States side it is obliged to conform to their laws and regulations.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a question of policy which we cannot discuss on this bill.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—It is very hard on steamboat owners in Canada to impose regulations on them which are not imposed upon foreign vessels.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I did not understand the hon. gentleman to bring up a question of policy at all I understood him to argue that the coasting laws should be enforced.

Hon Mr. SCOTT—It has no connection with this bill.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not know that it has, but it is a little connected with it, because if these men come over and run from one Canadian port to another and carry Canadian passengers, they can be prosecuted for not having the proper equipments to save life. I think we should see the laws of this country enforced. As for myself, I should like to give the Americans the same as they give us. As for this question which my hon. friend brought up about life saving appliances, I should like to see the bill amended to compel every vessel to have three or four life preservers, because you might be at one end of the boat and the life preserver at the other, and before you could reach it the chance to save a life might be lost, whereas if you had life preservers at each end you might save life.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE, from the Committee, reported the bill with an amendment, which was concurred in Hon Mr. SCOTT moved that the bill be read the third time to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I made inquiry just now of one of the officials in connection with the Marine Department, and he assures me that the case mentioned by the hon. gentleman from Sorel is provided for by an Order in Council, that under the power given the Governor in Council they can pass an order applying this law, so far as the protection of passengers is concerned, to United States boats. That has already been done. So that in that case my hon. friend's objection is met.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I mentioned that there was an Order in Council passed in relation to certain regulations, I did not know whether it included this or not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not hear that statement.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY'S BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (29) "An Act respecting the Federal Life Assurance Company of Ontario and to change its name to the Federal Life Assurance Company of Canada," with amendments.

He said: I desire first, on my own behalf, to state that I considered that the same objection applied to this bill that was made to the bill respecting the Permanent Loan Company which was before this House last week, and which was also suggested by the hon. Minister of Justice, namely the question of jurisdiction, and whether this Dominion parliament had any right to deal with or alter the provisions of a bill passed by the Legislature of the province of Ontario. The committee, however, did not take that view of the case, and I think it my duty to report the bill with the amendments which have been read. I shall briefly explain what the amendments are. In the first clause the Federal Life Assurance Company is declared to be a body corporate and politic within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada. By the amendment we have substituted the word "constituted," and it reads "is hereby constituted a body corporate and politic within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada." The other alterations are in clause 11. The words "may loan" are inserted. Where they are given power to invest their funds they are also given power to loan certain funds. The other amendments are simply verbal alterations to make the whole clause congruous with that first amendment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved concurrence in the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

ALBERTA AND YUKON RAILWAY NAVIGATION AND MINING COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (H) "An Act incorporting the Alberta and Yukon Railway Navigation and Mining Company," with amendments, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—The rule is, where amendments are made to a bill, that one day should intervene before they are concurred in.

The consideration of the amendments was postponed until Monday next.

THE QUEBEC EXHIBITION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Landry) moved:—

HAMILTON AND LAKE ERIE POWER COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (100) "An Act respecting the Hamilton and Lake Erie Power Company." He said: This bill merely provides for an extension of time for building the road and for an increased amount of capital. The requirements have been found greater than expected, and they require additional power to increase the capital.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What was the capital before?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—One million dollars.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Why do you take the water from Lake Erie?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—We can discuss that in committee.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Whether the present government, or the Prime Minister, or any member of the present administration, has had, directly or indirectly, or is having, directly or indirectly, any negotiation, either with the government of Manitoba or with any member thereof, or with the Catholic religious authorities of Manitoba, on the subject of the question called the schools question?
2. If so, at whose instance or request were or are these negotiations?
3. What is their nature and extent?
4. Has any understanding or settlement been arrived at?
5. What is this understanding or settlement?
6. What guarantees have been given to the minority for the complete execution of, and for the stability of the proposed arrangement?
7. By the proposed arrangement has the minority been restored to its full constitutional rights?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say, in answer to my hon. friend, that the government have not had any negotiations with the government of Manitoba, or with the Catholic religious authorities in that province, on the subject called the school question, nor has it authorized any members of the government to hold any such negotiations.

TESLIN LAKE RAILWAY SUBSIDY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if a certain telegram which appears in this morning's Ottawa Citizen is correct? It seems that a meeting was held in Vancouver to urge upon the provincial government the propriety of granting a million dollars' cash subsidy to the Teslin Lake railway, and at that meeting, the paper alleges, a telegram was read from Sir Wilfrid Laurier, saying that the government does not intend to do anything further with the railway. I should like to ask my hon. friend if the government have so determined.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that the government have not so determined, nor have we any official information in regard to the telegram to which my hon. friend refers.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hear, hear.

GENERAL GASCOIGNE'S RESIGNATION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I noticed by the Journal to-day that General Gascoigne, commander-in-chief of the forces in Canada, has sent in his resignation, and the papers say it was promptly received, which would indicate there was some serious reason why the resignation was sent in. Could the hon. gentleman inform the House? It is of some importance to the volunteer forces of Canada to know, in the first place, if the resignation has taken place, and, secondly, the causes which led to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think there is any warrant for using the words "promptly accepted." General Gascoigne has sent in his resignation, and I am of opinion that it has been accepted, though I cannot speak, perhaps, with certainty on that matter. But there was no friction so far as I know, between the government or any member of the government and General Gascoigne, which led to his resignation. I understand that a good while ago General Gascoigne desired to retire, and that he so expressed himself over and over again, and ultimately he carried out the intention which he had formerly expressed. That is all I can say to my hon. friend on the subject. I am not aware that there was any personal or political reason for any friction between General Gascoigne and the Militia department which led to his resignation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend is not prepared, then, to give the reasons assigned by the General for his resignation?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not aware that he has assigned any.

FEDERAL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill (29) "An Act respecting the Federal Life Assurance Company of Ontario, and to change its name to the Federal Life Assurance Company of Canada," as amended.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the third reading of this bill; but there are some circumstances in connection with it which deserve the attention of the Department of Justice; and I refer to them just for the purpose of calling the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to the bill. The bill now before the House proposes to take a corporation, incorporated by the legislature of Ontario, and within the jurisdiction of that legislature, and transform it into a Dominion corporation. I do not wish to refer to what took place before the committee, but I know that the opinion of some, at any rate, of the legal gentlemen connected with this House is that the parliament of Canada has no power to do what is undertaken to be done by this bill. It should contain some provision that the legislature of Ontario should relinquish its jurisdiction over the company, because this parliament has not, and ought not to have, the power to extinguish a corporation which has been created by the legislature of Ontario, that legislature having jurisdiction under the constitution to create that corporation; and although this has been done in more than one instance in the past, that is no reason why we should continue to do it. Gradually the constitution is becoming better understood. As I have said, I rose merely for the purpose of directing the attention of the Minister of Justice to the bill in order that his department may consider the matter, and if they do not do anything at the present time with this bill, they may, at any rate, lay down some rule by which our action shall be governed in the future.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say to my hon. friend that I think there is a great deal of force in the observations which he has made, but this House and the House of Commons have acted for a very considerable period on a different view. I hope to be able in a few days to lay before the House a bill dealing with certain classes of corporations which will enable those that are incorporated by the legislature under certain conditions to become Dominion corporations, but I am inclined to agree with the observations of my hon. friend behind me that this parliament cannot, by its own act and without the consent of the local legislature, convert a local corporation into a Dominion corporation and obliterate it with respect to the liabilities and responsibilities which it may have assumed under a provincial arrangement. There is but one class of corporations which we have power to deal with in that way under the British North America Act. We have power to declare that certain local railway corporations and local corporations with respect to pub ic works that are created under local authority may be brought Cnder the jurisdiction of the parliament of uanada by a declaration of parliament that such works are for the general advantage of Canada, but that certainly does no apply to corporations universally.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not know whether my hon. friend from Halifax labours under the impression that the powers granted to this company by the province of Ontario have been extinguished by the bill. Do I understand him to so allege? Those powers are expressly reserved. Increased powers are given to the company, but they are in no way to interfere with powers already granted to the company in the province of Ontario, nor have the liabilities that have been incurred by the company, under the provincial charter been in any way wiped out. On the contrary, under the first section of the bill those liabilities are preserved in all their integrity.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to what has been said by the hon. gentleman from Calgary, he has perhaps stated the position a little too broadly. This life insurance company of Ontario is declared by this bill to be,

> A body corporate and politic within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada; and this act and The Insurance Act shall apply to the company and its business, instead of the said Acts of Ontario and the Acts of Ontario respecting insurance; provided that nothing in this section shall affect anything done, any right or privilege acquired, or any liability incurred under the abovementioned acts of Ontario up to and at the time of the passing of this Act, to all of which rights and privileges the company shall continue to be entitled, and to all of which liabilities the company shall continue to be subject,

From the time this bill is assented to and becomes law, the Ontario corporation ceases for all future purposes.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a third time and passed.

ALBERTA AND YUKON RAILWAY, NAVIGATION AND MINING COMPANIE'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Baker, moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to (Bill H) "An Act incorporating the Alberta and Yukon Railway, Navigation and Mining Company."

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the bill be read the third time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct the attention of the House to the character of this bill. It has been very considerably amended by the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, but it still proposes to confer powers on this company which are too numerous to mention. It is what is generally called an omnibus bill. The powers will be found set forth in the 5th clause of the bill, the 4th clause describing the line of railway. Paragraph "A" of the 5th clause gives them power to construct steam and other vessels, and to carry on the business of transportation; paragraph "B" gives them the power to acquire and work mines and to crush ore. Paragraph "C" authorizes them to construct, or aid in the construction and maintenance of roads, tramways docks, wharfs, aqueducts, ore-houses, smelters, saw-mills and such like and other buildings and works necessary or convenient for the purposes of the company. Then paragraph "D" authorizes them to erect and manage works and machinery and plant for the generation and transmission of electrical power and energy. Paragraph "E" gives them the power to acquire and utilize water powers and steam power for electrical purposes and to dispose of the surplus electricity. Paragraph "F" allows them to carry on, in the province of British Columbia and in the North-west Territories, the business of vessel owners, and gives them power to become carriers, forwarders and transportation agents and to carry on the business of wharfingers and shippers in connection with that. But this is the most objectionable clause: they are given power to establish shops, or stores on the said lands: and may purchase and vend general merchandise, clothing, provisions, stores, machinery and supplies, and may deal in mineral products, ores, mines and precious metals and generally do all such other things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects. That seems to me, hon. gentlemen, to be a power which should not be given to any railway company. If this railway company proceed to exercise this power and establish stores they can practically shut everybody else out from doing business along the line of railway, and I think that is objectionable. It gives them a monopoly of, for instance, the grocery business. My attention has been directed to that point by an hon. gentleman who is not now present. Then they are authorized in section "G" to acquire by lease, purchase or otherwise, letters patent, franchises or patent rights for the purposes of the undertaking and to dispose of such rights. The time has come when it is the duty of parliament to consider whether so many and such extensive powers should be given to companies which propose to build railways. It may be said that in that country it may not make very much difference that while it might be objectionable in Ontario it is not objectionable in Alberta. But, hon. gentlemen, we hope that population will flow into that region, and possibly within ten years from this it may be found that the powers we are conferring upon this company are, in their operation, exceedingly objectionable and will become onerous to the people of that region. It is time to consider the whole question of passing these omnibus bills with respect to that western country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I ask my hon. friend who has charge of this bill whether the bill has been reprinted as amended in committee?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The amendments appear in the Minutes of to-day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think my hon. friend will see that there is a very great deal of force in the objections that have been made by the hon. member behind me (Mr. Power). To allow a railway company to engage in all sorts of enterprises that are not immediately incident to the railroad is a very questionable course to adopt. You may allow a railway company that is incorporated as such to be also the proprietors of steamboats and to run a steamboat line in connection with the corporation. That may be necessary to secure traffic and travel, and it is a business of the same sort as that for which incorporation is sought, and so in extreme cases you allow a railway company to establish a hotel or an eating house at a station upon its line if you see proper, although that is seldom necessary, because the party holding or possessing railway property usually makes an arrangement with the railway company and is able to obtain a license from the local authorities for that purpose, so that power of that sort is seldom necessary to be bestowed upon a railway corporation, although it would be very much less objectionable than the power sought in this bill. Now, when you propose to enable them to purchase and vend general merchandise and clothing and provisions and stores and machine and supplies, you make the railway corporation a direct competitor with all those parties who are engaged in those different kinds of business, and who may find it absolutely necessary to use the railway for the purpose of getting in to their stores or shops the kind of goods in which they deal; and hon. gentlemen will see that there would a very strong motive on the part of the railway company to hinder, delay and defeat those parties who are engaged in business that are in active competition with the business in which the railway company may be engaged. It does seem to me that provisions of that sort in a railway bill are highly objectionable. They are altogether foreign to the primary object of the corporation, and they tend to create monopolies in those branches of industry and pursuits, the furtherance of which for the convenience of the community, the railway company is being specially incorporated. This to me is a highly objectionable feature of the bill, and I think my hon. friend will do well, if instead of asking that the bill be now read the third time, he would have the bill amended in this particular before it goes to the other House. I know what has been done when bills of this sort were attempted to be pushed through the House of Commons; provisions of this sort have invariably been struck out. It would be a great mistake, it seems to me, for this House, which is supposed to exercise some care and some supervision over legislation of this sort, to send down approved legislation of this kind to the House of Commons. The parties ought to know for what purpose they seek incorporation. and they ought not to undertake to put in a railway bill every conceivable kind of business for which powers of incorporation might be sought.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I regret very much that my hon. friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), when this bill was before the committee, did not express himself along the lines, which he has followed here.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then, if my hon. friend was sincere—and I should not care to allege that my hon. friend was insincere—he had a method by which he could have properly pursued the objection which he has offered to-day, namely, by moving an amendment to the bill. But it seems to me my hon. friend is hypercritical in this matter. The Railway Committee of this House for some time past have been passing bills of which this is, I may say, simply a copy. This is not a unique bill; there is nothing original introduced in it, but it is simply and practically a copy of bills that have been passed here over and over again. Now I might say, for the information of hon. gentlemen, that all the bills known as the Yukon bills embrace all these powers, and I might say further, in vindication of the insertion of these powers in this bill, that my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, gave to the promoters of the Teslin Lake bill practically the same powers as those included in this bill. If my hon. friend the leader of the House will look at the famous Teslin Lake bill, he will find that every conceivable power is given to the promoters of that bill for the carrying on of just such classes of business as are contained in this bill. They have the power to vend merchandise and enter into almost every conceivable form of business. Not that I think that objectionable, because I consider it is a very desirable power to give to a corporation that is about to open up a new country and play the part of a pioneer in a district which may be several hundred miles away from any emporium of merchandise. Except they have the power to carry on such classes of business, it is almost impossible to attract private capital to be enlisted in that form of investment. Hon. gentlemen who are acquainted with the opening up of railways in new sections know that they must have power to carry on every branch of business if they are to make their business a success. The railway is not simply a railway undertaking in a new country, but is a pioneer of almost every description of commercial investment, and except companies are invested with powers to open commercial establishments of that kind, the greatest possible inconvenience will be experienced. Now, in view of the fact that we have passed many of these railway charters, of which the powers here are but a repetition, I hope hon. gentlemen will not stand in the way of permitting this bill to have a third reading. As to my sending it back to the Railway Committee, except some hon. gentleman is going to move an amendment for that purpose, I shall not consent to it. I would refer hon. gentlemen to the fact that the session is passing away very rapidly, and reports indicate that the business of the other House will not occupy very many weeks, and therefore it is well that the promoters of this bill, who are responsible parties, who are, in fact, the leading merchants of Toronto, Winnipeg and elsewhere, should be given the opportunity of carrying out the project they have in view.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that this bill is not the same as the bill to which he refers. That bill provides for the lease, construction, maintenance and operation of wharfs, docks, landing places, dock yards, elevators, warehouses and other works, all of which are relevant and pertinent to the business they are carrying on.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend look at subsection "D" of section 13, in which they have power to purchase and vend merchandise, and will my hon. friend draw any distinction between that power and the power in this bill which is, perhaps, more specifically possessed, of carrying on various classes of business?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend anticipated what I was about to say. He will see that they also provide for the lease, purchase or the otherwise acquiring and operating of mines and minerals and mining rights, and so on. But that was because you have undertaken to compensate them, if that bill had succeeded, for the construction of the road by a grant of mineral lands which would be of no use at all without they were being operated, and the powers given to them under section 13 are for the very purpose of enabling them to carry into operation that side of the business of the corporation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the House will allow me to say one word in explanation of something said by the hon. gentleman. It is not according to rule to refer to what takes place in committee, but as the hon. gentleman said I should have objected in committee, I wish to say that I did object in committee to these general powers. Then the hon. gentleman seemed to think that I was treating his bill unfairly in attacking it in the House. I am not attacking it: I am not arguing against the bill at all; I simply called attention to what I considered the objectionable features in the bill, and I expressed the hope that in future more care will be taken and that some policy will be adopted to govern the action of the House in future.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—This bill also provides that the road shall start from the United States boundary, so we see the very thing which has been objected to in the case of other railways is proposed here. According to the 4th clause of the bill the line is extended from the United States boundary away up to the Yukon. Besides the objection to the powers given to this railway company, we should have more information respecting the route and the length to which this proposed railway may be extended. It seems an extensive line, and the powers given to the company are very large.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The point to which my hon. friend refers is on the international boundary line east of the Rocky Mountains, the intention being that this company shall operate the coal and mineral lands at the base of the Rocky Mountains and find a market to the south for the coal.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Will the hon. gentleman state how much of this road lies in the province of British Columbia? I observe that some of the clauses give great powers for carrying on business in British Columbia. From my reading of clause four, and from my recollection of the boundaries of the province, I cannot see that any great length of the road runs in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I cannot say whether the road runs in British Columbia or not.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

TOBIQUE MANUFACTURING COMPANY'S BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (K) "An Act to incorporate the Tobique Manufacturing Company," with amendments. He said: I may perhaps mention, in respect to this bill, that that vexed question of jurisdiction is involved in it, as it has been in some others that passed through this House, and I considered it my duty to bring the matter before the committee, because the question is now in appeal before the Privy Council as to where the jurisdiction lies with respect to our rivers and streams—whether it is vested in the Dominion government or in the provincial governments. However, the committee did not think fit to take that into consideration, and the bill has been passed with the following amendments, which I will explain very briefly. The amendments in subsection 6 of clause 2 of the bill are really to make that clause clearer, in which provision is made for the erection and construction of dams and the necessary openings and necessary slides for the transmission of square timber and saw-logs, and it is merely adding the words "sufficient openings and gates to allow the saw-logs and square timber to pass." And again the words "for the passage of saw-logs" are inserted in two other places. Then again in the third clause where it says "the company may also purchase, take over, or acquire all or any of the timber limits, gypsum property or mining leases on the said Tobique River, by whomsoever owned," there is added "including the incorporators or any of them." Then lower down, speaking of limits, the word "timber" is inserted. In the sixth clause where it provides for the total amount of debentures at any time outstanding the words "and the moneys borrowed under the next preceding section" are inserted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Is that Bill "K"? It does not accord with my copy of the bill.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Yes, it is Bill "K," the bill with respect to which the Secretary of State sent me the memorial from the Surveyor General of New Brunswick. In the last clause the words, "the head office of the company shall be in the parish of Gordon in the county of Victoria, province of New Brunswick, but every place in Canada at or in which the company has an office or place of business shall be deemed to be a domicile of the company," are struck out as being unnecessary. These really are all the amendments and none of them are of a very important character.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman read a statement from a gentleman in New Brunswick calling attention to various clauses of the bill and claiming that the bill was an infringement on provincial rights.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Yes, the paper was read before the committee and fully explained, and the objection taken as to the fact that this matter was now sub-judice of the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, a decision may be given any day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Had we not better have this bill reprinted.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—That is a matter for the promoter of the bill, and not for me, to say.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The amendments are not important except to make the meaning clearer.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—That is all; there is no substantial change.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suppose there would be no hurry about the third reading. It would suit the parties who are promoting this bill well enough if we get it through this session, and we may have, any day, a decision on the question of jurisdiction by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The bill originated here. It has yet to go through the other House, and I think no time should be lost.

Hon. Mr. WOOD moved that the bill be read the third time to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

INSPECTION OF STEAMBOATS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of Bill (39) "An Act respecting the Inspection of Steamboats and the examination and licensing of Engineers employed on them," as amended.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State if he thinks it is not time, before this bill is read the third time, to exempt steamboat owners from the payment of inspection fees. I think the provision in clause 37 relating to this is rather unjust. On some companies and some owners this tax comes very heavy, and why is it imposed? It is imposed because the government appoint inspectors to inspect boats for the safety and the benefit of the public, not for the benefit of the owners, and in that case I do not see why the owners should be obliged to pay the salaries and the expenses of these inspectors. Railways, for instance, are not subject to such a tax, and in the United States, in which they have a similar law to ours, steamboats do not pay such a tax; they have the inspectors as we have them, and the owners are not taxed. I should like the government to see if they cannot amend this clause so as to exempt the owners of boats from such a tax.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I may say, in reply to the hon. gentleman's remarks, that, as I announced before, this is simply a consolidation of the law as it stands, with very few amendments, which I explained to the House when the bill was in committee. The subject which the hon. gentleman has brought under the notice of the House is one that has been a very long time in existence in Canada as a part of the law. It was in the Act as it was consolidated in 1886, so that it is not a new feature in the bill in any sense. I am not aware of its having been challenged. I shall be very glad to draw the attention of the department to the subject, and if they concur in the views of the hon. gentleman, they might introduce a bill to meet his wish; but it would scarcely be germane to this bill to interfere materially with what has been the policy of Canada for so long a period.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed.

COWICHAN VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved the second reading of Bill (48) "An Act to incorporate the Cowichan Valley Railway Company." He said: This is a bill to incorporate a company which propose to build a short line in Vancouver Island.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Can the hon. gentleman say what will be the length of this road?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I could not say the length, but it is not long—only about forty miles. It ought to be a provincial bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I notice the provincial government have sent a request to the government of Canada to oppose any bill of a purely local character. They maintain that those mining bills should be left to the provincial legislature.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (L) "An Act respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company." He said: This bill requires some explanation. As most hon. gentlemen will remember, this unfortunate railway has been the subject of discussion in this House for several years. It has been in litigation for seven or eight years. The other day a final decision was obtained from the Privy Council in England declaring the action ultra vires. After seven or eight years' litigation, passing through all the courts, where it was argued from every point of view by eminent counsel of Ontario and Manitoba, the Lords of the Privy Council, in a very few minutes, declared the proceedings ultra vires. They have issued a decree by which they declare that the contractor will be entitled to recover the amount of work performed by him, on the principle of quantum meruit, and that he shall distribute the money among certain parties to whom he is indebted, leaving other creditors out in the cold, myself among the number. It further suggests that, it will be necessary to obtain an Act of Parliament for the purpose of carrying its provisions into effect. Therefore, after declaring the Act ultra vires, it is absolutely necessary that this matter should receive further consideration at our hands. The decree declares that payment shall for the future be made to certain individuals, and legislation is necessary for the purpose of the reorganization of this company ; because, you will admit that no party in England or elsewhere would advance money to the company until all future litigation ceases. Therefore it is considered necessary, for the purpose of carrying on the enterprise in the future, to introduce this bill for your consideration. It is unfortunate that the Privy Council should, in a few minutes, decide a matter of this kind, which has so long occupied the attention of all the judicial minds of this country, and after the litigants have been subjected to an immense amount of costs, and that there should have been a loss of seven or eight years in carrying on the operations of the railway and depriving the country of the advantages which they had a right to expect from the construction of that road. I do not desire to reflect upon the judiciary of this country, or the legal men connected while it, but it does seem to me most extraordinary that this decision should be arrived at so unceremoniously when it escaped the attention of our judges. However, the case is decided now, and the only alternative is to obtain this Act of Parliament in order that the company may be reorganized, and that they may have the necessary power to issue debentures in order to raise money upon those debentures for the purpose of paying off the liabilities which the Lords of the Privy Council have decreed should be paid, and to realize a sufficient amount of money to carry on the further extension of the road. This road is very much needed. We have had remonstrances from that section of the country, on several occasions against the delay in proceeding with the work, and it is highly essential, in the interests of the country, that this road should be completed at as early a date as possible. Therefore, I hope there will be no hesitation in passing this bill, and I think the 60th rule of the House might be dispensed with so that no further time would be lost in carrying the provisions of this bill into effect. Hon. gentlemen in the House are conversant with this matter, because it has been before us on several occasions. There is no alternative now except to apply to parliament to enable the company to carry out the decree of the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are called upon to legislate in regard to this matter when we have not the judgment before us.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I will present the judgment to the committee.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if it is the intention of the company to go on and further construct the road this summer?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Yes, there is a provision in this bill for all that. They are to go on and construct not less than twenty miles of railway. Now, it will be settled by this bill, and I think there will be no difficulty.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Before the motion is put, I should like to explain to the House, as this road is in the neighbourhood of where I reside, that this is one of two railroads that were projected to go into the North-west Territories on the line of what was called the fertile belt. That is the route which the government originally surveyed twenty years ago. The Manitoba and North-west is one road and the Great North-west Central is the other. As I understand it, the promoters of this line agreed to assign the charter and its franchises to a contractor to construct a certain portion of the road. A company was then formed in England and the contractor agreed to construct fifty miles, and the promoters were to hand over the franchise with the land grant, and the road was to be completed for fifty miles for the sum of $1,000,000. The company paid up, I think, £50,000, and upon that, the contractor proceeded with the work ; but, as I understand, he did not complete it and could not make the demand upon those with whom he had arranged to force them to take over the road and pay up the balance of the money. He did not complete his contract ; the court settled that, and the people in England had neither the road nor their money, and the litigation has been going on in order to give the people, who advanced the money to the contractors for the purpose of prosecuting this work, a title in some shape or form to the road, and to complete it according to contract. My hon. friend, the mover of the bill, has explained that it has gone through the courts from one court to the other and finally reached the highest court in the realm, and they have declared the agreement made by the Company with the contractor as ultra vires. I do not know the terms of the judgment, and I quite agree with the Minister of Justice in saying that it would be desirable to have the judgment printed, so that we can all judge in regard to the merits of the bill from the standpoint of the judgment. But what I wish to point out more particularly than anything else is the fact that the settlers who went in there twenty years ago settled under the impression that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were going to build on that route, and up to the present moment they have only had fifty miles constructed from the city of Brandon. Every year since I have had the honour of holding a seat in this Senate I have been called upon, by petitions from those people, to pray that parliament shall take such steps as will force this company to go on with the work or give up its rights; but unfortunately it has been in litigation. It has never been in a shape that parliament could take that position. Now, I understand from what the hon. gentleman says, it will be in a better state when this bill is passed and the costs are paid off and the sub-contractors who worked for the main contractors, who are also creditors, are paid off. This Act, as I understand it, is to put the company into such a financial position that it can meet all these liabilities, and under the Act, when they have raised the money, the creditors will be paid off and the road will be clear, and it will then be in a position to be continued. I know I am speaking in the interests of the people who are most anxious to have facilities for transporting their wheat in that country, and this railway is designed to afford those facilities. I know it is a very good country and financially it will be a good road, and the government had given it the usual land grant of 6,400 acres per mile, which I believe stands good to the present day.' I am not quite sure with regard to that, but at any rate, it is a road that is worthy of the best consideration of the government. It is very desirable that whatever privileges the hon. mover of this bill requires in regard to the suspension of rules to enable this matter to be legislated upon this session, should be granted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—When this bill goes to committee it will be very desirable to ascertain what are the liabilities of the company, and whether the judgment makes reference to all the liabilities of the company incurred, or whether it is an attempt to provide for certain liabilities and those only. It may be a matter of very considerable consequence that all parties may be protected by the bill if this proposed legislation is carried into effect by parliament. It may be that the committee will discover that the bill is not sufficiently comprehensive to cover the claims of all parties who have equitable claims against this defunct company.

The motion was agreed to.

BRANDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (47) "An Act respecting the Brandon and South-western Railway Company." He said: The bill simply proposes to extend the period for the beginning of the road two years from next November, and for the completion to four years from next November.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice when I may expect the returns which I moved for on the 31st March last, relating to the school lands sold, and the correspondence.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will make inquiry with a view to seeing that the return is brought down as soon as possible.

The Senate adjourned.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS introduced Bill (M) "An Act to further amend the Companies Act."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the bill be read the second time on Friday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the motion is agreed to, would it not be well to explain the scope and purposes of the bill?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The bill is very short. It is merely to prevent fictitious deposits with a view of obtaining the incorporation of companies. My hon. friend, I suppose, is aware that sometimes a cheque is given by a party with a view of preventing the lapse of the charter. A deposit is made in the bank, he is credited with the amount and the cheque is afterwards withdrawn. The bill is intended to prevent fictitious deposits of this sort by amending particular sections of the Companies Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing the cheque is presented marked good by the bank, then you hold the bank for the amount until the time has expired for giving out the contract, or for the completion of the work.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see this refers to the Companies Act, and it is to prevent the apparent payment of a larger sum than has actually been paid. There is nothing in the world to prevent the officers returning the cheque to the parties, especially if the parties are not personally responsible for the amount.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I may not understand the full scope of the bill, but my understanding of the matter is that in making these deposits, the party goes to the bank and make arrangements to pay so much per cent on the face of the cheque and the bank will give him a cheque marked "good," and if that is deposited with the government they hold the bank responsible for the amount.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think my hon. friend will understand it better when he sees the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

SURVEYS OF TIDES AND CURRENTS

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The notice of motion being read:

Is it the intention of the Government to extend to the waters of British Columbia a survey of tides and currents similar to that which has been so ably prosecuted by Mr. W. B. Dawson, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and which is proving of so much advantage to the navigation of those waters?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) said: The hon. member from Pictou (Mr. Primrose) has a notice on the paper similar to mine, and we have agreed to take the two at the same time, as the same answer will apply to both, but he is not well enough to-day to go on with his motion, and I therefore ask that his motion and mine be allowed to stand till Friday.

The notice was allowed to stand.

ROUTES TO THE YUKON.

MOTION WITHDRAWN.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a copy of the report of Mr. Coste, the engineer sent by the Government to examine and report on the different routes available for railway construction, from the shores of the Pacific Ocean to the Yukon District.

He said: I do not propose, hon. gentlemen, to go into the question of routes very extensively to-day, but I think this House and the country are very anxious to know what the report of the engineer of the government will be upon those routes. It is a matter to which a great deal of attention is given, and I hope that the government, at an early date, will be able to inform the House and the country what are their plans.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say to my hon. friend that I am not aware that Mr. Coste has been appointed to make any report on this subject, nor is any report expected from him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has he made any?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Surely an engineer sent by the government to report on the different routes would make a report. I have seen in the papers copies of interviews with him at Winnipeg and different places on the way through, where he spoke of the different routes and specially the Stikine route and the Kitimat route, and surely there must be a report.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said just a moment ago that my colleague tells me there is no report. I understand Mr. Coste went up to make a report on the navigability of the Stikine River, to find whether there was any obstruction, and it was frozen up at the time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He knew that when he went away. He states if I understand the report in the papers, that there are blocks of ice some 15 or 20 feet high, and there is no road on the ice at all.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know what Mr. Coste may have said in interviews with the newpapers, but he has made no report.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend, the leader of this House, if he is aware that the Minister of Public Works said that the Stikine River was open on the 15th April?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Well, I have moved for the report.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say, hon. gentlemen, it is rather extraordinary to insist on a report being brought down when I have told my hon. friend there is none.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Then you can not bring it down.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Surely there must be a report. What is the use of sending a man up there if he does not report to somebody what is done and seen?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would suggest that my hon. friend amend his motion by inserting after the word "report" the words "made, or to be made."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that Mr. Coste is an engineer in the Department of Public Works, and that is not a subject with which the Department of Public Works would be charged.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Why was he sent there?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not understand that he was sent there for any such purpose as that which my hon. friend has mentioned. I obtained information from the minister that Mr. Coste made no report and was not sent for any such purpose. I have given my hon. friend the information he sought, but when he asks me for what purpose Mr. Coste was sent there, that is an entirely new question, and I must submit it to the consideration of the minister.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—If Mr. Coste did not belong to the Department of Railways, which has this subject under control, why was he sent? You told me just now he went to examine the Stikine route and ascertain its navigability. That is in harmony with my motion, and he must report to somebody.

The motion was withdrawn.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Whether, since the 1st of July, 1896, the government or any member of the present administration has authorized Mr. Charles Russell, of the firm of Day, Russell & Co., of London, solicitors, to go to Rome, with instructions or a mission to speak or act in the name of the government, or of the Prime Minister, or of any member of the administration, with regard to the Manitoba School Question?

2. Was it to the knowledge of and with the consent of the government that Mr. Russell went to Rome and took upon himself, in the name of certain members of the government, to urge upon the ecclesiastical authorities of Rome a settlement of the Manitoba School difficulties?

3. If Mr. Russell thus acted with the authorization of the government, has the government, directly or indirectly, paid him for his time and travelling expenses, or does it propose to pay him them?

4. If Mr. Russell was not authorized to act in the name of the government or of any of its members, has the government paid this gentleman or does it propose to pay him, directly or indirectly, for his time and expenses?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If my hon. friend had all the information for which he seeks, he would be certainly a well informed gentleman, and especially upon this subject. There are some hon. gentlemen who require to have an extensive knowledge of things, and other hon. gentlemen who require an intensive knowledge. Now my hon. friend is of the second class, because he put questions to me on this subject a day or two ago, and I answered him, and he does not seem to have acquired from those answers all the information for which he seeks, and so has put these four questions upon the paper again to-day. I may say, in answer to my hon. friend's first question, that Mr. Charles Russell, of the firm of Day, Russell & Co., of London, solicitor, did not go to Rome at the instance of the government, or of the Prime Minister, or any other member of the administration with regard to the Manitoba School Question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was he authorized?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am answering my hon. friend's question, and if he wants further information than is contained in the answers to these questions, I shall endeavour to comply with his wishes to the best of my ability. The second question is:

2. Was it to the knowledge of and with the consent of the government that Mr. Russell went to Rome and took upon himself, in the name of certain members of the government, to urge upon the ecclesiastical authorities of Rome a settlement of the Manitoba school difficulties?

Now, let me say, in the first place, that my hon. friend's second question is hardly in order. He assumes certain things here to be facts, and I do not know whether they are facts or not. I do not know whether Mr. Russell ever went to Rome or not. I do not know whether he took upon himself to discuss the Manitoba school question at Rome or not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is out of your knowledge?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is outside of my knowledge, but I am informed by my colleagues that neither the prime minister nor any of his colleagues sent Mr. Russell to Rome for any such purpose. Mr. Russell, therefore, did not go to Rome for the purpose of discussing with His Holiness, or with any of the officials of the Vatican, the school question at the instance of the government. The third question is:

3. If Mr. Russell thus acted with the authorization of the government, has the government, directly or indirectly, paid him for his time and travelling expenses, or does it propose to pay him them?

Now, Mr. Russell did not go to Rome at the instance of the government, and so the government have not been called upon, directly or indirectly, to pay Mr. Russell for travelling expenses to Rome, assuming that Mr. Russell went there some time or other. The fourth question is:

4. If Mr. Russell was not authorized to act in the name of the government or of any of its members, has the government paid this gentleman or does it propose to pay him, directly or indirectly, for his time and expenses?

Mr. Russell, as I have already said, did not go to Rome at the instance of the government, and the government have not paid Mr. Russell for his time or expenses in going to Rome, nor does the government propose, directly or indirectly, to pay Mr. Russell for any such purpose. Now, I have answered the hon. gentleman's questions as fully and specifically as I can, and if he wants any further information, why he can put on another notice and I shall endeavour to get that information for him, either negatively or affirmatively as the nature of the answer calls for.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.—If the hon. minister will permit me, I will put the question now. It is not a question that will take him by surprise: I merely want an explanation of the answers we are given. I desire to know if the hon. minister makes a distinction between the expressions "at the instance of the Government and the expression "authorization of the Government."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have not been making any such subtle distinction in the answer which I have given to my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am asking if the hon. gentleman draws a distinction between acting at the instance of a person and being authorized by that person to act in such a matter? Because if there is a distinction my question is not yet answered.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend can put this question on the paper. We are not pressed for time just yet.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—My question was on the paper, and my question is whether, since the first of July, the government, or any member of the present administration, has authorized Mr. Chas. Russell to perform the services alluded to. The answer is that Mr. Chas. Russell did not do such a thing at the instance of the government. I want to ascertain if there is a distinction between not doing a thing at the instance of the government and being subsequently authorized to do it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am informed that he was not authorized to do so either by the Prime Minister or by any other member of the government.

PACIFIC AND YUKON RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Second reading Bill (F) "An Act to incorporate the Pacific and Yukon Railway, Navigation and Mining Company," together with the motion in amendment of the Honourable Mr. Mills that "the said bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED said:—The promoters of this bill have been waiting very patiently for the government to announce their policy upon the building of the Yukon road. They do not desire me to press the second reading of this bill just at this time. They do not wish to embarrass the government in any way; yet I should like to point out to my hon. friend that they are desirous of securing this charter, and of taking advantage of the time of the sitting of Parliament to procure this legislation, but with a view of the government bringing down a policy at an early date if they so intend, they have requested me to have the Order or the Day discharged and to postpone it for four or five days. I therefore move that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that it be made the first Order of the Day for Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (57) "An Act respecting the Manufacturers' Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company," and to change its name to "The Dominion of Canada Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company."—(Hon. Mr. Allan.)

NAKUSP AND SLOCAN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES moved the second reading of Bill (52) "An Act respecting the Nakusp and Slocan Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Could we have some explanation of that bill?

Hon. Mr. MACINNES—The explanation is a very simple one. The bill is asking powers to extend the line a distance of ten miles from a place called Three Forks to a point at or near White River Creek. Any further information, of course, will be furnished when the bill goes before the Railway Committee.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I understand there is some objection on the part of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway Company to the passage of this bill, and I would ask that, when it comes before the Railway Committee, a gentleman who is conversant with the railway and the effect of this extension upon the Kaslo and Slocan Company, will be permitted to be heard.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I do not know the exact objection, but there is some very serious objection. The whole of Kaslo is deeply interested.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The objection is simply that it is a competing line.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY AGREEMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. WOOD inquired of the Government:

1. Whether they will, during the present session, introduce legislation to ratify the agreement made with the Grand Trunk Railway bearing date the 1st February, 1898, and lately laid before Parliament?
2. Whether the Government will, during the present session, introduce legislation to authorize the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, or confirm an agreement for the purchase of the same?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend put this question yesterday and I answered him. I told him that the government had not considered the subject to which these questions referred, and so I am not in a position to say to him whether they will or will not.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I understood the hon. gentleman to say yesterday that he would answer this question to-day, and to ask that the notice be allowed to stand.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That was the answer that the hon. gentleman gave; I understood him to request that the questions be allowed to stand.

RESIGNATION OF CAPTAIN BELANGER.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the Government:

Why and on whose recommendation has the Militia General Orders No. 55, of the year 1894, in so far as it relates to Captain and Brevet Major P. Belanger of the 61st Battalion, been cancelled and the following substituted in lieu thereof, as published in the Canada Gazette of 18th December, 1897: "Captain and Brevet Major P. Belanger is permitted to resign his commission and to retain the rank of Major on retirement. 29th October, 1897"?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The changes in the general order number 55 of the year 1894 were made on the recommendation of the Major General commanding the militia.

HAMILTON AND LAKE ERIE POWER COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the third reading of Bill (100) "An Act respecting the Hamilton and Lake Erie Power Company," as amended.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—This is a very small bill, and hon. gentlemen may think it of little consequence; but I consider it a very important bill. On the second reading the hon. Secretary of State was very desirous to send it to the Private Bills Committee. I objected and it was sent to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours. If I thought that the bill would ever be carried out, I would oppose it very strongly. What does it propose to do? It proposes to take the waters of the Niagara river, up the Welland River 25 miles and then deliver them at what is called the River Jordan. If I thought we had a government, or would ever have a government in this country which would allow such action to take place I should oppose the bill strongly, because it would have the effect of washing out the foundation of the aqueduct of the Welland Canal. When the aqueduct was built, it was protected against the current of the river; but when you turn the current of the Niagara the other way, it will wash away the foundations. I look to the government to protect the country from any such thing, and I do not even suppose it will be attempted. I look at this bill as a bill designed to spoil the Egyptians. Look at it. The company had a charter three years ago, and this bill is to renew it. They had power, under that charter, to issue stock to the extent of a million dollars; they had power, at the same time, to issue bonds for a million dollars; now they come to this parliament, and the committee has thought proper to give them the power to increase their capital stock to $3,000,000 and their bonding power to $3,000,000 more. The only restriction put on them yesterday was that they should have only two years to commence and five years to finish. As I have said, I look at this as a scheme to spoil the Egyptians. If the company can sell these bonds, of course it is all right enough. When I look at the proposal to come from the Welland River to the River Jordan, I remember reading in the Good Book that it took the children of Israel, under the management of Moses and Aaron, forty years in the wilderness to reach the River Jordan—that they did not get there even then, because the children of Israel crossed the River Jordan under the guidance of Joshua, the son of Nun. As I look at this project, neither the Moses that is guiding this, nor the Aaron who is helping him will get across the River Jordan, and the Joshua who can work such a scheme has yet to come. I do not see him yet. If you remember, Moses was a man of few words and Aaron was a clever man, a learned man, an educated man, and did the speaking for Moses. My hon. friend the Secretary of State does the speaking for E. A. C. Pew, or in other words, the alphabetical Pew, and so must be the Aaron; but the Joshua has not appeared so far. I look to parliament to protect the country, and I think they will have to deal with it a great many times yet before it is done. Depending as I do upon the government of this country that they will not sanction the destruction of a great public work, I am not going to divide the House, but I shall vote against the bill certainly if I can get enough to support me in having my vote recorded.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed, on a division.

LAKE MANITOBA RAILWAY AND CANAL COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day "Third Reading Bill (66) 'An Act respecting the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company,'" having been called,

Hon. Mr. BOULTON asked that the third reading of this bill be allowed to stand over until to-morrow, as he desired to move an amendment affecting the bill.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES—As requested by the hon. gentlemen I agree to postpone the third reading till to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I may just point out to the hon. gentlemen that if he desires to move an amendment to this bill it is necessary to give notice.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am just doing that now. I desire in connection with this bill to give notice of the following amendment: that the following words be added to clause 1: "provided such amalgamation with the Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway Company shall only apply to that portion of the aforesaid railway that lies between the terminus of the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company and the Saskatchewan River."

The third reading was postponed till to-morrow.

TRADE MARK AND DESIGN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being read:—

Second reading Bill (61) "An Act in further amendment of the Trade Mark and Design Act."—(Honourable Mr. Scott.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said: When I moved that the second reading of this bill take place to-day, I was under the impression that it was a bill prepared by the Minister of Agriculture. On sending to the department to know whether they had introduced the bill, I was informed that they had not, that it had been introduced by a private member of the House of Commons. Some private member of this House will, no doubt, take charge of the bill here, and I therefore move that the Order of the Day be discharged and that the second reading be fixed for Monday.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will my hon. friend explain the object of the bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand that it is to enable trades unions to adopt trade marks. I do not know that there is any objection to the bill—I think there is none.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have just read the bill this moment. I understand that trades unions have certain trade marks and that they ask permission, in all industries in which they are employed, to use these marks only in those institutions in which members of their order are employed so as to designate the work that is produced by them. I see no objection to the bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then any manufacturer who thinks proper to employ men who do not belong to trades unions will find, when his goods are placed on the market, that they will be boycotted because they have not the trade union mark on them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The object is to indicate whether such goods are produced by members of the trade unions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If objection should be taken by the trade unions to the sale of goods which do not bear their mark, does the hon. gentleman think that would be desirable?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand persons in the community are not members of trade unions, they will not consider when they purchase goods whether they were made by members of trades unions or not. They will consider the price and quality of the goods.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has another bearing; however, we can discuss all that in committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

SURVEYS OF TIDES AND CURRENTS IN CANADIAN WATERS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE rose to inquire of the government:

Whether it is their intention to include in the Supplementary Estimates, or otherwise provide for, an amount in addition to the $2,500 embraced in the main estimates, for the prosecution of the "Survey of Tides and Currents in Canadian Waters," in some degree adequate to the requirements of this most important service.

He said: In speaking to this motion, I wish to put the matter before the House in as succinct and condensed a manner as possible in order to economize time; at the same time, I want to give a clear and intelligent presentation of the circumstances in regard to this most important matter, and so, instead of speaking to the various items, I propose to cite the opinion in reference to them of corporations and individuals who are recognized as authorities on the subject with which they deal, at the same time making such comments as may seem to me to be necessary. In the first place, to show the localities in which the work has been prosecuted heretofore, I read from the report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, 1897, pages 17 and 18. This is from the chief engineer, W. B. Dawson, to W. P. Anderson, 6th December, 1897, in regard to the locality in which the work has been prosecuted and where it is further required:

A general examination of the currents of the Gulf of St. Lawrence has been carried on by this survey in the three seasons of 1894, 1895 and 1896, by which the currents in the interior of the gulf, and in the straits connecting it with the ocean, have been examined with special reference to the leading steamship routes which pass through it in various directions.

The United States Hydrographic Office have drawn attention to the results obtained by this survey, by republishing a diagram and explanation of the nature of the current in the Strait of Belle Isle, in their "Pilot Chart for the North Atlantic," for the month of March, 1897; and also a summary on "Current circulation within the Gulf of St. Lawrence" in the "Pilot Chart" for July, 1897. A "Notice to Mariners" based upon the information obtained, was also issued by the United States Hydrographic Office in January, 1896. Two extended summaries of the Reports of Progress have now been given in the "Annals of Hydrography and Maritime Meteorology" by Dr. Schott, of Hamburg. The reports have also been reviewed in the "Scottish Geographical Magazine;" the "Annales de Géographie," Paris; and Dr. Petermann's "Mittheilungen," Germany; and the work has been favourably noticed in the "Journal of Commerce," of Liverpool. A short review of the work from its inception, and of the results arrived at, appeared in "Nature," London, 22nd April, 1897.

Little attention has yet been given to the currents in Northumberland Strait and around Prince Edward Island; or to the tidal currents of the Lower St. Lawrence from Anticosti to Quebec, as some knowledge had first to be obtained of the gulf currents and their relation to the ocean. A further examination of the currents in the Strait of Belle Isle is also desirable, to obtain more complete data for its tidal character. The work has been carried on with the assistance of one of the supply steamers of the light-house and buoy service, which has been placed at the disposal of this survey for the three months of July, August and September, in each season, which was as long as it could be spared from its other duties; but it has proved unsuitable for the purpose, as it is so slow and unwieldy as to add materially to the difficulty of carrying out the work to advantage, and the time allowed cuts the season too short, even with the best endeavour to take advantage of every available day, and to make the observations continuous day and night. The further survey of the currents was discontinued this season to save expense to the department; and when it is resumed, a steamer of suitable character and properly equipped for the purpose should be made available for the work; and in some regions one or two schooners, if properly fitted out, could be used with advantage as auxiliaries.

The regions in which the currents most require investigation at present, are on the south coast of Newfoundland and in the Bay of Fundy. On the south coast of Newfoundland it is reported that there is a strong indraught into the larger bays, and to this several wrecks are attributed. The distance from shore that this is felt, and the conditions of wind and tide which give it the greatest strength, should be ascertained; as two of our leading steamship routes follow this coast. I had the opportunity this season of obtaining some preliminary information which will serve as a guide in carrying out this investigation. In the offing of Cape Race, the variation in the Arctic current should be better understood, for information of inward-bound vessels; and no detailed examination has yet been made of this current further north, off the outer end of the Strait of Belle Isle, for the assistance of vessels in making that strait. The currents on the south-western coast of Nova Scotia and at the mouth of the Bay of Fundy have also much importance, and to obtain the necessary tidal data for comparison, a tide gauge should be established at Yarmouth without further delay. In the upper part of the Bay of Fundy, and its arms, the currents are probably more nearly parallel with the coast line, as on the Lower St. Lawrence; but on the other hand, the navigation being entirely dependent on the tide, it comes to be of the first importance to determine the time and height of the tide itself correctly. An examination of these currents should be made while the principal tidal stations now established continue in good working order, as the currents are chiefly tidal, and their behaviour can only be ascertained by direct comparison with a tidal record.

And here I want to emphasize as best I can the importance of a proper investigation in that respect along the route where such important matters as are embraced by these notices are conducted:

The investigation has included the currents found at the three angles of the gulf, namely, (1) in Cabot Strait which forms the main entrance to the gulf, between Cape Breton and Newfoundland; (2) in the Strait of Belle Isle; and (3) at the entrance to the St. Lawrence and around the Island of Anticosti. The currents met with in the open gulf have also been examined and their direction traced; and much information has been collected from seamen and fishermen as to the currents, and with reference to the drift of the ice in winter and spring.

I read also from the letter of the Chairman of the Board for Examiners to the Department in 1897, pages 58 and 59.

In December, 1895, I received a letter from the department, stating that it was carrying on a survey of tides and currents on the coast by which important additions to its knowledge was being obtained, and informing me that the latest knowledge of this character would be included in the subjects for examination before my board.

So important did they deem this matter that it was constituted a matter of inquiry before the board of licensing and granting certificates of competency and so on. The report continues:

And I notified the instructors of navigation to that effect.

The information gained from a survey of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and Straits of Belle Isle, made for the purpose of ascertaining the movements of the tides and currents of those waters, will, no doubt, be of much service to mariners, and the inauguration of the method of continuous tidal records, obtained from the automatic gauges placed at some of the principal ports of our coast, and other places in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, will no doubt hereafter prove beneficial and assist in the safe navigation of all classes of vessels.

The influences which act upon the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, are ever changing, making it most difficult for officers of ships to calculate the force and direction of the tidal current with any great degree of certainty.

Mr. W. Bell Dawson, who conducted the survey, has given much valuable information upon the subject, and it is to be hoped the government will see their way to prosecute this useful work for many years, as the short time occupied in the survey is not sufficient to give any proper knowledge of the movement of the tide.

I regret to say that the officers who have been examined for certificates have not given this matter the attention it deserves.

That is from W. H. Smith, chairman of the board of examiners. I also desire to read the enumeration of the principal tidal stations from W. B. Dawson's report of 1897 at the first page:

In establishing these stations originally, a careful selection was made of the most commanding points on the Atlantic coast, at the gulf entrances, and on the St. Lawrence. The stations, therefore, are not only of direct value to our principal harbours, but they also serve as reference stations from which to determine tidal data in the regions lying between them. There are now seven stations in operation, situated at St. John, N.B., Halifax, St. Paul Island in Cabot Strait, Forteau Bay in the Strait of Belle Isle, South-west point of Anticosti, Father Point and Quebec.

Then I read from the report on the preparation and improvement of tide tables on the fourth page of the same report:

The improvement which can be made in the tide tables each year has to depend upon the balance remaining after the charges of first importance are met. Out of the small vote available for this survey, the special appliances for deep-sea anchorage, and all current meters and other marine instruments required for the survey of the currents, have to be provided; as well as the salaries of assistants and of the tidal observers, and maintenance and supplies for the tidal stations. The question of expense made it necessary to choose between these and improvement of the tide tables.

Now I come to another matter of prime importance, and that is the result of these investigations in this work in regard to the fisheries. I read from the same report of 1897. (Pages 36 and 37):

It is probable that the temperature and density of the water and the direction of its currents, may have important bearings upon the movements of fish, which as yet are imperfectly understood. This opinion is held by the countries bordering the North Sea; and the information afforded by the investigation of the movements and other characteristics of the water are there used as a basis in arriving at the reasons for the distribution and migration of fish at different seasons. The information has its chief application in the North Sea to the herring fishery; and yet a practical return is expected for the outlay which is made in obtaining it; and the investigation is of such importance that arrangements are being discussed for international co-operation amongst the countries bordering the North Sea in carrying it on. In our fisheries, the cod and mackerel, have a greater importance relatively than the herring; which would warrant the expenditure of larger sums in proportion in promoting their interests by such investigations.

As an example of the importance of knowing where fish are to be found, and why they prefer one region to another in different seasons, it may be mentioned that during last season's fishing schooners were returning from Labrador in September with half cargoes while within the Gulf we found on the "Lansdowne" that cod were everywhere abundant throughout the summer on the thirty and forty fathom banks, which no schooners were taking advantage of. It is held by fishermen that fish are never caught while the water is clear; and its clearness must have some relation to physical conditions which could be ascertained. It is also known that the cod are caught in shallower water in the spring, and further from shore as the season advances. This may depend more directly on the movements of the herring or capelin which they follow; but these fish may themselves be influenced in their movements by the temperature or other characteristics of the water which may differ at different times.

In the sixth item, I read the present position of this branch of the tidal service and future work at page 38 of the same report. I have selected these different excerpts, as far as I possibly can, in order to give them a sort of succession to make the story continuous—having a text of such importance as this work—and to make it as intelligible as I can in that way.

I read now of the present position of this branch of the tidal survey and future work:

During the past three seasons a general examination of the currents in the interior of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the straits connecting it with the ocean has been made with special reference to the leading steamship routes which pass through it. Little attention has yet been given to the currents in the wide bay formed by the sweep of the coast from Miscou to Cape Breton, in which Prince Edward Island lies. The strong tidal currents of the Lower St. Lawrence have not yet been examined, as they are usually parallel with the shore and have less tendency to set a vessel out of its course, and also, because from Father Point to Quebec, vessels have the advantage of the pilot service. It was also necessary to obtain first some knowledge of the gulf currents and their relation to the ocean. No detailed examination has yet been made of the currents in the Atlantic, off the outer end of the Straits of Belle Isle, for the assistance of vessels in making the strait. On the south coast of Newfoundland, it is reported that there is a strong in-draught into the larger bays, and to this several wrecks are attributed. The distance from shore that this is felt, and the conditions of wind and tide which give it the greatest strength, should be ascertained, as two of our leading steamship routes follow this coast. Some information has been collected with regard to the general set of the current on the Atlantic coast of Nova Scotia; but the currents on the south-western coast and in the Bay of Fundy are much more important. In the upper arms of the bay the currents are probably parallel with the coast line, as in the Lower St. Lawrence. But there, the navigation is entirely dependent on the tide, and the time and height of the tide are of the first importance. Towards the mouth of the bay, the currents require investigation in the interest of steamship lines running to St. John and to ports in western Nova Scotia. An examination of these should be made while the principal tidal stations are still in operation, as they are chiefly tidal and their behaviour can only be ascertained by direct comparison with a tidal record. This may serve to indicate the information which is most needed with regard to the currents on our eastern coasts, and which it is important to obtain, as soon as possible, in the interest of Canadian shipping.

I will read now of the seven tide gauges now in operation from Dawson's report of 1896, on page 6:

The seven tide gauges now in operation are as follows:—

1. St. John, N.B.—Gauge sitnated at Reed's wharf in St. John Harbour. To furnish a basis for tide cables for this harbour, and also to serve as a reference station for the Bay of Fundy.

2. Halifax, N.S.—Gauge situated at the wharf of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. To furnish a basis for tide cables, and also to serve as a reference station for the Atlantic coast.

3. St. Paul Island, C.B.—Gauge situated at Atlantic Cove, on the east side of the island. To command Cabot Strait, the main passage in which the tides enter the Gulf of St. Lawrence from the Atlantic.

4. Strait of Belle Isle.—Gauge situated at Forteau Bay, at the inner end of the strait. To command this entrance to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and also to bring the currents in the strait into relation with the tides.

5. Anticosti.—Gauge situated at south-west point. To command the entrance to the St. Lawrence.

6. Father Point.—This gauge is at the pilot station, and at the head of the deep channel of 150 fathoms, which extends up the Lower St. Lawrence from the gulf. It serves also as an intermediate station between Anticosti and Quebec.

7. Quebec.—Gauge situated at the dry dock, Lévis. To furnish a basis for tide cables for Quebec harbour, and with reference to depth of water in the St. Lawrence Ship Channel.

These are pretty much the data in regard to the condition of matters as far as the work itself is concerned and the progress which it has made. I come now to read what is thought of this service and its importance by corporations and by gentlemen who are experts and whose authority is recognized all over Canada, and in many cases throughout the world. I read now the petition of the Royal Society of Canada, presented to the government in June, 1897:—

PETITION OF THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA, JUNE, 1897.

The Royal Society learn with regret that no grant has been made by parliament this year for the continuance of the survey of the tidal currents. Ignorance of these currents has been made the cause of immense losses to shipping in the past and will in the future until it is removed by a thorough investigation. The sooner, therefore, that investigation is completed the better for Canadian navigation; but the need for prompt action has become much more pressing since a parliamentary grant has been passed for a "Fast Atlantic Service." The importance of tidal observations in connection with these currents was urged upon the attention of the Dominion government for several years by the Royal Society of Canada, acting in co-operation with the British Association for the Advancement of Science.

The force of the reasons submitted by the society was invariably acknowledged, but delay arose from various causes. At length after a thorough inquiry by the Minister of Marine, the work was undertaken by the government in 1890, and although the grants were small, inadequate in fact to such a prompt execution of the survey as the interests of navigation demanded, yet progress was being made and there was every year a hope that an increase would be made which would bring nearer the time when the practical knowledge acquired would become of extensive value.

Much disappointment has been caused by the retrograde step of reducing the yearly grant so that observations of the currents will be lost for at least a whole year.

The society is persuaded that this reduction would hardly have taken place if the full weight of the reasons for establishing a tidal survey had been present to the mind of the government, and therefore beg leave respectfully to present them again.

For proof of the assertion that ignorance of the tidal currents is a great danger to navigation it is only necessary to refer to the list of wrecks published annually by the Dominion government since confederation. There it will be found that a very serious proportion is attributed to "unknown currents," which may be fairly assumed for the most part to be "tidal currents.' As year after year, trade is more and more, carried on by steamers, attention may be specially drawn to the wrecks of steamers. A list officially prepared in which those due to unknown currents and fogs in which the currents are most dangerous and causes connected with the tides generally, would be very instructive, if a comparison were made with the total loss of steamers from all other causes.

The magnitude of the total loss in the case of steamers on the St. Lawrence route, may be estimated in another way, which shows a heavy burden on Canadian navigation. It is stated on good authority that while the insurance of a steamer for the season of navigation by the St. Lawrence route may amount to as much as 10½ per cent of the value of the vessel, the insurance of the same vessel to United States ports will be only from 3½ to 6½ per cent, according to the port—a difference against the Canadian route of from 4 to 7 per cent. Should not means be taken to remedy this enormous disadvantage as speedily as possible?

If the rate of insurance on the St. Lawrence route for steamers could be reduced by only 3 per cent, a very short calculation will show the great aggregate gain. What is the total value of the ocean steamsers on the route? To this only an approximation can be made. Lieut. Gordon, R.N., in a report to government published in the Annual Report for 1889 of the Department of Marine, estimates roughly the average value of a single steamer at $250,000.

This would give us a total for 64 steamers coming to Montreal this summer, the sum of $16,000,000, an amount that may fairly be considered to be below the true value when it has been officially stated in parliament that the cost of the four new steamers for the "fast Atlantic service" will be $10,000,000. Two years hence we may, therefore, reasonably expect the total to be at least $26,000,000.

If the insurance on this amount can be reduced by 3 per cent, the saving will be $780,000 yearly. This, it is to be remembered, is on the vessels alone. How much should be added for the insurance on the freight? When this has been done may we not, keeping within safe bounds, say that it seems probable that a reduction of even less than 3 per cent would result in a saving of not less than $600,000 yearly. This will be on the St. Lawrence route alone. How much more will it be when other Canadian waters are taken into account?

Compared with this annual sum, the total additional outlay that the government can be asked to spend on every form of improvement of all the different routes for navigation is small. Fogs are the chief source of danger for steamers, and this mainly because of the "unknown currents." In fogs, the lighthouses, on which the government, very properly, spends large sums of money, are useless; and all fog-signals, though useful, are, owing to atmospheric causes, very untrustworthy. Soundings, too, are often deceptive. It becomes, therefore, a matter of necessity that the master of a ship should learn as accurately as possible in which direction and how fast the current is carrying his ship.

In the case of the steamer "Montreal," which was wrecked in the Straits of Belle Isle in August, 1889, in a fog in which the explosion of the foghorn-gun was heard and soundings were constantly taken, the unavailing efforts of the master to ascertain the drift of the ship, due to the tidal current, and the over-dependence on the sound of the gun, which eventually destroyed the vessel, are very instructive on this point. The details are given in the report of the Depart of Marine for 1889, p. 112, etc.

Admitting the great magnitude of the losses to Canadian trade caused by "unknown currents," the evidence for which is to be found in the government reports, the following questions may be asked:

1. Can a knowledge of these currents be attained which shall be of practical value to navigation?
2. Do shipmasters desire it, and can they use it? Do ship owners and agents desire it?
3. What will the cost be?

Evidence in reply to these questions has been collected and submitted to the government on former occasions. Canadian waters are not the only waters in which currents are dangerous, and the experience of other maritime nations in dealing with these currents can be appealed to. Here especially may attention be drawn to the tide tables for British and Irish ports published yearly by the Admiralty, in which full information is given about the tidal currents around the coast of the United Kingdom. The knowledge is deemed of such importance that shipmasters in order to obtain certificates of competency are obliged to pass an examination on the subject. Reference may also be made to the work of this kind done by the Coast and Geodetic Survey of the United States.

Besides this evidence, a circular with definite questions bearing on the subject and issued to leading shipmasters on the St. Lawrence and to others, and the replies, which were practically unanimous, were transmitted to the Minister of Marine. Copies of these replies can again be submitted if necessary. The reply of Staff-Commander Maxwell, R.N., then engaged on H.M.S. "Gulnare" in surveying the gulf was very direct and plain approval and was quoted.

Further direct evidence was received by the late Minister of Marine himself in reply to inquiries addressed to the chief officers in the Hydrographic Services of Great Britain and the United States. This evidence also recommended a survey. Other evidence also was submitted, but the above seems sufficient.

The answer to question 2 concerning the wishes of shipmasters is given by a petition addressed to the Minister of Marine by nearly 400 (393 is the exact number of masters and officers of ships). A printed copy is herewith submitted, to which is attached a copy of a petition from the "Shipping Interest" of Montreal. A body which sent many deputations to the government in favour of the movement.

Petitions came also from boards of trade. More especially has the board of trade of Montreal, the commercial capital of the Dominion, urged steadily and repeatedly by memorial and deputation the necessity of the survey.

For the third question, the cost, an estimate for tidal observations in general was submitted by the late Lieut. Gordon, R.N., which will be found in the Annual Report of the Department of Marine for 1890, pp.—84 to 85. The amount, $40,000, suggested for the tidal currents alone, seems too small, but, even if the sum should be trebled, it would still be small, compared with the gain on the St. Lawrence route alone. His estimate is based on observations for a number of years.

In the case of the tidal currents the time may be reduced by increasing the annual outlay for a few years, and as it is of the utmost importance that everything should be done to make the "Fast Atlantic Service" successful, it is respectfully submitted that it would be wise by immediate outlay to remove the danger arising from these currents as much and as quickly as possible. A great deal may be done before the vessels are ready. The operations might be restricted to this steamship route until it has been thoroughly surveyed.

While pressing so strongly the need for a survey of the tidal currents, the society would deprecate quite as strongly the idea that this should be carried out to the neglect in the smallest degree of the other measures which are necessary for the safety of navigation.

A survey of tidal currents is in reality only part of a hydrographic survey, taken in the fullest sense of the term, and the society has already recommended to the government the complete organization of a hydrographic survey for the Dominion corresponding to the coast survey in the United States. It is a matter of fact, that hydrographic work is being regularly done for the Dominion. There has been a hydrographic survey of the Georgian Bay, a hydrographic survey of the Bay of Quinté, hydrographic work on the Pacific coast, hydrographic work on the Great Lakes. The tidal observations on the Atlantic side of the Dominion are also, as has been stated, part of a hydrographic survey.

The importance of the work seems deserving of more recognition than has yet been given to it. If a hydrographic survey department were organized and put on the same footing as the Geological Survey, both the public and parliament would be more likely to give weight to its recommendations. The officers of such a department would be responsible advisers of the Minister of Marine and would be recognized in this capacity by the people of Canada. It would be their duty year by year, to determine and report to the Minister of Marine what was the hydrographic work that was most urgently needed for the time, and to execute this work when duly authorized. It is not likely that with such a department in existance so important a work as a tidal survey would be overlooked or neglected.

After the organization of such a department it is not likely that the survey of any region would be postponed until attention has been drawn to the need by the wreck list.

It is not probable that such a statement would again be made as appears in the report for the Department of Marine for 1889, p. 68, where it is said that the survey of the Georgian Bay was caused by the great loss of vessels every autumn, culminating in the loss of the steamer "Asia" with some 150 lives, coupled with a prospect of increasing trade.

The loss of 150 lives or a great number of ships or even of one very costly vessel, ought not to be necessary preliminary to inquire into the condition of the navigable routes.

The Royal Society would go one step further in its recommendation.

The hydrographic survey of the Georgian Bay beginning in 1883 was the first that was ever undertaken "by and at the sole expense of the government of Canada" (It should be remembered that the Dominion had then been in existence for only 16 years.) No hydrographic survey of the Gulf of the Atlantic coast has ever been undertaken by the Dominion itself. All this work has been done by the Admiralty either wholly at the expense of the Imperial government or when the Dominion government has made a special application, the cost has been divided between the two governments.

It is likely that in future much more will have to be done by the Dominion government itself. Greater economy and efficiency will, no doubt, be attained by acting in concert with the Imperial government. By proper consultation it ought not to be difficult to arrange what work should to be done by each in Canadian waters or their neighbourhood, or what by both in common.

In short, it may be suggested that the Dominion Hydographic Survey might form part of an Imperial Hydographic Survey, and while quite independent, might thus act well in concert with the Imperial government. It does not seem that there ought to be more difficulty in effecting this than in making common postal facilities for both countries.

It may be objected that this may cause greater outlay for the Dominion. That, however, is a matter that will be determined by the Dominion itself. It certainly cannot expect, nor ought it to desire that Imperial funds should be spent as freely in the future as in the past in the survey of Canadian waters.

If it were to follow the example of New Zealand, which contributes $50,000 yearly to the Royal Navy, or of Australia, which gives $600,000, it also would contribute to the Royal Navy, the protection from whose armed ships it shares. But if this cannot be done, it ought, in the future, to pay at least for that work in its own waters, which has hitherto been so largely done by the surveying vessel of the Navy.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that while, in the St. Lawrence route, the insurance is ten and a half per cent, the insurance of the same vessel in the United States port would be only three and a half to six and a half per cent. I shall now read a statement showing the losses from wrecks :—

It is impossible to get values of steamers or cargoes lost, but seeing that the total losses number fifty-three, seven and a-half to ten millions of dollars would be a moderate estimate of the value for the steamers, or, say £30,000 to £40,000 each, and their cargoes should amount to an equal sum, so that the entire loss may be fairly estimated at fifteen to twenty million dollars.

I read now a letter from a prominent steamship firm in Montreal to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries last year:

We beg to bring to your notice the stranding of the steamship "Arcadia," near Cape Ray, Gulf of St. Lawrence, with probable total loss of this very valuable boat, which taken in conjunction with the total loss of the steamships "Warwick" and "Assaye" in Bay of Fundy last winter will, we fear, bring about very serious consequences to the steamship trade of Canada, by greatly advancing the rates of insurance upon both hulls and cargoes.

Insurance, as you are doubtless aware, is a most important and very large item in a steamer's outlay, and it is also an important item in the matter of costs with shippers, most of our grain, flour, deals, &c., being sold on such a small margin of profit as to take but little additional cost to make the business impossible, or deflect it to United States ports where insurance can be done at much lower rates than from Canadian ports.

The reason for high rates on steamers to Canadian ports is largely owing to the feeling amongst English underwriters, Lloyds and others, that our coasts are not properly lighted and surveyed and the charts re soundings and currents very defective. The actual condition of things may not be so bad as supposed, but it must be, we think, acknowledged that but little has been done of late years in improvements to our lights or fog signals and but little in the way of determining the existence and strength of the currents which are known to be dangerous on many parts of the coast, particularly to the entrance of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Bay of Fundy.

We inclose you letter received from a firm of marine insurance brokers in London which treats of this matter and we hope that as Minister of Marine you will give this subject your earnest attention and that you will see your way to the publication of some information that can be distributed among the underwriters and marine insurers of England, giving the exact position of lights, fog signals, &c., on the Canadian coasts and in shape serviceable as a guide to captains commanding steamers in the Canadian trade, especially strangers coming to a Canadian port, it may be for the first time.

The enormous difference in insurance against steamers engaged in the Canadian trade is probably unknown to you, but when we inform you that the common rate of insurance on vessels running to Canadian ports is 10 per cent per annum as against three to four per cent per annum on steamers of same class running to United States ports, you will understand how heavily we are handicapped.

Taking 50,000 pounds as an average price for a freight steamer—the "Arcadia" is said to have cost over 100,000 pounds—and many of the vessels now engaged in the trade have cost fully that amount, but taking 50,000 pounds as an average the difference of insurance per annum would be about 3,500 pounds per year, or say 500 pounds per voyage an amount they can badly afford to pay. Indeed the heavy insurance charge has been the cause of a great deal of the disasters which have befallen the Canadian steamship companies and anything the government can do to increase the safety of our coasts, and especially the St. Lawrence route, will be a great boon to the shipping interests.

Then I read from a letter from a firm of merchants in London, England:

With reference to the insurance of steamers trading between this country and Montreal, we very much regret to say that there is a great amount of prejudice existing here, both at Lloyds and with all the companies, about the navigation of the St. Lawrence. Indeed the difference in premiums between the trade to the United States and Canada is something like 50 per cent to 60 per cent against Canada. We cannot of course suggest any remedy, but if your government could in any way take steps by improved lighting of the river, if that matter is at all defective, it would be the means of saving the shipowners who carry on the trade, a considerable amount of money.

We have always had the feeling that Montreal traders were placed at considerable disadvantage and if the authorities would see if any improvement in the existing arrangements could be made, it would enable owners to insure their steamers at somewhat lower rates.

I have here a memorandum as to insurance rates for grain. The rates are as follows: From New York $\frac{3}{4}$ cent per bushel; Montreal $2\frac{3}{4}$ cents per bushel; other goods—it does not specify the other goods, they can be any class of goods—other goods from New York, 5 cents; from Halifax, 8 cents; from Montreal, 15 cents. Then the regular insurance on the Fast Line steamers is enormous, so much so that it would almost pay the Messrs. Peterson and Tate to pay for the cost of carrying on this survey themselves. Now I am going to read a letter from a high authority connected with the British Admiralty:

I have been much exercised at hearing a rumour that investigations connected with the tidal survey were to be curtailed, if not dropped. The work has been so far well carried out, but the nature of the water movement requires a long continued series of observations to arrive at any practical conclusion, and if dropped now the money already spent may almost be said to be thrown away.

I read now an extract from the Journal of Commerce of Liverpool, dated April the 9th, 1898:

The survey of tides and currents has been carried out under the able superintendence of Mr. W. B. Dawson and that official's report appears, and contains much that is of value to navigators in the St. Lawrence Gulf waters, or more correctly, a portion of that navigation. Every advantage has been taken of the facilities offering, which, by the way, have not been of the most satisfactory nature, the steamer placed at the disposal of the department, being available only some three months. However, a great deal of valuable work has been done and too much stress cannot be laid upon the necessity for a thorough investigation of the tides and currents in this part of the world for the greatest bar to navigation—fog—is so common and persistent that the most reliable information should be at the disposal of captains and pilots. Several wrecks are attributed to an indraught setting on the south coast of Newfoundland yet no adequate knowledge of its force or the conditions inducing it are available. Other portions of the gulf and adjacent waters such as the Bay of Fundy need investigation; and in the interests of our great shipping industry, and with the object of removing ship owners and underwriter's objections, the work should be carried out efficiently and effectually—a course that cannot be followed without expense, but money expended by any country or colony in rendering the navigation to and from it comparatively safe is one of the best investments that can be made. We have on previous occasions referred to the excellent work of this survey, and judging by results as evidenced by the tide tables issued and the tidal diagrams published in the report before us the Dominion Minister of Marine and Fisheries has every cause to be satisfied with the work of Mr. Dawson. The whole report is excellent evidence that the Right Hon. Sir Louis Henry Davies (Minister) is well served throughout.

I read now an extract from the Montreal Daily Witness of the 9th March, and I may here remark that this is a matter that ought not to be looked upon from a party point of view at all. For that reason I have cited quotations both from the journals supporting the Liberal government, and the Conservative press. I read from the issue of the Montreal Daily Witness, of March 9th:

Among the papers contained in the lately issued report of the Marine Department for 1897, none is of more general interest than those relating to the survey of tides and currents in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and around the coast of the maritime provinces. Mr. W. Bell Dawson, in charge of these particular surveys, states that in the seasons of 1894, 1895 and 1896, a general examination of the currents within the gulf and the straits leading to it had been made, the results throwing light on the circulation of the waters of the gulf as a whole, and the relation of this to the tides, but leaving much still to be desired in this connection. These results have appeared in previous reports, and have been quoted and made use of by hydrographic authorities in the United States, Germany and England. The further prosecution of this work toward completion has, however, been suspended during the past year in order to reduce expenditure, although the saving thus effected is, perhaps, scarcely a wise economy, in view of the great importance to the country, as a whole, of rendering navigation of the gulf and its approaches, as far as possible, absolutely safe. It is at least possible that some of the recent losses of vessels plying in these waters might have been obviated by a more accurate knowledge of the currents, and in order to maintain the confidence of the shippers and underwriters in the Canadian route, it is certain that every reasonable effort should be made to arrive at a complete knowledge of its conditions.

The most important extension of this work at present required appears to be in connection with the south coast of Newfoundland and the Bay of Fundy. Mr. W. P. Anderson, chief engineer of the Department of Marine, under whose control the tidal current work is, writes as follows in connection with Mr. Dawson's report:—

I am particularly anxious to have an investigation of the currents between Cape Breton Island and Cape Race undertaken as soon as the necessary funds and a steamer can be allotted for the work. The large number of wrecks that have occurred at the south-east shore of Newfoundland and the concurrent testimony that there is a strong indraught in that direction emphasize the fact that such an investigation would have eminently practical results.

The tidal observations are, of course, intimately connected with those of the currents, most of which are distinctly tidal in their origin, and to secure the most complete information both should be continued concurrently for a term of years sufficient to cover the varying conditions. During the past year these observations have been continued, but on a reduced scale. It is at least satisfactory to know, however, that we are at length obtaining the necessary data for accurate tide-tables, giving the height as well as the time, of the tide for some of the principal points, such as Halifax, St. John, Quebec, Father Point, and so forth. In order to acquire the necessary data for such tables, a number of specially selected points have been provided for self-recording tide gauges, from which, by means of observed local differences, the tides at any intermediate points may be calculated. It is thus important to ascertain the local differences by observations at as many harbours as possible, while the principal recording stations are maintained, the information thus once gained being of permanent value and serving as a basis for the calculation of local tides in future years. A beginning was made in this important matter in 1896, including twelve points on the south-western shores of the gulf, extending from Chaleurs Bay along the New Brunswick coast, and around Prince Edward Island to Cape Breton, but the vote available for last year did not admit of its continuance.

Then there is a letter from Alexander Johnson, Chairman of the British Association and Royal Society of Canada on March 30th, published in the Montreal Gazette:

The citizens of Montreal are at present naturally congratulating one another on their foresight ten years ago in building a dyke, which, not needed for nine years, has in the tenth saved the city from heavy loss, and possibly from much sickness. If it were proposed now to abolish the dyke, without putting any structure in its place to protect us against the river would there be much indignation, much outcry against those venturing the suggestion? And this because of a chance once in ten years. How much greater would be the indignation if, instead of a mere chance there should be an absolute certainty of loss and of deaths in addition, not once or twice or thrice in ten years but every year? And yet this very thing—a preventable destruction of Montreal property and of life - is happening lower down this same river and in the adjoining waters continuously, and only a very small fraction of the people of Montreal seem to care anything about it, while the rest of Canada, though sharing the loss, seems equally or more indifferent. All this, no doubt because the scene does not lie directly under our eyes and they do not know how much their purses suffer. The difference is just the same as between direct and indirect taxation.

The loss by shipwrecks to which I allude is certainly a heavy annual tax on the trade of Montreal and of Canada. If such a loss or a part of it were to be caused annually by a flood in the city who would submit to it? The citizens would put pressure on the corporation and the corporation would call on the city surveyor and his staff for an instant remedy.

Similarly for the wrecks in the gulf and on the coast of Canada, so far as they can be prevented (and a great deal can certainly be prevented)—why should not the people of Montreal and of Canada put pressure on the Dominion government—and then the Dominion government call for a remedy on—whom? The surveyor of tke gulf and coast and his staff? But there is no such officer. No such staff. Then, obviously, if there should be a likeness between the two cases, as appears, the people of Canada ought to press the Dominion government in the first place to create such a body, whose duty it shall be to guard against shipwrecks as far as possible, just as our city does against floods and against injury to trade by bad roads Who can imagine what a state our city would be in were it not for excellent city surveyor and his staff?

When large stores are bullt—will not the owners do their best to see that the streets leading to them do not offer any unnecessary obstacles to traffic? Large sums of money are being spent and will be spent on the harbour of Montreal. Is the road which leads to the harbour—the gulf and river route—to be neglected, and vacant spaces left in the harbour for the ships which come not?

The petty grant of $15,000 a year made for this purpose was cut down last year through motives of economy to $2,500. It is of the highest importance to the country that it should not only be restored to its old amount, but so increased this year that the work may be more speedily done. The Royal Society of Canada, at its meeting in Halifax last June drew up a petition on this subject, and on the question of hydrographic survey in general, of which this forms a part, which, it may be hoped will, when presented formally and considered by the government, have a proper effect. Of the urgency of the work I hope you will permit me to say more in another letter."

On March 31st in the same paper there is a second letter from Mr. Johnson:

In my previous letter I proposed to speak of the urgency of the work that was needed to lessen the dangers of navigation in Canadian waters. By work I mean, not only the work of the tidal survey—a survey of the tides and currents, but the still larger work of the hydrographic or coast survey which includes the first. Such evidence for the former was laid before the government that the work was (after six years steady pressure) actually begun in 1890, and was proceeding satisfactorily, though on too small a scale and therefore too slowly, until it was intermitted last summer. The extension of it involved in the second was also urged on the government and it was understood that this would follow in the course of the development of the other.

I doubt if it be possible to present stronger evidence of the urgency of the need and, of the possibility of a remedy that was formally submitted, taken from the annual report of wrecks issued by the Department of Marine; from experts in hydrogravhy (British and American); from the mother of all maritime countries, etc. At any rate, there is not space in this letter for such figures as were given formerly, and can be produced again if needed.

The question is, however, to be asked, why other maritime countries have hydrographic or coast surveys, which investigate currents as part of their work? No doubt it is because they find it economical to pay the cost rather than suffer the losses they would otherwise meet. Can Canada afford to be extravagant—to bear heavy losses rather than spend a little to remove their causes—to be "pennywise and pound foolish." And yet, this course of apparently we are in danger of adopting.

The late Lieut. Gordon, R.N., estimated that a yearly grant of $40,000 was necessary for a few years, for an effective tidal survey. Far less was given, and to effect a petty saving out of this small grant, Montreal alone remains subject to an unnecessary annual tax on its trade, which cannot well be less than half a million dollars, and may be much more.

The losses on the gulf route are so great that the annual insurance on a steamer is from 4 to 7 per cent greater than on the same vessels going to United States ports. The actual insurance rates may amount to 10½ per cent, i.e., the whole value of the steamer may be paid away in insurance in less than ten years. If any one will make an estimate of the present value of the steamers coming from Montreal, and suppose that by an improved knowledge of the route such as a hydrographic survey would give, a reduction of only three per cent could be made in the insurance rate, he will be able to judge of the above estimate of the preventable tax of half a million or more. The "fast line" of steamers has been officially valued at $10,000,000. If this be added how much will the preventible tax be?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would my hon. friend permit me to suggest that he should hand in those selections to the reporters and permit us to proceed with the business on the order paper. I do not wish to be discourteous at all. The selections are very valuable, but the hon. gentleman could accomplish his purpose by handing them to the reporters.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I owe the House an apology for reading so extensively; but I felt the subject to be one of great importance and that really I could make the matter clearer by quoting these extracts than by speaking to the different heads.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I think the information is very valuable.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I feel thoroughly convinced that the large majority of the members of the House are not possessed of the information contained in these documents. It is in a much better shape than I could put it myself. I feel the importance of the matter so much that I think I might trespass on the time of the House. At the same time if it is the desire of the House I will refrain.

Some hon. MEMBERS—Go on, go on.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If it was the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) who was dealing with the subject, we could be kept here for a great many hours and no one would raise an objection.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I read from the Montreal Witness of April 2nd, and I do so because this is one of the recognized organs of the government:

The position recently assumed by the Witness deprecating the mistaken economy of the federal government in suspending the investigation of the tides and currents of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and around the coast of the maritime provinces has received the support of the Montreal Board of Trade. That influential body takes the ground that the majority of shipping disasters in the lower river and the gulf are fairly attributable to lack of information respecting the currents and the effect of the tides thereon. That several, perhaps many, fine vessels have been lost in the Gulf of St. Lawrence by reason of imperfect knowledge of the set of the prevailing currents is reasonably certain, and the wreck of the "Mexico" at the entrance of the gulf, in the summer of 1895 may be directly attributed to this cause. At that date there was, and there probably is even now, a belief, common among the navigators of these waters, that the current in the Strait of Belle Isle set constantly inwards or towards the west. This opinion has been shown to be quite erroneous, but since the current in question whether flowing westerly or easterly, frequently attains a rate of two knots an hour, it is evident that a misapprehension of its actual direction may cause an error in the ship's reckoning of four miles an hour, often more than enough to account for disastrous consequences. As a matter of fact, the Belle Isle main current under normal conditions varies in direction with the ebb and flow of the tide. During high winds, particularly from the east or west, the current tends to assume the direction of the wind, and under its continued influence may maintain this direction, as observation has shown, for the greater part of three days at a time. The preponderance of duration of direction throughout the year, allowing for influence of the wind, is in favour of a current inward to the gulf. The greatest velocities of current observed during high winds (in the months of July and September) have been from the east 3·15 knots, and from the west 2·50 knots an hour. Entering the gulf itself, it is found that there are other causes of uncertainty besides the rate of current velocity. Thus, in the centre the rate varies from that at the sides in the ration of 0·79 to 1·37 knots. The submarine current of the strait appears to be somewhat more constant and equable than at the surface, and is found to be in general much stronger than the surface current when it flows from the east, but always weaker when it flows from the west.

It will be found that the admiralty charts of the lower gulf indicate a constant current flowing along the coast of Gaspé in a north-westerly direction at a distance of about three miles from the shore and the mariner is informed that this current makes itself felt and nine or twelve miles from land; but these charts show another branch of this current commencing in the neighbourhood of Cap Magdelen and running to South-west Point, and thus crossing the channel between the coast of Gaspé and Anticosti. It is explained, however, that the current does not follow both lines simultaneously, but these latter appear to be alternative, and the variation is attributed to the influence of wind blowing from the south-west. Here is a contingency which confronts the navigator, and it surely is important that he should be informed of the conditions orginating it, and of its probable velocity and extent. The general currents of the gulf, rarely attain a speed of three knots an hour, are locally subject to the influence of prevalent winds, and thus very much in force; there are also of course, largely affected by the tides, which in their turn are influenced by barometric changes; so that there is here presented a complex and ever varying order of things adding much to the difficulties of navigation and suggesting the absolute necessity of a detailed and thorough investigation of all the physical conditions obtaining, more particularly over the routes usually followed by steamers. A considerable amount of information in this connection has in fact been collected by the Department of Marine and the results made public in the departmental report of operations in 1896, but undoubtedly much remains to be done in the same direction.

Confessedly small attention has yet been given to the currents in Northumberland Straits and around Prince Edward Island or to the tidal currents on the lower river from Anticosti to Quebec. A further examination of the currents of the Strait of Belle Isle is necessary, also of those existing to the south of Newfoundland and in the Bay of Fundy. These latter are chiefly of tidal origin and their investigation is, therefore, closely identified with tidal survey. Observation has shown that the general course of the tidal wave which passes across the gulf from Cabot Strait to the entrance to the St. Lawrence is complicated by a return of undulation, and that consequently the time of the tide at any particular station within this area cannot be accurately obtained by a constant difference from a portion of the Atlantic coast, such as Halifax, but that these tides can best be referred to a special selected station within the region in question. The place chosen for this purpose is St. Paul Island, where the tidal wave enters the gulf from the Atlantic. Six other stations have been settled as points of observation, but time and much patient investigation will be necessary to obtain satisfactory data for comparison and to arrive at approximate certainty.

As an illustration of the necessity above referred to it may be stated that from a provisional series of tidal differences worked out between Pictou and Halifax, it appears that the actual difference in the time of high water between these two places is far from constant, as the time of high water at Pictou was found to range from 53 minutes to 3 hours and 23 minutes later than at Halifax. On the charts of rivers and harbours the soundings show the depth of the water below the level of the water surface at low water at ordinary spring tides, which level is known as the "low water datum." But here again the determination of this datum can only be made by means of tidal observations, and on the correct level of this datum the whole question of the depth of water on shoals and bars and the grounding of vessels must necessarily depend. The height of the tide at low water or at high water, as given in the tide table, will then show what increase of depth is available for a vessel in addition to the depth shown on the chart. The ascertaining the height of the tide thus becomes of quite as much importance to shipping as the time of high and low water. A consideration of the facts here stated will show that no argument should be necessary to convince the government of the wisdom of pursuing a liberal policy in this matter, and that operations tending to an exhaustive investigation of the currents and tidal phenomena with which our seamen have to deal are in the interests, not of ship owners, shippers and underwriters only, but of the entire community and are essential to the proper development of our resources.

Here is one further extract, the letter of Mr. Johnson :

When steamers of 10,000 tons and more and each costing two millions and one-half of dollars are to be introduced on this route, it is a matter of grave consideration for Canada that all precautions be taken to make the route as safe as hydrography can make it.

Suppose only one such steamer is wrecked, how much would the rate of insurance go up? What effect would this have in driving away trade to United States ports?

Then, an extract from a newspaper report of a meeting of the Board of Trade of Montreal :

It was decided to renew representations to the government with respect to the grant for surveying the tidal currents in the lower River and Gulf of St. Lawrence. As a result of the council's efforts some years ago in conjunction with the Commission of Royal Society of Canada and of the British Association for the advancement of Science a grant was procured of $15,000 annually ; but this was reduced last year to $2,500, which meant practically the suspension of the survey. An earnest protest was at once made but the minister's reply stated that it was not proposed to pursue the survey during that season as the department had no vessel at its disposal which could be made available for the purpose.

In view of the importance of the matter, the council resolved to urge the government to approve such a grant as will permit of the continuance of the survey, it being believed that the bulk of the disasters in the lower river and gulf are attributable to the lack of information respecting the currents and the effects of the tide thereon.

Then an extract giving Captain Maxwell's opinion. He was well known to a good many here and was of the Royal Navy.

I am of opinion that it is highly important in the interests of navigation that as thorough an investigation as possible of the strength and duration of tidal streams and currents should be made in the localities named. The advantages of such a survey would be that shipmasters would be enabled to judge almost accurately, of the set of their vessels from these causes ; probabilities of abnormal streams would be anticipated by them and ship wrecks like those at St. Shotts (St. Mary's Bay, Newfoundland) and that of the R.M.S. "Moravian" would be avoided.

Now I am pretty nearly at the end of my discourse. I am sorry it has been so long and apparently, on account of its length, a little distasteful to some of my fellow members. I can easily imagine how those who reside inland would take less interest in this subject. The fact is that England, the United States and India have these surveys. The late Captain Gordon, who was an expert, when in the steamship "Acadia," found that if he followed the prescribed course, irrespective of making allowance for currents, he would in twelve hours be eighteen miles out of his course from the action of these currents. From that circumstance hon. gentlemen can see the importance of this matter. Now, I am going to quote the appropriations made by the government for these surveys. This is the Chief Engineer Anderson's report of 1897. He says :

I am particularly anxious to have an investigation of the currents between Cape Breton Island and Cape Race undertaken, as soon as the necessary funds and a steamer can be allotted for the work. The large number of wrecks that have occured on the south-east shore of Newfoundland and the concurrent testimony that there is a strong indraught in that direction emphasize the fact that such an investigation would have eminently practical results.

The expenditure on the survey of tides and currents to date is given below. In these amounts there is no charge for the steamer used in the survey during three months in the seasons of 1894, 1895 and 1896 ; but the anchorage appliances and equipment for the survey are included. The amounts also include the original construction of the principal tidal stations and the recording instruments for them, maintenance and supplies for these stations, salaries of observers, the expense of the observations at the temporary stations during the summer season of 1896, with travelling expenses and incidentals, and also the cost of reducing the results of the observations and calculating tide tables from them, so far as this has yet been done.

Last spring, application was made to the Canadian government by the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey office for permission to land a party at Seymour Narrows, on the east coast of Vancouver Island, for the purpose of obtaining tide gauge records at this point, in the general interests of commerce and navigation, their Pacific coast tide tables requiring data which could only be conveniently obtained by taking observations in the Narrows for an extended period. I understand that a party has been located at this place during the past year. I also learn that the publishers of the British Columbia Almanac are indebted to the United States government for the tide tables of British Columbia waters which they issue. I beg to draw attention to the desirability that tidal observations in British Columbia waters should be made and the records reduced for use by our own service. We have been supplied with two years' records of the tide gauges maintained by the Department of Public Works at the Fraser River and Victoria, the latter station lately transferred to Esquimalt. If these records could be worked out they would probably give results more accurate than anything yet obtained respecting British Columbia tides, which are very irregular and very interesting.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—A United States ship was lost in the narrows some years ago, and that accounts for the interest the United States have in the matter.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Now in these circumstances, which I have just stated, should not Canadians feel in some sort humiliated that such a wholly inadequate appropriation as $2,500 is made for this all-important service, especially in the face of the fact that Americans have actually asked permission to make such surveys on the British Columbia coast in the interest of the commerce of the world at large, and would it not be possible for the government to curtail expenses in some other direction rather than starve out a service of such paramount importance as that which we are now considering? I beg to apologize to the House for having read so much from different sources, but, as I said at the outset, I hope the House will pardon me as I thought the matter was of such importance—and I am convinced yet—that this was the shortest way in which that I could bring it to your attention. I claim no more important matter can engage the attention of this House. These waters on the Atlantic coast constitute the approaches for the ships of all nations to our Dominion, and, considering the position which our Dominion is taking among the nations of the world just now, it surely is among its highest interests, and we should put forth our best efforts to make the access to our country as free from danger as possible for the ships of the world.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) inquired:

If it is the intention of the Government to extend to the waters of British Columbia a survey of tides and currents similar to that which has been so ably prosecuted by Mr. W. B. Dawson in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and which is proving of so much advantage to the navigation of those waters?

He said: Before the hon. minister replies I wish to say a few words. My motion is similar to the motion of the hon. gentleman from Pictou, and the same answer will apply to both. The question put forward by the hon. gentleman is of vast importance. He has gone fully into the question so far as it relates to the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Atlantic coast, where some work has been done, and I will not deal with that at all. But on our coasts the tides are most erratic, and at the steamer narrows the tide is very interesting; one tide goes out to the north and the other to the south, and the channel is about half a mile wide. The current is very strong, both flowing and ebbing. In both directions it comes and goes quickly. A ship of war was lost there two years ago on account of those tides. The chief object in a survey of currents is to enable seamen to know what to do with a steamer in a fog. Of course, without a survey of current, a steamer is helpless in a fog, but if you have a survey she knows the drift of the current and will know whether to drop anchor or take any other precautions. After the elaborate and very instructive address by the hon. gentleman opposite, I will say nothing more but ask my question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Answering the hon. gentleman from British Columbia. First I beg to inform him that Col. Anderson is now in British Columbia. He was sent out there some time ago by the Minister of Marine to make an examination into the currents, with a view of making a full report, and I have no doubt when his report comes in that the Minister of Marine will take up the subject and deal with it in a satisfactory manner. The hon. member for Pictou need not have made any excuses for the time that he occupied in addressing the House, inasmuch as he has given us valuable information. We are rather indebted to him for the industrious collection of facts which he has brought under the notice of parliament bearing upon this question of tides and currents. The government fully appreciate the importance of the subject, as we all do, but as he has himself recognized, the demands on the revenue of this country are very great and it must be recollected that our coast lines taking the oceans and the inner waters, are probably greater than those of any country in the world, and the demands for expenditure in the way of lighthouses, fog-whistles and dredging are very large, and the government is constantly being pressed for expenditures in that direction, each locality considering the expenditure in its own particular quarter is more important than any other. The collection of facts that the hon. gentleman has brought together is most important, and I shall be very glad indeed to bring it under the notice of the Minister of Marine. In answer to his question I may say that the supplemental estimates have not yet been brought down. They have not yet been submitted to council and, therefore, I am quite unable to say whether it is the intention of the minister to include any sum in supplementals for additional surveying to ascertain the tidal currents. Possibly after reading the evidence the hon. gentleman has brought forward it may have some influence on his judgment, and I shall be very glad indeed to bring it to his notice.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I am very much obliged indeed to the hon. Secretary of State for his promise to bring this matter under the consideration of the minister. Yet from its tone I do not regard the answer as very hopeful. The principal reason which he urges in regard to the decrease in the appropriation is that of economy. If that is the reason why this important service should suffer, it is a very great pity that economy should be exercised in the direction of such an important service. The principle of economy has been lost sight of altogether, as far as the funds of this country are concerned, in regard to another matter which I shall now submit to the House, and I do not have any compunctions in submitting it, as the plea put forward is economy. I hold in my hand a document which came into my possession from a prominent counsel in Manitoba, and I shall read it just as it is and make my comments after I have done so. It relates to criminal prosecutions for alleged ballot stuffing in Manitoba. This was done by the Liberal government, so economical in regard to its expenditures upon currents and tidal surveys on our coasts—a thing that is of such urgent and absolute necessity :

Informations were laid against eighteen men, nearly all of them representative men in their districts : First, Parker, Dixon, Roberts, James, Waller, McFadden, Kerriman and Brown.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has asked his question and there is supposed to be no more discussion. The hon. gentleman introduces an entirely new subject for discussion, and, further, I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that, even if he were not out of order, the matter which he has brought before the House is irrelevant, because it is the government of Manitoba which conducts the criminal prosecution and not the government of Canada.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—In regard to Federal elections ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes. But I urge the point of order.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I was under a misapprehension, if that is the case. I thought it came within the purview of the general government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has been under several misapprehensions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps the hon. gentleman would inform the House whether expenses attending the prosecutions have been charged to the Dominion government or the local legislature ?

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I am certain it is charged to the Dominion government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My impression is that there is an item in the estimates to meet the expenses to which my hon. friend refers.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Yes, that is my own impression.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is unquestionably out of order.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—This has been a question of expenditure——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The point of order having been taken my hon. friend cannot proceed till the Speaker has given his decision.

The SPEAKER—Very great latitude has always been allowed in discussions on inquiries. In this case if the hon. gentleman could prove that payments have been made in criminal cases by the Dominion government, it would perhaps give a reason for discussing the matter. But as I am aware, that in criminal matters all expenses are always paid by the local government, I am sorry to say this question would be irrelevant to the question before the House.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I can procure the evidence and can bring the matter up again.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You can move for the papers.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I will give notice at another time.

AN APOSTOLIC DELEGATE IN CANADA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to inquire of the government:

1. Whether the government or prime minister, or any member of the present administration, or Mr. Charles Russell, of London, solicitor, with the authority or to the knowledge of the government, has asked the authorities of the Vatican to appoint an Apostolic delegate to remain permanently in Canada for the purpose of assisting, directly or indirectly, the government in the settlement of the Manitoba school question?
2. Whether, if such is the case, it is the intention of the government to put in the Supplementary Estimates a sufficient amount to defray the expenses of the delegation it has asked for?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My answer to the first question is no, and of course that dispenses with any necessity for replying to the second.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (68) "An Act respecting the Montfort Colonization Company, and to change its name to the Montfort and Gatineau Colonization Company."—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (64) "An Act respecting the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company."—(Hon. Mr. Power.)

Bill (93) "An Act respecting the Canada Atlantic Railway Company."—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

LAKE MANITOBA RAILWAY AND CANAL COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES moved the third reading of Bill (66) "An Act respecting the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company." He said: This bill came up for its third reading yesterday in its regular course, but my hon. friend from Shell River asked me to put off the third reading till to day, to give him an opportunity to make a statement. Although I thought the matter was pretty fully discussed in the Railway Committee when he was present, yet I did not want to appear discourteous, and I therefore assented to his request that the bill be set down for a third reading to-day.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved in amendment:

That the following words be added to clause 1: Provided such amalgamation with the Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway Company shall only apply to that portion of the aforesaid railway that lies between the terminus of the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company and Saskatchewan River.

He said: When this bill was before the committee the day before yesterday, I was unfortunately attending another committee as chairman. I asked the messenger to let me know when this bill came up in the Railway Committee, but he neglected to do so, and when I arrived there the bill had practically passed through committee and been signed by the chairman, I was therefore not in a position to formulate the idea I wished to convey to the committee in regard to this bill. Therefore, when it came before the House I desired to have an opportunity of moving the amendment which now appears on the order paper.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES—I do not wish to contradict the hon. gentleman, but I was present when Mr. Lash, the solicitor, explained the bill to the hon. gentleman and he distinctly assented to it. I simply wish to place before the House the matter exactly as it existed before the committee.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am quite aware of that, Mr. Lash's statement was to the effect that this bill conferred no powers on this amalgamated company but you can understand that when a member comes into a committee that has already disposed of a bill as I did at that late hour, it is not so easy to place one's views before the committee, and I failed to do so. But I wish now to give my reasons for moving the amendment that is now before the House. I merely wish to explain how it was that before the committee I was not able to formulate, in a manner that was intelligible to the committee, the objections I have to the passage of the bill in its present state. Hon. gentlemen, this is a bill to amalgamate the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company with the Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway, and one or two railways, the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway of Canada, the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company, and the Manitoba South-eastern Railway Company. This Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company is the old Hudson Bay Railway that has been before this House for a great number of years, and I would just like to point out the various Acts under which it is constituted. They are as follows :—

STATUTES OF CANADA RELATING TO THE WINNIPEG AND GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY SINCE ITS INCORPORATION.

1880, 43 Vic., Chap. 59, p. 55.

An Act to Incorporate the Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway and Steamship Co.

Power to build railway from city of Winnipeg to Port Nelson or some other point on the shores of Hudson's Bay at or near the Nelson River, and to own steam and other vessels for the purpose of transport from terminus of railway to Europe or otherwise. Construction not to be commenced until location approved by government. Railway shall be commenced within two years, and completed within six years from the passing of this Act.

1880, 43 Vic., Chap. 57, p. 43.

An Act to incorporate the Nelson Valley and Transportation Company.

Power to construct the railway between a point on the north shore of Lake Winnipeg, and a point at or near the Churchill River at or near the shore of Hudson Bay, with power to own steam vessels and to build a branch line from any point on its main line to a point on the Pacific Railway west of Lake Winnipegosis. Railway shall be commenced within two years, and completed within six years from the passing of this Act (7th May, 1880). In default powers shall absolutely cease with respect to so much of the railway as remains uncompleted.

1883, 46 Vic., Chap. 69, p. 62.

An Act to unite the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway and Steamship Company, and the Nelson Valley Railway and Transportaion Company into one corporation under the name of "The Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway and Steamship Company.

From and after the adoption of this Act the shareholders of the companies hereby amalgamated are declared to be a body corporate and politic under the name of the "Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway and Steamship Company." All rights of each of the companies hereby amalgamated are vested in the company. The provisions of this Act to take effect when ratified by a general meeting. Power to complete railway from Winnipeg to a point on Canadian Pacific Railway west of Selkirk and east of Portage la Prairie to Port Nelson or some other point on the shores of Hudson Bay and branch line west of Lake Winnipegosis. Power to own steam veesels. The railway to be commenced within three years and completed within ten years from the passing of this Act May 25th, 1883.)

1884, 47 Vic., chap. 70, p. 98.

An Act to Amend an Act to Incorporate the Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway and Steamship Company. Time for completion limited in 43 Vic., chap. 59, extended. Work to be commenced within two years and completed within six years from the passing of this Act (17th April, 1884). Line of railway to be to Port Nelson or Churchill or some other point on the shore of Hudson's Bay, and also to construct branch line west of Lake Winnipegosis. The Act 46 Vic., chap. 69 uniting the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway and Steamship Company and the Nelson Valley Railway and Transportation Company is hereby repealed. Whereas it has been agreed between the two companies that the Nelson Valley Company be wound up. Power is given it to do so by vote of its shareholders and all its rights, privileges and franchise shall be held by the Hudson Bay Railway and Steamship Company. This brings the time down to the year 1890.

1886, 49 Vic., Chap. 73, p. 38.

An Act to amend the Acts relating to the Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway and Steamship Company.

Time for completing railway extended so that railway may be commenced within one year and completed within four years from the passing of this Act. (2nd June, 1886).

That brought the time down also to the year 1890.

1887, 50-51 Vic., Chap. 81, p. 100.

An Act to consolidate and amend all Acts relating to the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway and Steamship Company, and to change the name thereof.

The corporation heretofore known as the Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway and Steamship Company shall be called "The Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway Company." The company shall have power to build railway from the city of Winnipeg northerly to Port Nelson or Churchill or some other point on the shore of Hudson Bay, and to construct branch line from point on main line where it crosses the Saskatchewan River to a point on the Canadian Pacific Railway west of Lake Winnipegosis. Branch line shall not be commenced until location approved by government. Company may own vessels and they may ply between railway terminus on Hudson Bay and any port in Europe or elsewhere.

Sec. 33. The main line shall be completed within four years from the 21st day of June, 1887. Other Acts relating to the company hereby repealed, and this Act is substituted for them.

That brought the completion of the road down to the year 1891. Those are the facts with regard to the main line of the Hudson Bay Railway running to the Hudson Bay. In 1890 the policy of the government in power at that time seems to have changed; they dropped that portion of the line going to the bay and confined their policy to aiding a line to the Saskatchewan River, and the following Act was passed:

1890, 53 Vic., Chap. 80, p. 108.

An Act respecting the Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway Company.

Sec. 33 of 50-51 Vic., chap. 81 is repealed and the following substituted therefor: "33. The said main line of the railway shall be completed to the Saskatchewan River within four years from the 21st day of June, 1890."

Without any reference to the portion of the line that led to the bay.

And then the following Act was passed in 1891:—

54-55 Vic., Chap. 81, p, 88.

An Act respecting the Hudson Bay Railway Company.

Government may enter into contract with Company for carriage of supplies to Saskatchewan river. The location of the line south of Saskatchewan Railway shall not be commenced till approved by government.

In 1894 the same policy was pursued by the government confining the operation of the Act to the line from Winnipeg to the Saskatchewan River, as the following will show:—

57-58 Vic., Chap. 94, p. 175.

An Act respecting the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company, and to change the name thereof to the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Oompany.

Sec. 33 of the statutes of 1887 as amended by statute of 1890 is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

33. The main line of the railway shall be completed to the Saskatchewan River by the 31st day of December, 1896, otherwise the powers granted with respect to such construction shall be null and void as respects so much of the railway as then remains uncompleted.

The name of the railway is changed to the "Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company."

And in 1895 the following was passed:—

58-59 Vic., Chap. 8, p. 53.

An Act respecting the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company.

Referring to contract for carriage of supplies south of Saskatchewan River.

And in 1896 the last amendment to the Act was as follows:—

1896, 59 Vic., Chap. 40, p. 97.

An Act Respecting the Winnipeg, Great Northern Railway Company.

Sec. 33 of the Act of 1887 as amended by the Act of 1894 is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

33. That portion of the main line of the company's railway reaching to the Saskatchewan River shall be completed by the 31st day of December, 1898, otherwise the powers granted with respect to such construction shall be null and void as respects so much of the railway as then remains uncompleted.

Now those were the Acts relating to the bill which is now before the House. This charter has been before parliament for a great number of years, and has always been opposed by the opposition in the various amendments made to it during that time. I feel quite confident that hon. gentlemen in this House desire that our legislation shall be consistent, and that it shall leave this chamber, at any rate, as perfect as we can possibly make it. The contention is that the charter has ceased to exist to the bay in consequence of the non-fulfilment of conditions. A new charter has been granted to the Hudson Bay and Pacific Company, and parliament has given authority to another company, practically to build over the same route. Now the amalgamation that is sought for here is to amalgamate with that Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway. I say that that amalgamation should not go beyond the Saskatchewan River, I do not raise any objection to the other part. but I do object to its going beyond the Saskatchewan to the bay on two grounds, One is that there are very great doubts (it is almost a feeling in my mind), that the charter for the section between the Saskatchewan River and the bay is not in existence, and it is not wise for this parliament to assent to a bill, authorizing an amalgamation with a company whose powers have, to all intents and purposes, so far as we can read from these various Acts, ceased and it would be imperfect legislation; it would not only be that, but there is such a doubt as to the validity of the legislation, in so far as it applies to the line to the bay, in consequence of the time never having been extended and no time set for its completion, and no work having been performed on that section from 1880 down to the present time, that it might lead to litigation. Now we have suffered in the western country very much from litigation of railway companies, that is to say railway promoters and companies fighting with one another in the courts, to the injury of the public interests and the delay of the construction of these lines. We had an instance of it only to-day in the Railway Committee in regard to the Great North-west Central Railway. That has been in litigation for ten years between the company and the contractors. The Manitoba North-west Railway Company has been in litigation for some years; it has been tied up. Both these companies are still virtually in litigation. Now the Hudson Bay Railway is a line that is looked on with very great interest in our western country. The people are sincerely anxious to see that route developed for what it is worth. According to the latest report that has come out there is navigation through the straits for three and a half months and possibly four months. That is the report that Commander Wakeham has made, and the people are convinced that if this route can be used for three or three and a half months, it is going to assist them in reducing the heavy rates which are pressing upon them now, and enlarge their transportation facilities. It would be a disastrous thing if, in consequence of any legislation of this parliament, litigation should result that would tie up that Hudson Bay Railway for ten years. That is one thing that I wished to point out, in order that we may remove any doubt upon the subject by confining the amalgamation to the point that I speak of. Another objection I have to it is this: that the charter was granted in 1880 and it has ever since been a close preserve for that line of railway—that is to say, it is a private corporation which is only utilized for its own advantages, and is not open to competition in any shape or form. The people out west feel that that railroad leading from the Saskatchewan River to Hudson Bay, which is the most difficult portion should be open to any railroad—that the prairie lines should concentrate upon that point and take advantage of the line between Winnipeg and Hudson Bay to reach the sea. For that reason also I do not wish that any colour of the revival of the charter should be given to it by the passage of this bill as it stands. This bill provides that the company may enter into an agreement—we do not know what the agreement is or what the parties to the other side of the agreement are to agree to; parliament is asked to abandon all power over it by passing this bill in its present shape. You can see by the various Acts to which I have called attention that the time for completion has not been contemplated by the government, which gave those subsidies and the charter. The contention is, that while a time was fixed for the completion of the line to the Saskatchewan River and that time was extended, and no time was given for the extention of it to the bay, that the portion relating to the latter is virtually dead. The present owners of that charter hold that it is a perpetual charter. Hon. gentlemen know very well that it is not the policy of this parliament, by any inadvertence or any means whatever, to grant perpetual charters. Our general Railway Act provides for that and shows that the policy of parliament in the matter is. The general provision relating to limitation of time is to be found in sec. 89 of that Act, and is as follows :—

> If the construction of the railway is not commenced, and fifteen per cent on the amount of the capital stock is not expended thereon within two years after the passing of the Act authorizing the construction of the railway, or if the railway is not finished and put in operation in seven years from the passing of such Act, then the powers granted by such Act, or by this Act shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the railway as then remains uncompleted

So that if no special provision is made with reference to the line of railway, then the general Railway Act comes in and interferes and says, that if the road is not commenced within a certain period and completed within a certain period, the charter becomes null and void. That is the announcement of the policy of this parliament, that perpetual charters should not be granted, and that operates on this particular charter which is now before us. The charter was granted in 1880, and here we are, eighteen years afterwards, and not a single penny has been expended and not a single effort has been made to construct the Hudson Bay Railway which is so much desired in Manitoba and the North-west Territories.

This Manitoba Railway and Canal Company got a charter to build 125 miles north from Portage la Prairie to Lake Dauphin—it is called the Dauphin Railway. That railway was chartered on the west side of Lake Manitoba, while this Hudson Bay Railway is designed to go on the east side of Lake Manitoba. The Lake Dauphin Railway obtained a subsidy of 6,400 acres per mile and $2,000 a mile for its construction, and with the aid of a guarantee of bonds of the Provincial Government it has completed 125 miles of its road. It has no further subsidies than those I spoke of. The Saskatchewan River is 300 miles from Portage la Prairie, or Winnipeg. Now this charter of the Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway contains a subsidy of $80,000 a year for the line from Winnipeg to the Saskatchewan River, besides a land grant of 6,400 acres per mile, and the object of the promoters in amalgamating with the Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway is to be seized of those franchises and subsidies, in order to go on with their canal and railway system to the Saskatchewan River. I am prepared to acknowledge that parliament's intention was that they should have an extension of time for the commencement and completion of that part of the line up to the 31st of December this year, so that I am not opposing the amalgamation of these co npanies to that extent, and so far as the policy of the government may permit, of their taking advantage of whatever subsidies may be applied to that. There is no doubt that that is a perfectly legal position, and there is no opening for litigation up to that point, nor do I know of any public or private interest that would be likely to contest with that railway company the right to that amalgamat on if it is authorized under this bill; but what I do contend is that there are such very grave doubts as to the legality of the whole charter through to the bay that if the powers were granted to the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company under this Act of amalgamation of the whole line, that the parties who are interested—say the parties who have already got another charter covering the same route—would be in order if they filed a bill and asked for an injunction to restrain the company from either operating the amalgamated road up to the Saskatchewan River or beyond that point. It is to avoid that possibility of litigation that I propose this amendment. I would just read to you shortly an extract from the Commons Hansard to show what the policy of the government was with regard to giving these subsidies. In 1891 the then Minister of the Interior, Hon. Mr. Dewdney, resolved the House into committee on the following resolution :

> That it is expedient in order to enable the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company to construct a railway from the city of Winnipeg to some point off the Saskatchewan River, to enter into a contract with such company for the transport of men, supplies, materials and mails for twenty years, and to pay for such services during the said term eighty thousand dollars per annum, such payment to be computed from the date of the completion of the said railway.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DEWDNEY—The House will recollect that for the last two or three years the policy of the government has been to connect the two extensive arteries, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Saskatchewan River at different points in the Territories and Manitoba by branch lines of railways. Some two years ago, a resolution of an almost similar character to the one now before the House was presented. That was to grant a financial subsidy to a railway starting from Regina and running to Prince Albert, on the same terms as those presented to the House. Last year hon. gentlemen will recollect that an arrangement was also made by which we assured the construction from Calgary to Edmonton. With regard to the construction of those two roads, I am glad to be able to state that they are commencing to realize what they expected of them, and a large settlement has been going in to both the districts served by those two roads, and especially on the western route.

The conditions upon which we ask the assistance of this House and the terms on which we propose to give assistance to the company who propose carrying out the work are precisely the same as those given to previous companies, we propose that the company shall contract for the transport of men, materials, supplies and mails for twenty years from Winnipeg to a point on the Saskatchewan at $80,000 per annum to be paid on the construction of the railway from a point within the city of Winnipeg to a point on the Saskatchewan river, such payment to be computed from the completion of the railway to such last mentioned point. The subsidy will be made payable in half yearly payments and be assignable to trustees to secure the company's bonds on the whole or any part of the undertaking. The tariff rates will be the same as those agreed on for the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway Company, and remain undisturbed for six years. And in case the amount earned by the company between Winnipeg and the point on the Saskatchewan river should not amount to the sum paid by the government one-third of the land grant earned, will be kept to recoup the government. At the same time the government wish it to be distinctly understood that they are assisting this railway, not as the great Hudson Bay Railway, which we have heard so much about lately, but on its merits as a colonization road. It is also understood, that the company shall at no future time make any demand on the government for financial assi tance for the construction of the railway northward from the Saskatchewan river. The line originally located, and which has already been filed within the Department of Railways, commenced at the city of Winnipeg and ran along the eastern side of Lake Manitoba to the Saskatchewan river. It is now proposed to probably alter the direction of that road in order to accommodate the very large settlement which is going in to what is known as the Dauphin Lake district. For the last eighteen months settlers have been flocking into that country and constantly calling out for railway communication. I may state, for the information of hon. gentlemen, that the character of the country is excellent. I hold reports from different engineers who have been there, and who all express the opinion that it is one of the most valuable portions of our western country for settlement. There is no occasion for me to read extracts from these reports, but I hold them in my hand and will show them to any hon. member who wishes to look at them. When I brought this matter up first in the House the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said he would like to have some idea with regard to what surveys had been made and the estimated cost of construction. It is estimated that the road can be built, the whole of its length, equal to the Canadian Pacific Railway standard, and for the sum of $15,000 per mile. I might also state that a contract has already been let to the firm of Mann & Holt, who have constructed the roads from Regina to Prince Albert, and are also now building the road from Calgary to Edmonton. The contract has been let to those gentlemen for the sum of $11,000 per mile for the line proper, without the rolling stock. A land grant has been given for some years to this company to the extent of 6,400 acres per mile within the limits of Manitoba and 10,000 per mile from Manitoba to Hudson Bay—although we have nothing to do with the Hudson road proper beyond the limits of Manitoba and towards Hudson Bay. Now I believe that subsidy of $80,000 a year was subsequently divided, $40,000 upon completion of one half and $40,000 upon completion of the other half.

I just read that in order to show what the policy of the government was in regard to the railway in question, that it was changed from the idea of keeping alive this charter to the bay to the construction of a colonization road to the Saskatchewan, a road similar to the Regina and Prince Albert or the Calgary and Edmonton, and the same subsidies were given as were granted to those other roads. Hon. gentlemen will see what the policy of the government that had control of this legislation at the time was—that they wished to carry on the railway up to the Saskatchewan River, that they wanted to leave the question of going to the bay an open question for the present, and since then a charter has been given to another company to construct a line over the same ground. This company applied for a charter, as I understand, under the impression that the charter of the Hudson Bay road between the Saskatchewan River and the bay was defunct. It is not good legislation, in my opinion, to revive the question of the validity of the charter for that section between the bay and the Saskatchewan River by a side issue of this kind. It is quite in order for this company, when it has completed its road to the Saskatchewan River, to come to parliament and get legislation to construct to the bay, if they wish to do so, and if the government desire to help them it is quite in order for them to do so. Originally there was the Hudson Bay road, afterwards another charter was given to the Nelson Valley road, there was an amalgamation of these two roads and they became one, and now they are seeking amalgamation with the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company. There is a dubiousness about the legality of the charter being alive, and I would ask this honourable House to allow me, through my amendment, to confine the operation of that amalgamation to the portion of the line south of the Saskatchewan River, in the interests of the people of the west who are really anxious to see a railway built to the bay and made common property for any other railways that wish to connect with it; and also that it may be proceeded with upon lines that are laid down with the intention of completing it to the bay. I think I have shown you how the policy of the government changed, how the Acts show that it was the intention to keep the charter alive up to the Saskatchewan River only; how it was intended to assist it as a colonization railway and not as a railway to Hudson Bay, but to allow the road between Saskatchewan River and the bay to stand for future consideration. I am attacking no interest that is likely to be injured in the slightest degree by my amendment. I am quite willing that whatever advantages or virtues there may be in amalgamation up to the Saskatchewan River shall be attained by the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company. About the legality of the legislation before us, I think there is very grave doubt, at any rate sufficient doubt to enable a rival company to place the whole thing in litigation which might operate against the company reaching the Saskatchewan River under the amalgamation, and beyond as well. Whereas, if you confine the operation of the amalgamation to the section south of the Saskatchewan River, they would be able to go on under whatever arrangement the government may see fit to make with regard to subsidies. I hope that the House will see the points which I have made, which I was not able to formulate before the committee. But there is an additional reason, and an important one, why it is desirable that this amendment should carry. If by reason of this amalgamation this company should become possessed of this charter to the bay north of the Saskatchewan, and that it was revived by future legislation, a huge monopoly would be created, controlling both the avenues of outlet for our western produce, which, though designed to compete with one another in the interest of the public, cease to be competitive when they are both controlled by the same influence. Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, who control the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company, apply under this Act to amalgamate with the South-eastern and Rainy Lake route to Lake Superior, and at the same time to amalgamate with the route to the Hudson Bay. Now, it is not in the nature of things that they can act impartially towards the promotion of both of these undertakings, and considering influences that have always operated in opposition to the Hudson Bay route it may lead to a tie-up of this route for an indefinite period under those influences which we cannot ignore. The outlet to the bay is of more importance to the people of the west, the greater the distance they reside away from the lake route, and we should not allow legislation of this character which, though apparently harmless in itself, does not convey on its face the full purpose or meaning of the legislation. If this legislation goes through without this amendment it would in all probability block any other effort to open an independent avenue to Hudson Bay with freedom of train service for other railways over the line which the charter of the Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway Company forbids. To remove all doubts as to the powers still vested in this charter to go to the bay, which are open to litigation and a consequent tie-up of this important work, I ask your support for the insertion of this amendment which will leave a clear course for those who are in earnest to secure the opening of this new ocean route for the produce of our great western country.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The motion should be that the bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended in that way.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, I will put it that way.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not purpose occupying the time of the House at any length in speaking upon the object which my hon. friend from Marquette has in view. But I desire to point out to the House wherein the suggestion made by my hon. friend would be entirely inconsistent with the intention he evidently holds. I think every hon. gentleman in this House will accord to my hon. friend a very great degree of sincerity in desiring to have this road constructed. My hon. friend has always been a very strong advocate of the building of the Hudson Bay road.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And in this chamber and outside of it has always advocated that particular subject. My hon. friend will easily perceive this; that while he advocates the principle involved in this bill, namely, the amalgamation of those companies, yet he proposes by this amendment to destroy that part of the charter which would render this particular work a valuable one, namely, the construction of the road to the Hudson Bay; and thus leave the charter entirely helpless, so to speak, of any machinery by which the object could be carried out.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That was not the tone of my remarks.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend will freely admit that he has stated he approves of the amalgamation to the Saskatchewan River. Then my hon. friend contends that the Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway Company have now a charter to run from the Saskatchewan to the Hudson Bay.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is what I contend.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend be correct, that that charter has lapsed and has no virtue and no life in fact, then there can be no purpose in the amendment which my hon. friend has moved, because the power given to the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company to amalgamate with the Winnipeg and Great Nortern Company can certainly prove of no injury either to the public or the individuals dealing with it. I think my hon. friend will concede that fact. My hon. friend seems to be afraid that litigation will spring up by reason of the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company absorbing a right which he says is non-existent. Certainly, if the right is non-existent no litigation need be feared.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not contend that there will be any litigation if it is confined in the way I speak of, but that there is an opening for litigation if it is extended to the bay, and if it is opened to the bay it brings up the whole question.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then let us deal with that phase of it which I was directing the attention of the House to, namely, if the right has ceased certainly no injury can occur. If the right is existent, then my hon. friend at once thwarts the object which he so long has advocated—the building of a road from the Saskatchewan River to Hudson Bay.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There is another charter for it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend has referred to the question of litigation. He need exercise no apprehension or anxiety on the ground that litigation will be instituted by any persons against the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company in the event of their building from the Saskatchewan to the Hudson Bay, because there are no individuals who can institute litigation to prevent them building that road, except it be the government of Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Cannot an opposition charter?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is no opposition charter which has the exclusive right to build over that particular tract of country, and I apprehend the Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway Company would not build exactly over the route which parliament may have granted to any other company. Certainly, no line is so closely delineated, that any other existing charter could say that this very company had adopted the route which they would have the right in law to preclude others from traversing. My hon. friend knows very well that no plans or surveys have yet been made for the construction of that route: consequently so far as any other company instituting litigation against the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company is concerned, he need have no anxiety. If the right does exist—and the right must if there is to be litigation, because they can only quarrel over an existing right—then my hon. friend will at once perceive that he is handicapping an existing company, namely, the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company from building a railway, which he has strongly advocated in the past.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Not to the bay.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As to the ability of this company to build, my hon. friend will concede, without hesitation, that the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company, whose bill this is, is a company possessed of strong financial credit, and in fact I might say, and say it advisedly, the only company that can carry out this undertaking. This company has constructed 125 miles of road over the original route of the Hudson Bay Company's road. They practically have adopted the route which was adopted by the Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway Company, the route which was endorsed by parliament, and they have constructed to the satisfaction not only of the settlers in that district, but to the satisfaction of the Dominion and the provincial governments that particular section of the road. My hon. friend, as I have said, concedes the advisability of allowing this company to amalgamate with that part of the charter from the terminus of their present road to the Saskatchewan River. Hence my hon. friend will see that he approves of an important part of the undertaking. If that section of the road is to be carried out, then surely my hon. friend, if sincere, must consent to the more important part of the undertaking, viz., its construction to Hudson Bay. He should be one of the first to advocate most strongly that power be given to this company to amalgamate as is sought to build that section, from Saskatchewan River to Hudson Bay. That charter at present exists, according to the showing of my hon. friend, as it does not lapse, according to his showing, till the 31st December next.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Up to the Saskatchewan River, but not further.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I presume that no capital would be invested in the carrying out of a large undertaking of this kind without those who are placing their capital in the undertaking satisfying themselves thoroughly that they have the right to enter upon that undertaking and to expend the capital which must necessarily become absorbed in the building of that road. I might further point out to the House that it is a matter of public knowledge that the old company have a very large number of outstanding liabilities, and it is very desirable that the creditors of that road should be paid, and those liabilities liquidated.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There is ample to pay them out of the subsidies, the $80,000 a year and the 6,400 acres a mile on the Saskatchewan River section.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But the creditors in no way can exercise any right or any disposition over that subsidy.

Hon. Mr BOULTON—Yes, by the agreement in the Act. This Act provides that an agreement shall be made with those parties.

Hon. Mr LOUGHEED—But my hon. friend must recognize that except the undertaking be carried out in its entirety, as desired by this company, the promoters of this bill will not accept an inferior or partial franchise, and satisfy those creditors. They ask a very reasonable concession in the bill under discussion. As I say, the old company must become a party to this amalgamation: that is to say, the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company will not have the power to enter into this amalgamation without the consent of the Winnigeg and Great Northern Railway Company, and furthermore that agreement must receive the assent of the Governor in Council, and it does not become an agreement of amalgamation until the order of the Governor in Council approving of the amalgamation is made. I presume, therefore, that those companies will not enter into this arrangement, nor will the Governor in Council sanction the arrangement until due provision is made for the payment of any liabilities which exist against the old company. I think the question is so very reasonable and plain in the public interests that the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company should have the power to amalgamate with this company, and thus liquidate the debts and carry out its obligations, that there will be no hesitancy to pass the bill as it stands.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should like to ask this question of my hon. friend, who seems to be familiar with the subject—is the charter in existence now giving life to the Winnipeg and Great Northern?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I mean the part from the Saskatchewan to the Hudson Bay: has not that lapsed?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is not conceded that it has lapsed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think in passing a bill of this kind we ought to know the fact. If we are by a side wind reviving a charter—

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We are not in any way reviving a charter. There is not a word said in the bill about reviving a charter. There are no new rights given to any of these companies except the right to amalgamate. Although the right may have lapsed, which is not conceded, from the Saskatchewan to the Hudson Bay yet the corporation exists, the liabilities are there, they have to be paid I presume, and if there be any rights then the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company that purpose to pay off these liabilities, of course desire to avail themselves of any existing rights.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—The discussion which has taken place on the third reading of this bill would have been very appropriate at the second reading; it would have afforded us a great deal of information which we did not then possess. We would have been better able to look into the merits of the case than we have been up to the present time. It appears that the bill which is now before us refers to a matter for which a charter was granted some eighteen years ago, and the conditions of that charter have apparently not been fulfilled up to the present time. This, I think makes one fact plain to us, that we are granting a great many railway charters here to those who apply for them which we should not grant so readily. It is clear to my mind, and perhaps to the mind of some others, that there should be some restriction respecting the mode in which such railway charters are granted, those who apply for such charters as we know frequently do so merely for the purpose of holding them and preventing other persons from going on with the work, thereby retarding the advancement of the country. It would be a wise policy on the part of the government of Canada, to require that those who apply for railway charters should, in the first place, before those charters are granted, make a deposit with the government to guarantee that they will go on with the projects which they undertake.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—And give them a certain time within which to commence.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—Give them a certain time within which to commence the work; if they do not commence it within that time, then the money that would be required to be deposited would be forfeited by the government and the charter lapse. I believe it will be necessary for the government of Canada to take such a step as that within a very short time ; for we see the immense number of charters that have been applied for even during this present session, and there is no doubt at all that many of those works will not go on immediately or be completed within the time, and we will hereafter have applications for many years to come for the extension of the time for which they were originally granted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out that this road has been partially constructed.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—None of it is constructed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company have constructed 125 miles of the road.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Oh, yes, but this question refers to another road.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD(P.E.I.)—They want to amalgamate with another road that is not constructed at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—For the purpose of constructing it. They cannot do it without these corporate powers.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E I.)—It appears that even with the road they are now constructing the time has been extended some ten or fifteen times by various bills that were passed by this House, and that the time within which it was to be finished will expire at the end of the present season.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Don't you think it is time it should pass into the hands of some other company who would build it ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—The great question is whether the other company would build it any more rapidly than the one that has the contract now ; if they find that it is a money making undertaking I have no doubt they will.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If there is any litigation they will drop it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—And if it is a fact, as has just been stated by the hon. member for Shell River, that there is likely to be litigation, it is very likely they will not go on with it at all. From the discussion which has taken place, I feel disposed to vote against the bill entirely.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I do not think that anybody who knows anything about the parties who are now seeing the passage of this bill can question their competency and ability to carry out any undertaking which they take in hand, and if it is desirable that this road should ultimately be completed to Hudson Bay, I do not know of any corporation more likely to do it than those now seeking amalgamation by this bill. I have not been a very great believer in the Hudson Bay route myself, but I venture to say that if that road is to be built there is greater chance of its being built if this bill passes than there has ever been before. Then with regard to litigation and whether this right to build beyond the Saskatchewan has lapsed—I ought not, perhaps, to offer my opinion in the presence of so many lawyers—it seems to me that that is not touched at all by this bill. It leaves that untouched, and does not in any way complicate the question in that direction.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Who are the contractors, may I ask ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann are among the promoters.

Several Hon. MEMBERS—Question !

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Hon. gentlemen——

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think this discussion should be prolonged.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The hon. gentleman has no right to speak a second time on this amendment.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Question !

The SPEAKER put the amendment to the House.

Several Hon. MEMBERS—Lost ! Lost !

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Take the yeas and nays.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER—The yeas will please rise.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The members should be called in.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I withdraw the motion for the third reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is too late now to do that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If I withdraw the original motion——

Hon. Mr. MILLER—You cannot do it without the leave of the House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then I ask the leave of the House to withdraw the bill because it is useless if the amendment carries.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I would say to my hon. friend if this amendment is carried, as I believe it will be, there will be nothing to prevent my hon. friend then from asking the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw the bill, but the yeas and nays having been demanded I think he cannot stop the vote.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It is rather unfair that when there are so few in the House a request to call in the members should not be carried out.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is too late now to call in the members.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman can give notice to rescind.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Go on with the vote.

The House divided on the amendment, which was adopted on the following vote:

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With the consent of the House I will withdraw the third reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Put it off until another day.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman cannot bring in the bill again this session.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the amendment that has been made materially affects the bill. If I were in the hon. gentleman's place I should not be in a hurry.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—I am sure the hon. member could easily obtain from the House permission to put off the third reading a day or two, so that he will have time to consider the effect of this amendment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would ask the House to permit the third reading to stand until Monday.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman cannot do that. It is absolutely impossible to do that. The motion is made and you cannot withdraw it except by the unanimous consent of the House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then I ask for the consent of the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I object. The bill must go through as it is.

Several Hon. GENTLEMEN—Let the bill go through as it is.

The bill was read the third time as amended and passed.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. At any time between the first July, 1896, and this date has the Government, or the Prime Minister, or any member of the present Administration, or Mr. Charles Russell, of London, solicitor, at the request, or to the knowledge of, or by the authority of the Government, or the Prime Minister, or any member of the present Administration, directly or indirectly, solicited, asked or invited the intervention of the Holy See for the settlement of any question, and of what question ?
2. Has there ever been, for the said purpose, any voyage undertaken to Rome either by the Prime Minister, or by any member of the present administration, or by Mr. Charles Russell, or by any other person, at the request or to the knowledge or with the authorization of the Government, or Prime Minister, or any member of the present Administration ?
3. Has any one whatsoever, at the request or to the knowledge or with the implicit or explicit authorization of the Government, or of the Prime Minister, or of any member of the present Administration, made any overtures whatsoever to the ecclesiastical authorities at Rome to obtain from them any intervention whatsoever ?
4. What were these overtures ?
5. What is the nature of the intervention which was solicited ?
6. Has any one whatsoever at any time been authorized to ask, in the name of the Government, or of certain members of the Government, the nomination of an apostolic delegate with a permanent residence in Canada ?
7. When and by whom has any such demand been made, and for what objection was the nomination of the delegate asked ?
8. If any such demand has been made, is it the intention of the Government to follow it up ? And in what manner ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has catechized me very frequently on the subject and I have given him as full information as I think he is entitled to. I may say in general terms that the government of Canada have had no communication with the Holy See. The hon. gentleman is not entitled to cross-examine a minister on matters that are not of public concern.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My relations with the ecclesiastical authorities of my church are a matter purely with myself, with regard to which no member of this House has any right to make inquiries. It is laid down in Bourinot, at page 323 :

Questions may be put to ministers of the Crown relating to public affairs.

This is not a public affair.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What is not a public affair ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The relations that members of any denomination have with the ecclesiastics of their church.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—For the settlement of any question ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This is the settlement of a public question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman must be aware that the present government have settled the school question with Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They adopted the same channels to settle that question as the late government did. The late government sent delegates to Manitoba and had a conference and failed to come to any agreement. The present government had a conference with representatives of the government of Manitoba and they came to an agreement, which was confirmed by the Manitoba legislature, and that is the end of it, so far as the public are concerned. I may also, in further support of the stand I take, quote from Todd's Parliamentary Government in England :

As a rule the proper limit to questions is whether or not they can be made the subject of a motion on a public question.

Todd further says :

Numerous questions can be cited wherein ministers of the Crown and other members have declined to give any answer to questions which they considered to be unnecessary, inexpedient, unusual, impertinent--

The hon. gentleman can take any adjective he likes—or as involving a matter of too much gravity to be dealt with by way of reply to a question. Generally they state reasons for declining to afford information.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That part the hon. gentleman may apply to himself.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The relations between a member of any Christian body and the pastors of their church is not a matter of public concern.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That consideration is not involved in this question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman had read my question he would not have made the remarks he did.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have read the question and do not propose to give any other answer.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But I might discuss it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You are not entitled to discuss it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am entitled to an answer?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You can put a question, but you have no right to discuss it.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—If the minister makes any statement in replying to the question the hon. gentleman can discuss it

If the minister uses any argument the hon. gentleman has a right to discuss it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not advance any argument.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—You have stated that the present government have done what the late government could not do. It would be very easy for the hon. gentleman to give an answer to all the questions. If the minister did not act as a minister of the Crown, of course he did nothing, and that would be a respectful answer for the minister to give.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Under the rules, as a matter of etiquette, I am entitled to give the reasons why I do not propose to answer the questions further, and I have read the authority which authorized me to do that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a question of order. The hon. minister says he declines to answer this question because it affects religious interests. My question is so framed that it does not affect religious interests. I ask:

1. At any time between the 1st July, 1896, and this date has the Government, or the Prime Minister, or any member of the present Administration, or Mr. Charles Russell of London, solicitor, at the request, or to the knowledge of, or by the authority of the government, or the Prime Minister, or any member of the present Administration, directly or indirectly, solicited, asked or invited the intervention of the Holy See for the settlement of any question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have answered that: the government have had no communication with the Holy See, on any question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then I ask:

Has any one whatsoever at any time been authorized to ask, in the name of the government, or of certain members of the government, the nomination of an apostolic delegate with a permanent residence in Canada?

What is the answer I got to that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not propose to give the hon. gentleman any answer beyond what I have already given; that is all the hon. gentleman is entitled to—he is not really entitled to that, but I explain that the government of Canada have had no communication with the See of Rome on any question.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Has any minister?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I decline to go any further.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I ask this "Has any one in the name of the government been authorized"?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My answer covers that; the government have not either by themselves or by any other person, authorized any communication with the See of Rome—the former covers that completely.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day having been called:

Third Reading (Bill 31) "An Act to incorporate the Lake Bennett and Klondike Railway and Tramway Company," as amended.—(Hon. Mr. MacInnes.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED said: The promoters of this bill, in looking over it, concluded to ask for a short amendment by which they will be empowered to construct a wagon road over a very short distance of the route proposed in the bill. I am, therefore, going to ask the House to permit me to discharge the order of the day with a view to afterwards giving notice of amendment. I therefore move that the order of the day be discharged.

The motion was agreed to.

TRADE MARK AND DESIGN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (61) "An Act in further amendment of the Trade Mark and Design Act." He said: This bill, when it came up from the other Chamber, I assumed to be a government bill, whereas I was entirely mistaken. It was introduced at the instance of a private member of the other House, and I was not familiar with the object of the bill. It is evidently intended to give labour organizations the opportunity of taking out a trade mark and attaching it to goods that they themselves have been instrumental in making. It confers no exclusive privilege. In the original Act the definition of the word "person" applies to an incorporated company or any party, but it is believed that it is not wide enough to apply to a trade organization, and it is for that reason that labour organizations desire this legislation in order to have the same privileges as are extended to other persons. There is no exclusive privilege granted by it. They pay the same fee that other persons pay for taking out a trade mark in the Department of Agriculture. I believe the Minister of Justice was present when the labour organizations called on some ministers of the government with regard to it. I was not present, but he was, and I had hoped that he would be here to-day to state what they desire. Perhaps if the bill is allowed to take a stage to-day he will further explain it when it goes to committee. It simply gives to any labour organization the right to place a trade mark on goods that they manufacture, placing them on the same plane with individuals or companies, if I am rightly informed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State if any reasons have been advanced for this legislation? My hon. friend has simply stated the subject has been discussed, but he has not advanced any reason why this bill should be passed. There may be very good reasons, but I want to hear them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is asked for by the labour organizations. They simply ask permission to place a trade mark on any goods that they manufacture.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why is that desirable or necessary?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They feel that they are not on the same plane as individuals or companies. The words in section three of the Act refer to any person within the definition; the definition of the word "person" in the interpretation clause would include an individual or company, but it is considered that it would not include a labour organization, and the labour organizations desire to be placed on the same plane as a company or a person.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—May I ask if this gives the labourers belonging to an organization any pull over labourers not connected with a trades union?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should think not.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Will anybody be at liberty to buy goods without a trade mark on them?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think so.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This is a very important amendment. I do not quite understand whether trades unions are to take up the business of manufacturing themselves. I should think, from the remark of my hon. friend the Secretary of State, that trades unions, as such, conduct manufacturing businesses in this country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They may in some instances.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If so, they could register trade marks in their own name.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The language of the Act would not cover a trade union. They have no power now to have any trade mark of their own, simply because they are not covered by the language of the statute. In the Interpretation Act the word "person" includes any body corporate and politic. These trade unions are not incorporated, as a rule, I believe.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The policy of the Act, as it at present stands, is the recognition of the right of manufacturers, or those engaged in business on their own account, to the use of a trade mark. Are we to understand that the government approves of widening that policy so that trade unions, entirely irrespective of doing business on their own account, may have the right to use a trade mark by which to designate to the public the manufactured products of union establishments? I am not expressing an opinion as to whether it is desirable or not; I am asking, is that the government policy?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is unfortunate that this bill is in my hands. I was not advised about the bill, and it was a mistake on my part to take it up. As I understand, it applies only to trades unions which undertake a manufacture business.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This extends the clause to the cases I have mentioned, pretty clearly.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This bill goes a great deal further than my hon. friend appears to think it does. If I understand it right, it goes so far that trade union labourers or employees, may be enabled to place some mark on goods manufactured in an establishment in which they are employed. I think it really goes so far as to enable them to put a trade mark upon the products of any firm that employs members of a trade union. If I am right about that, and if the bill goes that far, it could be made the means of boycotting manufacturers who did not employ trade union hands.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It goes even beyond the case mentioned by my hon. friend. It extends, in my humble judgment, to a case where there may be a union of workmen, say in a dozen establishments, engaged in producing the manufactures of those dozen establishments. They may use a particular trade mark by which they may designate that that particular union of workmen are engaged in producing that article, so that it is not confined to the products of one establishment, but to the products of many.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps, with the consent of the House, further consideration of the bill might be postponed, and in the meantime I will send it to the Justice Department to get an opinion about it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I might be allowed to say a word or two with respect to this matter. I do not think the bill, in its present form, is the bill that it should be to carry out the purpose of the trades unions. I have some doubts whether the hon. Secretary of State is quite correct with respect to the meaning of the word "person" in the Act. I think the word "party" would, under the clause of the Interpretation Act, apply to such an association as a trades union. What the trades unions really wish is to provide that on goods which have been manufactured, no matter where, but manufactured by members of the trades unions, they shall be allowed to place some mark in addition to what is known as a trade mark. The bill, in its present form, is likely to lead to confusion, because this mark is not really a trade mark at all. It is a mark of another kind. I have no objection to the carrying out of the wish of the trades unions, but I do not think it should be carried out in this way. This bill would do more than effect the purpose of the members of the trades unions, and I think some other language should be used in the bill than is actually employed. I trust that when the matter is brought to the notice of the Department of Justice they will see proper to modify the language so that it will express the intention of the promoters of the bill and will not lead to confusion, as it will, I think, if the bill is passed in its present shape.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed till Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Bill (68) "An Act respecting the Montfort Colonization Railway Company, and to change its name to the Montfort and Gatineau Colonization Railway Company"—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

VANCOUVER, VICTORIA AND EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

The Order of the Day being called,—

Second Reading (Bill 64) "An Act respecting the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company"—(Hon. Mr. Power.)

Hon. Mr. POWER said:—When this bill was read the first time, I gave notice of the second reading in order to expedite its passage, but I have not been asked to take charge of the bill. It seems to me that gentlemen in the other House should ask some senator to take charge of any bill that comes to this House, and I do not care to assume the responsibility of taking charge of it. There are gentlemen from the province of British Columbia in the House, and if they think this is a desirable measure one of them may move the second reading.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think the hon. gentleman had better move the second reading. I know nothing about the bill, and was not asked to take charge of it. It will simply go to the Committee on Railways Telegraphs and Harbours.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me that it would be much better if they would act on the suggestion I made last session, and the session before, that when bills come from the other House and no intimation is given of their character and no one in the Senate asked to take charge of them, they should be allowed to drop. If the parties interested are not courteous enough to let some senator know that they want the bill passed through the House, I do not see that we should be continually assuming a responsibility the effect of which we know nothing. We have had an exhibition of this to-day when a most important bill was brought before us by the hon. Secretary of State, he frankly telling us that he knows nothing about it or the objects which the promoters have in view in trying to place it on the statute book. I do not desire either to dictate or intimate the course which the hon. gentleman ought to pursue, but had I been in his position I should at once have moved that it be discharged, so far as my name was concerned, and let the parties interested try to get the support of some other senator. If the members of this House would adopt that course in the future, I think the Senate would command the respect of the members of the Lower House and add to its own dignity.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I will move the second reading of this bill, though I have not been asked to do so. I cannot say that I am informed as to all the provisions of the bill, but I know in a general way that it is a bill for the purpose of declaring that this railway, which is a provincial enterprise under a charter from the government of British Columbia for the construction of a road from the coast to the boundary of the country and has a provincial subsidy, is a railway for the general benefit of Canada, and also provides that the road may be leased to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It passed through the Commons, and I think there was no objection to it there.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

CANADA ATLANTIC RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (93) "An Act respecting the Canada Atlantic Railway Company." He said:—By this bill the Canada Atlantic Railway Company ask to extend their road to the boundary line, and also to extend it to a point in the city of Montreal. This railway has done a great deal of business in this country and has been a very successful undertaking, and the bill should commend itself to the approval of every senator.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

LAKE BENNETT AND KLONDIKE RAILWAY AND TRAMWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES moved the third reading of Bill (31) "An Act to incorporate the Lake Bennett and Klondike Railway and Tramway Company."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved in amendment:

That the said bill be not now read a third time but that it be amended as follows:—

Page 1, line 25.—By adding "and also may construct, maintain and operate a wagon road sixteen feet wide, to run on either side of Miles Cañon and White Horse Rapids."

He said: I gave notice yesterday that I would move this amendment to clause four of this bill. As hon. gentlemen are aware, power was given to this company to construct a tramway subject to certain rights vested in two other companies to construct a portion of a tramway over the same route. The right given to the company in question is subsidiary to the right of the other two; and in the event of the other two companies not proceeding with the building of their tramway, it is proposed that this company, in the meantime, shall have the right to construct a wagon road so as to perfect their communication in that country. I understand, from two or three hon. gentlemen who have been interested in the promotion of the two other companies to which I allude, that they desire a reference to the Railway Committee so that they can discuss the advisability of giving to this company the power to construct a wagon road. I must confess that it seems to me a trivial objection. I cannot see why, in the public interests, this company should not have the power to build a wagon road. It seems to me to in no way conflict with the powers given to the two other companies to build a tramway; and I presume if this amendment were not made, this company would exercise the right which any company might exercise, without interference, and build a wagon road, which is only a very short one, some four or five miles I understand, entirely regardless of the fact that they have not corporate power to do it. I apprehend that individuals could not restrain them from building this wagon road over the public domain, and I fancy the Crown, in the public interest, would not consider it advisable to intervene to prevent the construction of such a road. I, however, move that the bill be amended; and if hon. gentlemen think it advisable the bill should go back to the committee, it can be sent there.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend drop his amendment?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I hope my hon. friend will not persevere in that amendment now. There is evidently some misunderstanding about this bill. When the other two bills were before the Railway Committee it seemed to be clearly understood that the clauses enabling them to build these tramways were so worded that if they did not build within a short time the powers granted them should be null and void. It was also understood that this company, which is now asking for incorporation, would not exercise any power of that kind till these two companies had failed, and an order was made by the Governor in Council to allow them to build this road. A wagon road is not a railway, but my hon. friend will admit that if in this bill they have power to build a wagon road sixteen feet wide, it may interfere very materially with the other two companies, and I think on the whole that it would be keeping better faith if the bill were referred back to the Railway Committee for further consideration.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I hope my hon. friend will not persist in his proposed amendment unless he goes further and amends his bill in the next section. I understand that an agreement was come to in the House of Commons between the promoters of this bill and the promoters of the others to which the hon. senator (Mr. Allan) has just alluded, that this charter was to be subject to delay unless the other companies fail to construct a tramway under their corporate powers. Now my hon. friend proposes practically to set aside that understanding by proposing the construction of a wagon road, which will be outside of the understanding and outside of the condition in which this bill was passed. If my hon. friend adds the amendment which he proposes to the fourth section, he should also add the words "or a wagon road" to subsection two of the fourth section after the words "the authority conferred on the company to construct a railway or tramway." Then he would build this road under the restrictions in the bill, and I apprehend that my hon. friend, the senator from Toronto, would not object if it were done, but certainly it would be a violation of the understanding arrived at if my hon. friend should propose to construct a wagon road which should not be subject to the restrictions. It seems to me, that unless my hon. friend is prepared to add after the word tramway the words "or a wagon road," the amendment ought not to be persisted in.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I hope my hon. friend will withdraw his amendment. I know he would not give consent to a breach of faith in a matter of this kind. This company gets its charter on condition that it shall not interfere with two other charters given; and now they propose, at this stage, to introduce this new feature. I hope he will withdraw his amendment and not countenance a breach of faith. If he persists in it, I shall ask him to send the bill back to the Railway Committee in order that the matter may be discussed and the bill amended to suit both parties.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I must certainly take exception to the statement that this is a breach of faith. I understand the facts leading up to the restriction placed on this company, namely, the Lake Bennett and Klondike Railway and Tramway Company, from proceeding with the construction under their charter, was due to the fact that contemporaneously with the passage of this bill in the Commons, two other companies received power to construct this tramway along the Miles Cañon and White Horse Rapids, and that the Minister of Railways suggested to Sir Hibbert Tupper, who was then in charge of the bill, that he should take his bill subject to the rights of the other parties, to which he consented, so far as the building of the tramway is concerned. Now, a certain length of time is given to the promoters of the other two bills to construct that tramway—I understand two years.

Hon. Mr. POWER—One year to begin.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—One year to begin. In the meantime, as hon. gentlemen will easily perceive, the public are inconvenienced by waiting that one year to ascertain whether these companies are going to exercise the rights which have been conferred on them by their bill. In the meantime this company, for the purpose of perfecting or building their links of communication, propose building a wagon road, not in any sense, I submit, as a breach of the agreement which had been entered into by the Commons because the right still exists in all its entirety with the other two corporations.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend proposes to accomplish the same object in another way, which is certainly a breach of faith.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Building a wagon road and building a tramway I understand are two entirely different enterprises. The wagon road is simply for the purpose of assisting communication in the meantime. If these companies proceed with their enterprise the wagon road, I apprehend, will fall into disuse. But I do not think the promoters of this bill have the slightest intention of violating any agreement with the other company. However, if it be the sense of the House that this should go to the Railway Committee there is no alternative but to consent.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. gentleman will see that this is substantially a breach of the agreement which was entered into with respect to these undertakings, because if this company constructed a wagon road sixteen feet in width it would be very likely to have the effect of hindering the other companies constructing the tramway. The inducement to build the tramway, the profit to be derived from it, will be very much diminished by the building of this wagon road. There is another feature in connection with this bill, that the original purpose of this company was not to build a tramway, or a wagon road either, at White Horse Canon, but to build a tramway from a point on Marsh Lake to a point on Hootalinqua River. That undertaking would not have interfered with the undertaking of the other two companies. I presume there is no objection of the bill going back to committee, where the merits of the proposed amendment may be considered, but I think the House should not, at the present time, at any rate, pass the amendment. I move, in amendment to the motion of the hon. gentleman, that the amendment be not now adopted, but that the bill be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours for further consideration.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I consent to that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no objection in referring this back to committee for further consideration if the House has made up its mind not to permit the amendment to be adopted, then it seems to me that the better way would be not to adopt the amendment. It is better to reject the amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the simplest way to treat it, we would be able to discuss this matter more fully before the Railway Committee, and the referring it could do no harm.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As I understand it, the necessary notice was not given for this bill, and it obtained a standing or foothold before parliament only by agreeing to certain limitations. Those limitations were accepted, and the bill was proceeded with upon that ground. Now, after the foothold has been obtained by waiving the irregularity of failure of the company to comply with the rules of parliament as to the notice, my hon. friend proposes to make it a rival institution to the two others that had practically precedence in the intentions of the House of Commons and, as I understand it, so far as the intention of this House is concerned. This is a bill which creates a corporation to construct a public work for purposes of profit, and my hon. friend is going a long way in pressing these amendments upon the attention of parliament in the face of these facts.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I must again repeat that my hon. friend is not justified in taking the position that there is any breach of faith. The intelligence of the House will be sufficient to draw a distinction between building a wagon road at the present time for the convenience of the public and waiting a year for those two companies to determine whether to proceed to build a road. If my hon. friend is willing that this should be discussed before the Railway Committee it can be done, but my hon. friend will not force the House to the conclusion that it is determined upon rejecting the proposed amendment, which is very reasonable and in the public interest, and which could only subserve the opening up of that country; and if my hon. friend takes the position that the sense of this House is to be tested, I am willing to accept the challenge. If my hon. friend from Halifax will withdraw his amendment I am ready to take the sense of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the hon. Minister of Justice intends pressing his suggestion, and I hope that my amendment that this amendment be not now concurred in but that the bill be referred back to committee for further consideration will be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

WINDSOR AND DETROIT UNION BRIDGE COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (79) "An Act to incorporate the Windsor and Detroit Union Bridge Company."

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—This is an important matter and I think we should have some explanation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a bill for the purpose of enabling the Grand Trunk Railway Company and other railway companies in the United States, who now use the ferries at that point, to construct what is termed a high level bridge. The proposition in the bill is to erect a bridge in place of the tunnel, which was proposed some years ago, and also in lieu of a railway bridge which the companies obtained power to build from the parliament of Canada ; and, I am informed, the Congress of the United States, and which was what was termed a low level bridge—a draw bridge. It has been decided, particularly by the shipping community, and I think very properly so, that in a river as narrow as the Detroit is at that point, and with the volume of trade that is continually flowing from the west to the east, anything like a draw bridge would be an inconvenience which should not be tolerated by either governments, and the proposition in this bill, as originally introduced, was to erect a bridge 140 feet above the high water mark, but upon consultation with the authorities of the Grand Trunk Railway and others who are interested in the construction of this bridge in the United States, the clause was amended by substituting a provision that no bridge should be built until it had received the sanction of the Governor in Council in Canada, and of the Minister of War in the United States. I am informed that the Minister of War is the party in the United States to whom matters of this kind are referred, and not, as in this country, to the officer who is more immediately connected with the navigation. It will be remembered by this House that a number of years ago authority was given for the construction of a tunnel. I am informed that in the attempt to construct that work it was found that under the surface the whole soil was so full of gas and other explosive matters that it was altogether impracticable. This difficulty was not encountered when the Grand Trunk Railway constructed the tunnel at Sarnia. For the reasons which I have given, the companies have abondoned this scheme, and now the proposition is for the different railway companies to construct a bridge sufficiently high to enable the commerce of the country to be carried on without being impeded in any way unless it be from the construction of two piers. It is for the House and government to say whether two piers would be too many in that river. That I believe was fully considered by the Railway Committee of the House of Commons when they passed the bill in its present shape. Those who are interested in the navigation of that river, particularly the hon. gentleman from Monck and the hon. gentleman from Windsor, will see at once that if that river is ever to be bridged, the scheme which is now propounded is decidedly better than a low level bridge with draws, or a tunnel. That, I believe, is the whole object of the bill. It is provided that they must commence work within two years after the approval of the plans by the Governor in Council in Canada, and also by the Minister of War in the United States ; and a further provision so as not to give them the power in perpetuity, as many of these bills have done in the past, provides that it must be commenced within three years and completed within seven.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—When I asked the hon. gentleman to explain I did not intend to convey the idea that I was opposed to the bill, but it is desirable to know what the object of the bill is. Several bills have been passed to construct bridges across the Niagara River, but none of them gives permission to build a low bridge. Of course, it depends a good deal on the span whether it will be an impediment to navigation. We can ascertain that in committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is to be 1,000 feet, I think.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is a very good span. I do not object to the bill at all and I would say further, that this country should not have quite as much objection to it now as formerly. If that projected canal to the Rondeau is built, of course it gives another avenue. The navigation will go through that way and cut off Detroit and Windsor altogether, and that work will be constructed some day There is no doubt about that, because it will shorten the distance and the work can be done cheaply. Even if I had some objection to this high level bridge, I would not be as much opposed to it as I was formerly. It depends a good deal on the height of the bridge and the span whether the committee will pass it or not.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Will not the Georgian Bay Canal cut it out ?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—As far as the Georgian Bay Canal is concerned they will be forty years in the wilderness before it is completed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have no doubt a low lever bridge would be an impossibility over the Detroit River. If I remember rightly it has been estimated that a vessel passes every three minutes, twenty ships an hour, and that would necessitate keeping the draw open constantly. It would be a bridge that could not be used. There are two clauses to which I would like to call the attention of my hon. friend. One is clause 9 :

The right to alter, appeal or amend this Act is hereby reserved.

I suppose the object of that is to prevent any bridge company setting up the contention that the company have a contract with the government or with parliament for the construction of this bridge. Nothing is stated in the clause with regard to any compensation in case the Act is repealed or amended—whether the repeal of the Act is intended to be provided for after the bridge is constructed as well as prior to the construction of the bridge. I do not see anything in the bill that throws any light upon that subject. I am simply calling the attention of my hon. friend who has charge of this bill to this point, so that it can be considered when the bill goes to committee. Then I would call his attention to clause 31, which provides :

If any person shall force or attempt to force any gate or guard of the said bridge, or the approaches thereto, or if any person shall wilfully do or cause to be done any act or acts whatsoever, whereby the said bridge, its lights, stationary works, machinery fixtures, or other appurtenances thereto shall be obstructed, impaired, weakened, destroyed or injured, the person so offending shall forfeit to the company treble the damages sustained by means of such offence or injury, to be recovered in the name of the company with costs of the suit, by any proper action for that purpose, and such person shall also be guilty of a misdemeanour, and be punishable by fine or imprisonment or both, by any court of competent jurisdiction.

What I wish to call attention to is that it is questionable whether we should insert a provision of the criminal law into a private Act, and, in the next place, the offence here is declared to be a misdemeanour which embraced one class of crimes formerly, but under the Criminal Code has been abolished. We no longer make any distinction between felonies and misdemeanours, and that clause has been inserted through an oversight. Then it seems to me if my hon. friend will look at section 499 of the Criminal Code he will find that such an offence as is here spoken of is already provided for. It may be necessary to declare that this is an offence, although I am under the apprehension that it would be reached by that section of the Criminal Code.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for calling my attention to these clauses. I may state frankly that this was only placed in my hands the other day, and I just had time to look over it for a few moments. Speaking of the ninth clause, hon. gentlemen will see in looking at the eighth clause that it provides for certain concessions under certain conditions—that it must receive the sanction of the Governor in Council in Canada, and also the Minister of War of the United States, and then the right to alter, amend or repeal this Act is hereby expressly reserved. I do not know that I can give the legal interpretation of that, but it says :

To require any change in the said structure or the entire removal at the expense of the company whenever the said minister will deem it in the public interest to do so.

I will call the attention of the gentlemen interested in this bill to these clauses. The only point with the railway companies interested in this clause would be simply as to whether these acts which are spoken of in the clause should not be made offences. If the commission of the acts referred to is provided for in the 499th section of the Criminal Code, then it would be surplusage and unnecessary. If it is not provided for, then it will be for the Minister of Justice to assist us in drafting a proper clause which will make them punishable. He will readily concede that interference with the property of the company in any way might endanger life and that there should be some means of punishing the offender.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the committee come to the conclusion this section is necessary, then it would be sufficient to say that this offence here spoken of, shall be an offence against section 499 of the Criminal Code.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Before the House adjourns, I should like to ask the hon. leader of the House if he has had time to inquire about the return I asked for by motion on the 31st March last. I have already called attention to it, and I would be obliged if the government could furnish those returns this week.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will inquire and endeavour to meet my hon. friend's views with just as much expedition as possible.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—While we are on the same subject, will the hon. gentleman inquire also, if I could get the returns I asked for in July last?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Of last year?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, if there is no prescription for the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend's question is a matter of ancient history. I shall make inquiry after looking up the record to ascertain what my hon. friend asks for.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—To shorten the inquiry, I may say that it is on the subject of dismissals. Last session I made a motion to have the papers laid on the table, and it was agreed to. It was those dismissals in which a friend of the government was deeply interested—Mr. Choquette, M.P.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As we are dealing in ancient history, I should like to call attention to the fact that a full return of the motion I made at the beginning of last session has not been presented yet. The second edition was presented to the House a little while ago by the Secretary of State. When may we expect the third return?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is only one return not furnished—that is from the Railway Department. I will speak to the minister about it. I think that is the only department in default.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to get it in time to have it printed before the House adjourns, so as to let the whole country know the facts.

The Senate adjourned.

PROSECUTIONS FOR BALLOT STUFFING IN MANITOBA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE inquired of the government:

Whether the prosecutions entered against Parker, Dennison, Roberts, James Walker, McFadden, Herriman, Brown, Mawhinney, McDonald, Orr, Brooks, Finklestein, Clark, Renwick, Anderson, H. E. Walker, Saunders and Hamilton for alleged ballot stuffing in Manitoba at the last general elections were commenced at the instance of the Dominion government, and if so, whether the expenses attending the same have been or are to be paid by the Dominion government?

He said: In order to explain my question, it is necessary that I should put the House in possession of certain facts. Last Friday, when I asked my question as to whether it was the intention of the government to provide, in the supplementary estimates or otherwise, a sum in addition to the $2,500 contained in the main estimates for carrying on the Tidal current survey in Canadian waters a subject of great interest—not to Canada alone, but the whole world and which was suffering for the want of funds to carry it on properly, I was proceeding to show that whilst the government could withhold the assistance that was necessary in this regard, and which was so much required, they could, in the cases which I was about to cite, spend the people's sheckles with a lavish hand, when I was called to order by the hon. senior member for Halifax.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order, I am sorry I have to trouble the hon. gentleman again. He is out of order in referring to a past debate.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Then I will have to let the circumstances, as they occurred, be impressed on the memory of those hon. gentlemen who were present at that time, and the others who were not present can acquaint themselves with the circumstances when the debates are published. I was then going to cite what I shall now cite in consonance with the terms of my question to-day. I said I had in my hand a document received from a very prominent counsel in Manitoba, and was going on to read it when I was called to order. This refers to prosecutions in alleged ballot stuffing cases in Manitoba. I was called to order on the ground that the providing for the cost of this matter came under the cognizance of the provincial and not of the federal government. My hon. friend the senior member for Halifax, has called me to order several times, and I appeal to the judgment of this House if it is not the fact that that hon. gentleman, more perhaps than any other hon. member of this House is guilty of breaches of the rules of the House and yet constitutes himself general censor in this particular for his colleagues. This document reads:

RE MANITOBA CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS FOR ALLEGED BALLOT STUFFING.

Informations were laid against eighteen men, nearly all of them representative men in their districts.

1. Parker, Dennison, Roberts, James Waller, McFadden, Herriman and Brown—7.

In these cases the magistrates refused to commit for trial. Brown was detained in jail for thirty-six hours until he had furnished bail for $6,000.

2. Mawhinney, McDonald. Orr, Brooks, Finkelstein, Clark, Renwick, Anderson, H. E. Waller, Saunders and Hamilton—11.

In these cases the magistrates committed the accused for trial. The grand jury found no bill in the case of H. E. Waller and true bills in the other cases mentioned in clause 2. Notwithstanding that true bills were found the Crown dropped proceedings against McDonald, Hamilton, Brooks, Finkelstein, Renwick and Orr.

In the following cases the Crown pressed for convictions:—Mawhinney, Clark, Anderson and Saunders.

In Mawhinney's case, the verdict was not guilty. When this man was arrested he was put in jail and kept there for thirty-six hours, being fed on bread and water.

In the case against Clark, the jury disagreed.

In Anderson's case the jury disagreed when he was immediately tried before a second jury, who also disagreed; he was then bound over for trial at the next criminal assizes, for which, I believe, there is no precedent in Canada, and when the application was made the Crown counsel was only able to cite one precedent in England. At the opening of the next assizes the Crown announced they did not intend to proceed against Anderson.

The only case in which the Crown obtained a conviction was against Saunders. The charge against this man was that when a voter gave him a ballot marked for Rutherford he had substituted one marked for Boyd, which he put into the ballot box, putting the unused Rutherford ballots into his pockets. He gave evidence on his own behalf when he denied that he had tampered in any way with the ballots, but he at the same time admitted that after the election was over he had torn three unused ballots from the book which he had marked for Rutherford and given to the informer Freeborn for the purpose of extorting $800 from the Conservatives under agreement with Freeborn to divide the amount between them. It was proved in evidence that Freeborn had offered to sell these three ballots to the Conservative committee for $800. It was upon this evidence that the jury found him guilty, doubtless feeling that upon his own admission of a conspiracy to extort money from the Conservative party he should be made to suffer.

It is a significant fact that Rutherford, the present M.P. for Macdonald was his bail, and in February last he was appointed by the Greenway government a commissioner for taking affidavits, although his appointment was subsequently cancelled.

I wish to show this honourable House the amount of money that was uselessly spent—absolutely worse than uselessly spent—on these matters. You see, they did not get one single conviction. The closure was attempted to be practised on me on Friday last, to prevent, I suppose, the bringing forward of this matter; and as I have said to you already, I was told that it was entirely within the purview of the provincial government. Now, I felt all the while that I was standing on safe ground in bringing this matter to the consideration of the House, although I had not then the proof at hand, but I have since taken the trouble to inform myself more definitely upon the subject, and I now submit to the House a letter which will be found in the records of the Public Accounts Committee, as will also be found all the accounts and vouchers connected with the proceedings coming under this heading. The letter is addressed to His Excellency the Governor General in Council, and is dated June 30, 1897, and reads as follows:—

June 30, 1897.

To His Excellency the Governor General in Council:

The undersigned recommends that in connection with the recent prosecutions for election frauds in Manitoba, an advance of $6,964.41 be made to the Hon. the Minister of the Interior, to enable him to make advances on account of the several agents, pending the taxation of their bills, which amount in the aggregate to a very much larger amount, such amount to be charged to the vote for Miscellaneous Justice, and to be accounted for.

O. MOWAT.

The solicitor's fees, as certified by the Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. Newcombe, were cut down from $10,325.57 to $5,760.07; and when we add the disbursements in connection with the different matters that are connected with this, which come to $7,146.33, it will make a total of $12,906.40 an amount about equal to the amount that was in the past appropriated for the prosecution of the work for which I pleaded on Friday last, and for which I plead now, namely, the efficient maintenance of the tidal current survey in our Canadian waters, so as to facilitate the safe approach of vessels with their commerce to our Dominion. I say that the amount spent here by the government, in the way I have stated, was, at any rate, as large as that which, in previous years, enabled this survey to be carried on, although not so efficiently as it would have been carried on with a larger appropriation. Now if I am not out of order in referring to a past debate, I would remind the House that the hon. the senior member for Halifax with his usual blandness and courtesy of speech and manner, stated that I had been under several misapprehensions—I leave it to the judgment of the House as to who stands today under a misapprehension. It is scarcely necessary for me to put my question after the information which I have laid before the House, and which I consider to be incontrovertible, but I will make the inquiry and await the reply.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend, in putting his question, gives the information which he professes to wish.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—That is what I said before resuming my seat.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is not seeking information at my hands, but is seeking an opportunity to make an attack on the administration of justice by my predecessor in office. My hon. friend professed to read a letter from Sir Oliver Mowat stating that the expenses incurred had been paid. In my opinion that was a proper payment. My hon. friend says that the jury disagreed and that in some cases there were two prosecutions and still a disagreement. That, I think, is a very unfortunate state of things, and where men undertake to stuff the ballot boxes on which the liberties of the people depend, on which their fair representation in the other branch of this parliament depends, and after those facts are established, any section of the community who may be called on to serve as jurymen, say upon indubitable evidence that the parties are not guilty, I say they commit a serious offence, morally at all events, against the public interest and that is a matter to be deprecated. In regard to both these matters, I think this House ought to deprecate the facts that have been disclosed in the statements made to the House by my hon. friend. In the first place, there is a very serious wrong done in attempting to prevent a general election from resulting in a proper expression of public opinion, and in undertaking to defraud the electors of the representations which they possess in the House of Commons. When that fact becomes known, I think it is equally to be lamented that any section of the community should be disposed to defend a transaction of that sort. If there ought to be purity associated with the constitution of parliament, or with the discharge of any public function, it ought to be with respect to an election, and yet I know—I am speaking from my own personal knowledge when I say—that the attempt at ballot stuffing was not alone in the province of Manitoba, but that it extended to other portions of the Dominion, and if that practice were in any very considerable degree to continue to prevail it would render it absolutely necessary that all the elections should be open elections instead of elections by ballot, because the public will have no assurance that the parties for whom they voted and whom they undertook to return to parliament would come here as their representatives, but those whom they intended to reject, and whom, so far as their votes were concerned, they did reject, would nevertheless sit in parliament as their representatives. I do not know from the speech addressed to this House whether the hon. gentleman thinks that no prosecutions ought to take place in a matter of this sort. I cannot say whether that is his deliberate opinion or not, but certainly the drift of his speech was in that direction.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I say that great care should be exercised, in the first place, before taking proceedings, to see that there is some chance of conviction in those cases. Here were eighteen persons proceeded against and not one of them was convicted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was not the fault of the department. If a jury, or a portion of them, will say that parties are not guilty, when the evidence shows that they have been guilty, it is a great misfortune and shows that political feeling in the community has become so strong as to overshadow the sense of right in that community. I have no hesitation in saying that I think, when my hon. predecessor in office recommended the payment of these charges, he adopted a proper course. Ordinarily the administration of justice belongs to a province; ordinarily it is the duty of the province to see to the administration of criminal justice, but this is not a matter belonging to the ordinary duties of the local government or legislature, any more than the trial of controverted Dominion elections. It is a matter which concerns the constitution of this parliament, a matter which is peculiar to that constitution.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Did not the provincial government take the initiative?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think the initiative was taken here. My impression is that the papers were moved for in the other House and have been brought down, and my hon. friend will see, by examining the papers, that the initiative was taken here, and properly taken here, because it is a matter which specially concerns the constitution of this parliament and not the general administration of justice affecting the community at large.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am sure that every hon. gentleman in this House will fully agree with my hon. friend, the leader of the Senate, in the language which he uses in condemnation of such a practice as ballot stuffing in connection with the elections held in this country. While we all agree with him that this is a practice that ought to be condemned and very severely punished, yet I think it is proper that we should look very carefully into such a matter as this to find whether party objects are not being advanced under cover of prosecuting offenders against the law of the Dominion, and against a great moral principle. We must remember that most ample provision is made by law in this country by which a candidate who is defeated in election, or any elector can petition against the election. Ballot stuffing would be a cause for voiding an election if it were proved, and if this is not so our laws must be very faulty indeed. If that is so, why not allow the candidates or electors to prosecute their cases by petition and have the matters ventilated in court? No doubt my hon. friend will say that perhaps the charges in a bill of particulars might not reach some of these cases in such a way that they could be properly unearthed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It has nothing to do with them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is very likely that would be the case, but if the judges, on investigation, found that extensive corruption prevailed they could by their report recommend that a general inquiry should be held into the conduct of the election and of the extent to which bribery or corruption was carried on in any particular constituency, and under that provision an inquiry might then be held which would reach the case. I think the machinery provided by the law is sufficient, without the Minister of Justice being asked to intervene, as has been done in this case, and the authority of the Minister of Justice given for the purpose of facilitating or prosecuting an investigation of this kind. Great care should be taken by the Department of Justice not to lend itself to any such prosecution as this, because as soon as it does so in one case it will be invited to do the same in others, and there are some of us, at all events, who would have our doubts, notwithstanding the very great respect we have for the Minister of Justice and his very eminent predecessor, as to whether these gentlemen might not be moved a little easier to facilitate an investigation of this kind when men of their own political party were soliciting such interference. It gives to the Department of Justice a power to be employed in the interests of one political party in this country, and we believe that the Department of Justice would hesitate a long time should their interference be invoked by members of the Conservative party who might want to move the department in a matter of this kind and they would be a very long time at work before they would get the hon. gentleman to interfere for the purpose of facilitating or starting prosecutions against Liberals who may have been accused of ballot stuffing. On the whole, I think my hon. friend from Pictou has done a distinct service in bringing this question before the House. I do not know the particular history of this case very well. I have read about it in the newspapers. There are gentlemen in the House who know more about it than I do, but I think that the circumstances should have been very serious indeed and the ordinary laws provided for the investigation of election frauds must have been shown to have been utterly inadequate to meet the case before the Department of Justice should have interfered.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is not an election trial; this is a criminal prosecution.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Nobody desires more than myself to have the purity of elections kept up to a high standard, but in this case those of us who are residents of Manitoba are perfectly aware of the general feeling in regard to this matter, that it was not in any case a prosecution for the purpose of trying to enforce the purity of elections, but of persecution as regards political opponents. The way in which this persecution was instigated was this : a man named Freeborn, who was very well known in some circles in Ontario, came up to Manitoba and offered his services to the Conservative party. He attached to them such a very large sum of money that he was ignominiously refused. His services were scouted and he was unable to make any money by joining in with the Conservative party. But this gentleman was not coming away from Manitoba without having knocked down his expenses out of somebody, and his services were accordingly offered to and retained by the Liberal party. The government put this machinery in force. At the trials they had not a single witness in support of the prosecutions except Freeborn. When he was placed in the witness box he was cross-examined, and the evidence all went to show that he came up there and offered himself for sale, first to one party and afterwards to the other, and his character was shown up in such a style that there was not one of the juries before whom these men were tried that would convict a prisoner that was brought before them. It has been stated here that, in most of the cases, the juries disagreed. That is not so. My recollection is that in thirteen out of the eighteen cases the parties were acquitted, and acquitted after a great deal of expense had been incurred. They were, first of all, brought before the magistrates. They were not even tried before the local magistrates, because it was thought there would be sympathy with them, and the government would not allow them to be tried by local judges. They were taken some hundreds of miles from where the offence occurred, and tried, principally, before the police magistrate of Brandon, who is said to be—and I say it without fear of contradiction—one of the most bitter partisans in that country ; and in every instance, no matter what the evidence was, he committed them for trial.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The grand jury found true bills.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—These men were committed for trial and if they could not get a conviction in one place the venue was changed to another, and it was changed from time to time. These people were taken hundreds of miles until their cases could be sent up for trial. When this magistrate was not prepared to try it another outside magistrate tried it. In some cases there were no true bills found, and when they were tried, as I said before, Freeborn's evidence was the only evidence given and on cross-examination he broke down entirely. The result was thirteen were acquitted, and in the remainder of the instances, with the exception of one, where a man was convicted upon his own testimony, the jury disagreed. Even then the government were not satisfied but in most of these cases ordered a new trial, and these men were brought up again and were obliged to retain counsel and obliged to attend at these different trials; so that when you see a fee here of nearly $6,000 paid the Crown prosecutors, and the witness fees, you can imagine the loss and expense to those men—the loss of character and loss of time and money, the government pressing them all this time and hunting them down as if they were criminals, and at the present time some of the prosecutions are still hanging over them and the Crown will not proceed. I was not aware that this matter was coming up to-day : but I cannot allow the facts to be distorted, as they have been to-day, the minister putting it forward as if these parties were guilty. Before having entered into a prosecution of this kind the government should have had the strongest ground and should ascertain whether they had cases against these people, instead of, in a wholesale way, arresting twenty or thirty and putting them on their trial.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—That is my contention.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—And then the only evidence they had was from this base informer, whose evidence would not be listened to or believed by any juries to whom it was presented.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is pretty hard for members of this House to discuss a record which they have not before them. We have just heard a statement of what took place before the courts, and we have also seen quite unsavory evidence reported by the press. We saw that parties had been taken into dark chambers to be taught how to mark ballots, how to spoil ballots and stuff boxes. We do not know the character of the party who gave the evidence, but we know, through the press of the province of Quebec and the press of the country generally, that very extraordinary evidence was laid before the courts at those different trials, and it is difficult to say, especially when there were disagreements in certain cases, whether those trials were started in a light way and without mature consideration. Some member of this House should move for the papers, if we are to hold the government responsible for the spending of such a sum. We should have the evidence that was taken at those trials, so that the House could then judge for themselves as to the nature of the charges that were laid against those parties. We know that political trials, where party feeling runs high, generally end in disagreements. There may be a strong or a weak case. We all know the difficulties in the way of selecting twelve men to form a jury who will agree to condemn a party who has done party work of an illegal character perhaps, which has benefited his own party. We know that such trials generally end in disagreement, but as some hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House have said, it does not mean for all that that the government should not try to mete out justice to the culprits whatever the result may be. Of course if the bill is too high it should be discussed, but until we have the record before us it is hard to say if those prosecutions were entered on without mature consideration.

THE RESIGNATION OF CAPTAIN BELANGER.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government :

Why has the Militia General Orders, No. 55, of the year 1894, in so far as it relates to Captain and Brevet Major P. Belanger of the 61st Battalion, been cancelled and the following substituted in lieu thereof, as published in the Canada Gazette of 18th December, 1897 : "Captain and Brevet Major P. Belanger is permitted to resign his commission and to retain the rank of Major on retirement, 29th October, 1897"?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have the answer here from the Major General. He says : "On investigation of this case I found that Mr. Belanger had certainly left the limits, but as he explained that this was done inadvertantly, and it was urged on his behalf that his long good previous service entitled him to a certain consideration, I thought favourably ot this, and, therefore recommend that he be placed on the retired list with the rank he previously held."

MR. RUSSELL'S MISSION TO ROME.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to direct the attention of the government to the following letter written by Mr. Russell to His Eminence Cardinal Rampolla, Secretary of State :

(Translation from the French.)

ROME, 26th November, 1897.

EMINENCE,—I have just arrived at Rome once again, at the urgent request of the Catholic members of the Government and of the parliament of Canada, in whose name I have already presented myself to you. Although I have come so far I do not dare to present myself to Your Eminence, because I would not in the least like, at this moment, to seem to be bringing pressure to bear or to wish to impede the complete liberty of His Holiness. Moreover, I know how busy Your Eminence is, and I remember with what patience Your Eminence has so many times before heard our representations on the subject of Manitoba, which, besides, Your Eminence now fully understands.

I should not even like to give you the trouble to read this letter if I had not been very particularly asked to go to Rome by those whom I represent, and who, living far from Rome, do not know quite what to do in order to plead their cause and fulfil their duty to the Holy See.

This is therefore why I take the liberty of writing to Your Eminence as follows :—

Some days ago the Canadian newspapers caused to appear an item by which it was set forth that His Holiness had published a letter condemning in the most formal terms the concessions obtained for the Manitoba schools.

A few days afterwards a declaration of official appearance made it known that no such letter existed.

Although not resting upon any foundation, the publication of this news has created in Canada such a state of feeling that my principals thought they would be wanting in their duty to His Holiness if they did not bring their respectful representations before him.

The object of my visit is to call the attention of Your Eminence to the subject upon which I have so often negotiated, to know that such a condemnation would have the most disastrous effects for the peace of Canada and the cause of Catholic education in this country, while at the same time it would sow discord among the Catholics themselves.

We do not solicit His Holiness to sanction as perfect the concessions obtained, but that in his wisdom he will be pleased to regard them as a beginning of justice. With the aid of time and thanks to the patient work of persuasion by their compatriots, the Catholics of Manitoba may hope to obtain satisfaction. The condemnation of the concession made would, at the present hour, render (I am begged to insist upon this point) any future concessions impossible.

My instructions enjoin me again to renew to Your Eminence the desire, which I had already the honour to express to you, that His Holiness will be pleased to name a permanent delegate in Canada. The representative of His Holiness would reside on the spot, but would be outside local interests, and thus he could with more wisdom guide Catholics through the difficulties which they have to surmount.

There is another point which I dare to beg Your Eminence to be good enough to consider.

Almost immediately when the Latin text of the letter of the Holy Father appears, difficult and even contradictory translations will appear and, I am sure of it, most regrettable discussions will at once arise as to the interpretation of the words of His Holiness.

That is intended to apply to our bishops, who are supposed to be ignorant and unable to translate a Latin text properly, or dishonest and not to be trusted to translate it correctly—a compliment to them made, en passant, by Mr. Charles Russell, who represented the Catholic members of the government.

In order to avoid such a misfortune, may I be permitted to suggest to Your Eminence, how desirable it would be that the Latin text should be accompanied by authorized texts in French and English. This procedure has been followed, if I recollect aright, on several occasions in the case of France and of England.

I shall leave Rome on Saturday; till that day I am entirely at the disposal of Your Eminence.

I think, before I put the questions which this letter suggests, I may be allowed to show the House in what position the question is now standing. In this House a few days ago I asked the government whether Mr. Russell, of the firm of Day, Russell & Company, of London, was in the employment of the government. I received the answer that he was. I then asked what was the amount of money he received since he was in its employment; and by the answer I got it appears that Mr. Russell received in the month of January, 1897, or some time before that, the amount of £100 sterling on account of a special case called the Queen's Counsel case. Then on the 23rd July he received an advance of £400 sterling on general account; and the minister gives further disbursements made to Mr. Charles Russell making a total of £2,587, 13, 10,—that was about $12,437, out of which there is two thousand for general account. I had, naturally some doubts and I thought the best way to get those doubts cleared was to put a question to the government, and ask if any of that amount had been paid to Mr. Russell for a certain trip he made to Rome, not at the instance—I never said at the instance—but with the authorization of the government; and for that purpose I put a few questions on the papers just to call the attention of the government to that special fact and to get the information if that was the case or not, and I asked on the 27th April:

Whether, since the 1st of July, 1896, the government or any member of the present administration has authorized Mr. Charles Russell, of the firm of Day, Russell & Co., of London, Solicitors, to go to Rome, with instructions or a mission to speak or act in the name of the government, or of the Prime Minister, or of any member of the administration, with regard to the Manitoba school question?

2. Was it to the knowledge of and with the consent of of the government that Mr. Russell went to Rome and took upon himself, in the name of certain members of the government, to urge upon the ecclesiastic authorities of Rome a settlement of the Manitoba school difficulties?

The Minister of Justice replying to the question if that trip had been authorized or if it was within the knowledge of the government, took great care to answer me that it was not at the instance of the government that such a thing was done, and when I wanted to know what he meant by that answer he said my question had been answered. But my question was on the paper and my question was "whether since the first of July, 1896, the government or any member of the present administration, has authorized Mr. Charles Russell to go to Rome with instructions or permission to speak or act in the name of the government or of the Prime Minister or of any member of the administration with regard to the Manitoba school question?" The answer was that Mr. Charles Russell did not do such a thing at the instance of the government. I immediately replied that I wanted to know whether there was a distinction between doing a thing at the instance of the government and being subsequently authorized to do it. The hon. minister answered me and I quote his words, that he was informed that Mr. Russell "was not authorized either by the Prime Minister or any member of the government." So then I have it in black and white that Mr. Russell had never been authorized to fulfil that mission towards the Holy See or to act in that capacity in behalf of the government. But I wanted to know a little more. I had in my questions mentioned the Manitoba school question, a fact that in my thought might have limited my question and diminished its scope. So I put a more general question, asking if Mr. Russell had gone to Rome at the instance, at the request, with the authorization or with the knowledge of the government, and what had he been doing at Rome, if he had solicited the interference, or asked the interference, or invited the interference of the Holy See on any question at all; and to my great surprise the hon. Secretary of State brought up Bourinot and Todd, and told me that he should not answer a question that did not relate to a matter of public interest. I do not know how the hon. minister could find that the question, which is so wide in its scope, is not of public interest when he knows that it was that same question which brought the present government into power; if the hon. gentleman's party succeeded in the last election it was because of the promise of the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier that he would do better than the Conservative government, that he would name a commission, put the Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat at the head of a special commission and send him to investigate in Manitoba. It was that promise of the Prime Minister that induced the people of Quebec to give him the mandate he has now. And yet I am told that that is not a public question! I do not feel convinced, after the reading of Bourinot or Todd, that I was in the wrong, and I think nobody in this House can understand why the hon. minister brought in the reference to Bourinot and Todd. I hope he will not bring it in to-day. What was the last answer of the hon. minister? I take it from our own proceedings:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to the question of order. The hon. minister says he declines to answer this question because it affects religious interests. My question is so framed that it does not affect religious interests. I ask, and I cite the question I asked, "at any time between the 1st July, 1896, and this date, had the government or the Prime Minister or any member of the present administration, or Mr. Chas. Russell of London, solicitor, at the request or to the knowledge or by the authority of the government or the Prime Minister or any member of the present administration, directly or indirectly, solicited or asked or invited, the intervention of the Holy See for the settlement of any question and of what question."

Here is the answer of the Hon. Secretary of State:

I have answered that. The government have had no communication with the Holy See on that question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If any one at any time has been authorized to ask in the name of the government or of certain members of the government the nomination of an apostolic delegate with a permanent residence in Canada. What is the answer to that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not propose to give the hon. gentleman any answer beyond what I have already given. That is all the hon. gentleman is entitled to. He is not really entitled to that but I explained that the government of Canada have had no communications with the See of Rome on any question.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Has any minister?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I decline to go any further.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I ask this: Has any one in the name of the government been authorized?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My answer covers that; the government have neither by themselves nor by any other person authorized any communication with the See of Rome, the former answer covers that completely.

That was the second time I was calling the hon. minister's attention to the fact that a demand had been made at Rome for the nomination of a permanent delegate. The day before I had asked the hon. minister whether the government or the Prime Minister, or any member of the present administration, or Mr. Chas. Russell of London, with the authority or with the knowledge of the government, had asked the Vatican to appoint an apostolic delegate to remain permanently in Canada for the purpose of assisting directly or indirectly in the settlement of the Manitoba school question in Canada. The answer I received was:

My answer to the first question is no.

So no one was authorized—that is the answer of the government. I suppose I have no right to doubt that it was made in good faith and that the same good faith will compel the government to give honest answers to the few questions which the letter I have just given to this House suggests and which I may now ask the government:

1. Whether the words "at the urgent request of the Catholic members of the government" can, in the present instance be applied to any other government than the government of which the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is the Prime Minister?

2. Whether Mr. Russell tells the truth when he affirms that he went to Rome at the request of the Catholic members of the government?

3. Whether Mr. Russell tells the truth when he affirms that he had already presented himself to the Secretary of State in the name of the same Catholic members of the government?

4. Whether Mr. Russell tells the truth when he reaffirms that he was particularly requested to go to Rome by the Catholic members of the government whom he represents?

5. Whether Mr. Russell tells the truth when he affirms that those whom he represents, living far from Rome, do not quite know what to do in order to fulfil their duty to the Holy See?

6. Whether Mr. Russell tells the truth when he affirms that his "principals the Catholic members of the government" thought they would be wanting in their duty to His Holiness if they did not bring their respectful representations before him?

7. Whether Mr. Russell tells the truth when he affirms that the Catholic members of the government beg him to insist upon the fact that the condemnation at present of the concessions already made in the school question would render impossible any future concession ?

8. Whether Mr. Russell tells the truth when he affirms that his instructions enjoin upon him to renew the demand which he has already made for the nomination of a permanent delegate ?

9. If Mr. Russell tells the truth, how can the answers given up to this date in the Senate by some members of the government be reconciled with such contradictory assertions ?

10. If Mr. Russell does not tell the truth, is it the intention of the government to continue to make use of a man whose assertions it is obliged to disavow ?

I hope the government will take a manly stand, and if they are in the wrong admit it, and not try to get out of it by mere words or a quotation from Todd, that they will take the bull by the horns and answer the question correctly.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Which bull ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—During all the time that they were haggling with the Holy See, they were not doing so with the fair play we would expect from good fighters. Were they not hitting below the belt all the time ? Let them take a stand worthy of their own position and of the dignity of this House, and let them answer the question, yes or no, in a frank, open manner. If they had no negotiations with the Holy See, why do they give the Holy See the impression that all that is coming from this side of the water is coming from members of the government. If it is private individuals who are acting with the Holy See, let them act as private individuals, and let Charles Russell be prevented in the future from saying that he is requested by the Catholic members of the government to make representations for them. I hope the government will take a manly stand, and not try to take advantage of their position to act in—I do not know that the word would be parliamentary—in a sneaky way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not propose to comment on the very bad taste exhibited by the hon. gentleman in dragging matters of this kind before this chamber—matters which he had no right whatever, under the rules which govern parliamentary inquiry, to put on the paper or expect an answer to. I have no knowledge that Mr. Russell wrote that letter—never heard of it, never saw the letter in print till it was read to-day, and I never had any correspondence with Mr. Russell. I do not know the gentleman at all. No communications passed one way or the other, and I am quite unaware what he has done, and I can give no answer further than I have given to this inquiry. I stated distinctly that the government had submitted no question to the See of Rome either affecting the Manitoba schools or any other point, and that is the only answer the hon. gentleman will receive at my hands.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is short.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Did the hon. minister say he could not give the answer because he had not the document ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No ; that is in reference to another question.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I think the hon. minister is evading the question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Had Mr. Russell authority to use the name of the Catholic members of the government as he has done?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We do not know that he ever wrote a word.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That is begging the question again.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The whole thing is out of order.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Does it sound as if Russell was talking with authority—that he had this authority from the Catholic members of the government ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let me say to my hon. friend that the whole of these questions are based upon an assumption of facts that we do not know to exist at all, that we have no reason to suppose exists, and the whole list of questions which the hon. gentleman has put were highly irregular and out of order.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think when we come to look at this letter and read it very carefully that we will not be disposed to agree with the leader of the House that it is a mere assumption that such a letter was written by Charles Russell. I think there is within the letter itself, pretty substantial intrinsic evidence that it is genuine.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No such letter has been brought before the House, and no such letter is before us.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is before us.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—With due deference to my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, I repeat we have it before us. When it is put before us, as it is, by a member of the House on his responsibility as a senator.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes; I take the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We have a right to take it as bona fide, until some hon. gentleman will give us reasons to take a different stand with regard to it. The conclusion that this letter forces upon our minds are rather strange. We are led to inquire as to who is entitled at this present moment to be regarded as the living George Washington of this country. It seems doubtful where the truth lies as between my hon. friend, the leader of the House, the hon. Secretary of State and Mr. Charles Russell, solicitor of London. We have had declarations again and again in this House made by ministers across the floor, in the most emphatic manner, that neither the premier of this country nor any other member of the government had authorized Mr. Charles Russell to go to Rome. We have had these declarations made in the most solemn manner in answer to questions categorically put to ministers across the floor of the House, and in the face of that we have Charles Russell's letter in which he says he went to Rome at the urgent request of the Catholic members of the government and the Parliament of Canada, in whose name he had already presented himself.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I rise to a question of order. I find that on our minutes a simple question is put. The question was asked and was answered. I maintain that under such circumstances no gentleman can rise and make a speech on the subject.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—If the hon. gentleman had read the motion he would have seen that he was wrong. The first part of this inquiry calls attention to certain facts.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear; and Bourinot deals with that.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I wait for the decision of the Chair.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—With regard to the question of order, it is always held in this House when hon. gentlemen——

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am making a remark upon the question of order. I say it has been the practice of this House upon all occasions that, when the attention of the House is directed to a subject and that is followed by an inquiry, we can discuss it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would direct the attention of the House to Bourinot. The question raised by my hon. friend is fully dealt with, and if the hon. gentleman will turn to page 381 he will find the matter very fully discussed where the opinion is given by Bourinot that not only in the House of Lords but in the Senate of Canada the greatest latitude has been allowed in respect to the discussion of questions to which the attention of the government has been directed. Bourinot says:

> A practice, however, has long prevailed in parliament, and is now established in the Senate and House of Commons of putting questions to the ministers of the Crown, concerning any measure pending in parliament or other public matter, and of receiving the answers and explanations of the persons so interrogated. This deviation from the general rule respecting motions has arisen from the necessity that experience has shown of obtaining for the House material information, which may throw light on the business before it and serve to guide the judgment in its future proceedings. The proceedure in the Senate on such occasions is quite different from that of the Commons much more latitude is allowed in the Upper House, and a debate often takes place on a mere question of inquiry, of which, however, notice must always be given when it is of a special character. Many attempts have been made to prevent debates of such questions, but the Senate, as it may be seen from the precedents set forth in the notes below, have never practically given up the usage of permitting speeches on these occasions—a usage which is essentially the same as in the Lords House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY — And Bourinot proceeds to say:

> The more regular and now the more common practice is for a member in cases requiring some discussion to give notice that he will call attention on a future day to a public matter and make an inquiry of the government on the subject. Then it is perfectly legitimate to discuss the whole question at length as the terms of the notice show the intention of the person who puts it on the paper.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The interruption of the hon. gentleman is altogether unusual. The discussion the hon. gentleman was proceeding with is quite in accordance with the rules of the House settled years under the authority just cited by my hon. friend, but if there was any trouble about it, any member could move the adjournment of the House and give the hon. gentleman an opportunity to speak at any length on these questions; but it has not been the practice of the House to curtail discussions where a matter of interest to the country and to the House has been before the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I deny the last speaker's declaration. I myself was called to order under similar circumstances.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If the hon. gentleman raises a question of order, of course the Chair has to decide it.

The SPEAKER—It is very much to be regretted that we have not yet a formal rule to guide us in the discussion when an inquiry is made or a question is put to the ministers of the Crown. Last year I was called upon to give my opinion on a question of order similar to the one raised in the present case. I then expressed the hope that the Senate would either overrule my decision or provide for a special rule to guide the discussion on similar questions. The 20th rule of our House says:

A Senator may speak to any question before the Senate; or upon a question or an amendment to be proposed by himself; or upon a question of order arising out of a debate; but not otherwise without consent of a majority of the Senate, which shall be determined without debate.

So, in accordance with the 20th rule, any other gentleman than the one making the inquiry could speak on the question or inquiry only with the consent of a majority of the Senate. This rule has not been considered as guiding the discussion on inquiries or questions put to ministers of the Crown. Having no special rule for our guidance, we have to refer to the 124th rule of our House, which says:

In all unprovided cases the rules, usages and forms of proceeding of the House of Lords are to be followed.

It has been the practice in the House of Lords for a member to give notice that he will call attention to a certain subject and will put certain questions to the government, and then comments are allowed and speeches made by other members. That has been introduced in our House, more particularly in 1877, and has been allowed since, though sometimes objected to. It must be admitted that the Senate has never since laid down any distinct rule to limit the debate. Hon. members, in putting questions or making inquiries, like in the House of Lords, have been allowed to comment upon them, and after the answer of the minister other hon. members have been allowed to speak, and long and important debates have been frequently raised. My predecessors in the chair have allowed the practice of the House of Lords to be followed in this House. During last session I was called upon to give my opinion on the same question, and I decided in the same sense.

In the question now before the Senate the hon. member for Stadacona gave a notice that he would call the attention of the government to a certain matter and would follow with certain inquiries, and comments have been allowed by the Senate on those inquiries. Now a question of order is raised to prevent further discussion. In my opinion, as long as the Senate will not make a special rule to limit the debate on similar inquiries, the practice of the House of Lords must be followed in this House; and, provided the hon. gentleman for Queen's will confine his remarks within the question before the House, I cannot rule that he is out of order.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When my hon. friend rose to a question of order I was pointing out to the House that this letter of Mr. Charles Russell which is now before us, contains the information, that Mr. Russell not only went to Rome and was in Rome on the 26th November, 1897, at the "urgent request of the Catholic members of the government," but that he had already presented himself there and as he says later on, he had "so many times before" been heard on these matters. Therefore it is a matter of very great surprise that this was not known to my hon. friend the leader of the House when he told the Senate a day or two ago that he had been informed by his colleagues that Mr. Russell had not gone to Rome to make any representation on the Manitoba school question. I suppose the general question presents itself as to whether the members of this government who made this appeal to Rome on many occasions did it as Roman Catholics or as members of the government. Mr. Russell's statement is that they did it in both capacities. He says "Catholic members of the government." That word Catholic designates the religious faith of the gentlemen who sent him to make the representation, but does not at all change the latter part of the statement that they were members of the government. Had he said, for instance, that of these gentlemen who had instructed him one was a philosophical member of the government, another a philanthropical member of the government, and another a wicked member of the government, we could have known who was meant by the philosophical member and by the philanthropical member, and hon. gentlemen might suppose the term wicked to apply to the whole of them. But they were all the time members of the government. The conclusion the House must draw is that they made this representation as members of the government. But the point which comes out clearly in this letter, the point that we are most interested in, is the very extraordinary discrepancies in the statements given in answer to inquiries by my hon. friend the leader of the House to former inquiries based on information he had from his colleagues. He did not on these occasions claim to have positive information of his own, but based his statements on information he had from his colleagues. It is a very difficult question to find out who has been telling the truth—whether Mr. Russell went to Rome on these many occasions and wrote this letter acting, as he said, for members of the government, or whether in doing so he was claiming to be what he was not, or whether the hon. gentlemen who have been giving this explanation to the country have been telling the truth or not. I think, for the honour of this House and the credit of the government, the hon. Secretary of State should stand up and make a clean breast of the matter. The hon. gentleman will not require either Bourinot or Todd to enable him to tell the truth, and that is what we want.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman states that I have told an untruth.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman said I should make a clear breast of it and tell the truth. I have told all I know on this subject. I spoke for the government of this country, and I said, in my answer the other day, that whatever individual members of the government may have done, or any correspondence they might have with the ecclesiastical authorities of the Church was not a proper matter of inquiry by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am sorry that my hon. friend should suppose that I stated he told an untruth. It was on the authority of information given by him that the leader of the House told us that no member of the government had sent Mr. Charles Russel to Rome. I must believe that this wicked man, Charles Russell, made a gross misrepresentation at Rome. I went so far as to say that my hon. friend did not require the assistance of Bourinot, Todd or any other authority to enable him to tell the truth. I must take the other view—that this man Charles Russell has been taking the greatest liberties with the names of my hon. friend and his colleagues in this country. I think we have a right to full information on the subject.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to enter into a discussion of this very interesting subject. It is one which is interesting to private individuals, but it is not interesting to us as a House. We know that the government have taken no action on the matter, and, as the hon. Secretary of State has said, what individual members of the government, in their capacity as members of a denomination have done or written, does not come properly before us. If any member of the House who belongs to the Presbyterian denomination should write a letter and submit it to the moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly of this country, that letter would not form a proper subject for discussion in this chamber. I do not think this letter, if a genuine letter, would be a proper matter for discussion here. The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Ferguson) assumed that the letter must be considered as genuine and bona fide unless there were circumstances connected with it calculated to throw doubt on its authenticity. I should not have said anything on this subject if it had not been for that observation on the part of the hon. gentleman. Now I find circumstances in connection with this letter which are very much calculated to throw doubt on its authenticity. This is supposed to be a letter confidential in its character.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Confidential! It was read in the House of Commons by Mr. Tarte last night.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was never read by Mr. Tarte. The hon. gentleman means to be fair, but his temper sometimes gets the better of his judgment. Now this is a letter written by Charles Russell, professing to speak on behalf of certain members of the government of Canada who happen to be Roman Catholics—written to whom? To a dignitary of the Church, Cardinal Rampolla. I want to know how such a letter could have come here? In what honourable, manly way could a letter of that kind have come into the possession of a member of this House? The presumption is that no hon. member of this House would be guilty of either getting himself, or making use of a letter which had been got by any improper or dishonourable means. Can any hon. gentlemen tell me how a letter of that kind could, by any honourable or proper method, have come into the possession of the hon. gentleman who has called attention to it? That circumstance alone is a strong argument in favour of taking this letter to be simply manufactured.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hon. gentlemen——

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is out of order; he has already spoken.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of continuing this very interesting discussion for a moment. The hon. gentleman from Halifax says the great question is whether this is a genuine letter or not. I take issue with him on that question. I do not propose to inquire how that letter came into the hands of my hon. friend who has read it to the House. The great question for this House to consider is whether the statements contained in the letter are true or not. Does it bear the ear marks of genuineness about it? I think it does, and I should like a direct, straight, honest statement from the government whether we are to have any other answer than we have had up to the present time. Has the government of Canada come to that pass that we are to be told over and over again that a certain gentleman, who is admitted to be the agent of this government in London, has not been authorized to go to Rome—that he has not had any authority from the government, or the leader of the government, to enter into negotiations with the Holy See. We have been told that repeatedly in this House, and here a document comes before us which bears all the marks of genuineness about it, giving a flat, fair and square contradiction to the statement of the hon. gentleman who represents the government in this House, and it is time that the government should come up to the position which this country expects the government to occupy. Surely the government have not descended so low in their own estimation as they will be in the estimation of the public, if questions of this kind are to be put and a flat contradition made merely on the assumption that this letter is not genuine. They can easily find out whether the letter is genuine or not. They wanted to know, and they wanted an answer some time ago, whether a certain man was a Rothschild or not, and they could find that out by a telegram. They could find out in this case, by a telegram to Mr. Charles Russel, whether he sent such a letter as that to His Eminence at Rome. If this gentleman has assumed to write such a letter upon his own responsibility, then I think it becomes the duty of this government to discard Mr. Russell and to stop the large expenditures which this country is called upon to pay for that gentleman's work in London, or Rome, or anywhere he may be employed; it is time that they employed an honest man, who will not exceed the work that is required of him by the government of this country. But if he is carrying out the instructions of his friends in the government—and I am bound to say that I believe he is—then the contradiction of this statement and the answer that has been given to the question put is not creditable to the government of this country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we have nothing but the declaration of the hon. member of Stadacona as to the letter being sent by Mr. Charles Russell.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Is not that sufficient?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—This purports to be a copy of an original and if that original does exist, and if what we have here is the text itself of that original, why not produce it? I would not be surprised that my hon. friend from Stadacona who has been in the land of Machiavelli lately—for we all know that he returns from Rome with less success than he hoped to have,—would have been given a letter as being one from Mr. Charles Russell. But we know nothing about it and I quite understand that the representatives of the administration here will not accept the premises laid down that this letter comes from Mr. Charles Russell. Then if it did come from Mr. Charles Russell what is there in the letter that concerns this chamber? Are we not, as Catholics, free to deal with the head of our church as it pleases us? I quite understand that for political purposes and political ends that my hon. friend from Stadacona would have preferred that the head of the Church would not have brought peace into the Dominion of Canada. On the 23rd June, 1896, my hon. friend thought that with the clergy at his back, or by his side in the province of Quebec, his party would be returned to power. He failed in that attempt. My hon. friend, who thought that he could ride the Catholic horse to a safe goal on the 23rd June, 1896, thinks he can ride with more success the Protestant horse at the next election by raising prejudices, as seems his end, by the present move. What is the object of the question put by my hon. friend from Stadacona? I have not yet seen it. Would it be to establish—and I do not know of any other from a public point of view—that an official of this government had been paid with the public moneys of Canada to do certain work for private parties; that Mr. Charles Russell has gone to Rome in the interest of private individuals at the expense of the public? Even if this letter was taken to be true, it does not concern the House of Commons nor the Senate of Canada, for the Catholic members of the administration, the Catholic members of this chamber, as well as the Catholic members of the House of Commons, are perfectly free, if they deem it just and proper, to appeal to the head of their Church for intervention and justice. We all know that in the other House a petition asking for a papal delegate, signed by the members of the House of Commons and some members of this chamber, was read. Was there anything improper in that? Is not that private dealings between members of a certain church and the head of that church? We know that some hon. gentlemen thought that with the help of some clerical influences success would crown their efforts. A papal decision has come asking that peace should reign in Canada. We have it now. On the 23rd of June, or on the 5th or 6th of July following, when the Tupper administration went out, peace did not reign in Canada. The school question was not settled, but now it is in a fair way of disappearing from practical politics.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is it settled?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—My hon. friend may try and persuade the electors of Quebec that it is not settled, but he will find the same success at the next election if he wants to try again that issue—the same success he obtained on the 23rd June last. The people in the other provinces have thought that the province of Quebec was bound to follow the dictations, the unauthorized dictations of self-appointed representatives of the church and religion, as the hon. member from Stadacona poses as one; but the province of Quebec has proved to the other provinces that we are able to distinguish between the religious sphere and the political sphere, and that though we may be accused of being a priest-ridden province, yet when our electors go to the polls they can, they do follow but the dictates of their conscience. We know where our obligations begin, and where they end; and to-day the Manitoba school question has been practically settled. We hear of no more fuss, no more protests from the province of Manitoba. We hear some disappointed politicians who think they can ride back to power by raising those old cries by which they failed on the 23rd June, 1896. What is the use of bringing up here a so-called letter from Mr. Charles Russell, which affects only those members who are connected with the Catholic Church. That is a matter between themselves and the head of their church. The Catholics of this Dominion stand by and respect the law and the constitution of Canada, and if by means which are not dishonourable, but which are absolutely correct according to our Catholic views, we succeed in bringing peace among the members of our community, in passing the sponge over the difficulties which were brought in this country not by us, but by others—if we succeed by peaceful and conciliatory means to bring peace into the Dominion of Canada, if we stand by the law and by the constitution, be they Protestants as fanatical as they can be with us, they have no right to meddle with dealings between us and the head of our church. So I cannot understand why, except to gain some petty political advantage, the hon. member for Stadacona has been for the last few weeks speaking so often of Rome and the head of the Catholic Church.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Dandurand) says there were many things he cannot understand. I agree with him. He does not understand yet the question that I put to the government, and he has come here and has spoken of the Manitoba school difficulty when the real question now under discussion is merely to ascertain if the government or Mr. Charles Russell has been telling the truth. I do not see why the school question should enter into the discussion on that point. I will give the hon. gentleman an occasion to show his warmth another day. He is quite a young man. We know he has all the hot blood of youth, but he might keep cool for a moment. And when the trumpet sounds he might rise and show, not only to the Senate but to the whole world, what his convictions are, and what he has to say for the priests and against them, and all that he understands and all that he does not understand. I refer now to the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I defy the hon. gentleman to stand up and say that this letter is not genuine. I defy the government to cast a suspicion on the letter themselves. If they do not believe in the letter, why have they not the courage to say so? They dare not do it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We do not know anything about it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I certainly never heard of it, and I do not think my colleague has.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Can we believe that? Can we believe that when Mr. Russell spoke in the name of the Catholic members of the government he never spoke in the name of the Secretary of State? But if the hon. gentleman says that Mr. Russell did not speak in his name, or if he says he never heard of the letter, why then does not he answer that Mr. Russell was not even authorized by the Catholic members of the Cabinet to speak as he did?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not make any statement in reference to that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why did you not do it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not bound to do it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It would be so easy for him, a Catholic member of the government, to say that even the Catholic members did not authorize Mr. Russell to speak as he did. The cabinet is composed of Catholic members and Protestant members, and I know that Mr. Russell would not speak in the name of the Protestant members of the cabinet, but he might in the case of the Catholics, and this he says he did.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have stated that I never heard of that letter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Did you authorize the man to speak?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said I never saw the letter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Did you authorize him to speak?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said nothing further.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want the hon. gentleman from Halifax to deny the letter?

Hon. Mr. POWER—You cannot expect me to deny something I know nothing about. It is the hon. gentleman's duty to establish that there was such a letter, and how it came into his possession.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We assist at a funny spectacle. Every man on the liberal side who gets up says: "I do not know a single thing about it," but all of them go on and speak on things they know nothing about. That is the way the hon. gentleman from Halifax treats the question. He wants to defend the ministers, and he must defend them. Either one of two things happened. Mr. Russell spoke with the authorization of certain members of the government or without such authorization. He publicly and solemnly states that he had such authorization. I want the ministers to say if it is true or not. I ask particularly the hon. Secretary of State if, as a Catholic, he is one of those who authorized Mr. Russell? He says it is the first time he has read the letter, but is it the first time he has heard about the matter? If the ministry employs Mr. Russell, and if this gentleman speaks in the name of the Catholic members of the government without authorization, he should be disavowed. I ask if it is the intention of the government to continue to employ that man. That is a pertinent question; why do not the government answer? Will they answer? They cannot. They dare not.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I want to ask the government a question. Do they disavow this letter, or do they disavow the position Mr. Russell takes in writing this letter?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no answer to make.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—An objection has been taken by one of the gentlemen on the treasury benches that the letter was not before the House and was not perhaps a genuine letter. It is hardly fair for the government to raise such a question, because when we ask for information or returns we cannot get them. Hon. members of this side of the House have to get those documents in some way or another, and I do not think it is fair on the part of the government when they fail to bring down returns which members have asked for, to raise such an objection as this. The hon. gentleman from DeLorimier has thought proper to go over the school question, and to make the statement that it is settled. I beg to inform him that it is not settled. He may refer to those who are dissatisfied with the action of the government as mere politicians. But it is my hope that future generations will say that politicians are not those who have stood for the constitution and have fought for the rights of the minority and of the people at large, but those who have violated the constitution and have spoliated the minority. The politicians are those who, for party advantages, have stood in the way of redress, like the liberal government of Manitoba, with the complicity of the liberal party here. It is a disgrace to Canada that for eight long years the constitution should have been so violated without redress.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put a question?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The hon. gentleman has spoken. It is argued on the government side that any member is at perfect liberty to negotiate with the authorities of his church. That is quite true, but why do the government object to state it frankly before parliament and the country? Why do they shirk the responsibility of their action? Let them inform us what they have done. That is what we are aiming at. The object of the hon. gentleman from Stadacona is not to bring before the House the whole school question itself, but to ascertain where the sincerity of the government on this question lies. I am sorry to say that, judging from the position taken by the government on the matter which is before the House to-day, we cannot but arrive to very unfavourable conclusions as to the sincerity of the government in connection with these negotiations, and towards parliament. My hon. friend has spoken about peace. We had peace before 1890, and that peace was disturbed—by whom? By the friends of the hon. gentleman, and if for eight years we have been fighting to get back our rights, it is because these friends of the hon. gentleman have been constantly refusing to grant us the redress we are entitled to, and also on account of the complicity of the friends of the hon. gentleman in this parliament in thus refusing such a redress. You have referred to the elections in Quebec. You must remember that the elections of Quebec were won by the hon. gentleman who is now the premier of Canada, because of his promises to settle the Manitoba school question properly and according to the constitution. And yet, there is nothing of the kind done up to the present. Far from it. On Monday last, the hon. Secretary of State said that the question had been settled so far as this government was concerned, by the agreement entered into in the fall of 1896 between the government of Manitoba and this government, and that the administration to which he belongs intended to do nothing more in the matter. Everybody knows, however, that this so-called settlement is defective in every way and settles nothing. There is only one way of having the question settled. It must be according to justice. In that way only peace can be restored. Peace cannot reign in a country where injustice prevails. I told the government at the commencement of this session that I would not interfere in their efforts to settle the question if they were willing to settle it right, and that we would wait for some time. Accordingly, I have not said one word since on the question. But I cannot allow to go to the country the statement that the question is settled. If the hon. gentleman considers me merely as a politician, I will cite what the archbishop of St. Boniface says. He is not a politician. On the eve of his departure for Europe, he said, in the church of St. Boniface, that the question was not settled, and I must repeat here that it is not settled. Any effort towards a fair settlement will receive our approbation; but I say the government is bound to have it settled in such a way as will assure to the minority its rights in their entirety, otherwise means will have to be taken so that justice may prevail.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman said the constitution had been violated?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Why did not the Federal government veto the law which violated the constitution?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Because Mr. Blake wanted to have that matter referred to the tribunals.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That is an exploded farce, because Mr. Blake did not conduct the affairs of the country at that time.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Two hours have been lost on this question, which, no doubt, if both parties had been willing could have been settled in twenty minutes. The charge made by the hon. senator for Stadacona (Mr. Landry) against the government is, it cannot be denied, of a most serious nature and I cannot agree with the hon. Secretary of State, when he stated on another occasion, that such questions ought not to be brought before Parliament, that they are not public questions, that they are not such as to oblige the government to answer them. But while I have no hesitation in saying so I am bound to acknowledge that the exception which the government have taken against this charge is of no small importance. This letter of Mr. C. Russell to the Roman Secretary of State is no doubt quine genuine, but of such genuiness there no evidence and consequently the exception taken by the government on this ground is, it cannot be denied, pretty well taken. Such is my honest opinion of this case. But while I believe that to be the position, I am bound to say that I consider the government had something more to do under the circumstances in which they are placed.

The author of the letter, Mr. C. Russell, is in the employ of the government, and has already gone to Rome in connection with this very question of the Manitoba schools. Are not those facts which are known throughout the whole Dominion quite sufficient to give to this letter a great deal more importance than it would have under ordinary circumstances and necessarily create a strong presumption that it is genuine and consequently that the government misled parliament when they denied the facts contained in the letter?

I should think that the government ought to have either denied the statements made by Mr. Russell, should the letter be genuine, or ask for such a delay to answer the questions put by the hon. senator making the charge now under discussion, as would allow them to get information from Mr. Russell himself, or at least if they knew the statements to be incorrect to deny the truthfulness of the statements contained in the letter. The government did nothing of the kind. They did nothing to destroy the strong impressions created by the letter. On the contrary, the course they have followed shows them to be wrong all through.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are the guilty ones, according to your judgment?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—What is that? I did not catch the words uttered by the hon. Secretary of State?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are the guilty parties, according to your judgment.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—No, I do not pronounce yet that the government are guilty; but I do say that, while I admit the position taken by the government is strong, that they should have settled the case in the way I stated a minute ago. They did not do that. Evidently that omission of theirs strengthens the presumption already created against them. The hon. Secretary of State himself, a lawyer, knows full well that in courts men are often convicted on mere presumption. In this case it cannot be denied that there is strong presumption that the government knew the facts stated to be true, and that they are ashamed of the course they have followed and that they would rather be found guilty on presumptive evidence, than admit the facts and by so doing admit they have been wrong.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I beg to withdraw the motion to adjourn.

AMENDMENTS ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved concurrence in the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (B) "An Act incorporating the Central Canada Loan and Savings Company."

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—I think the hon. gentleman should explain the amendments.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They are somewhat lengthy, and they have been on the minutes for some days. They are to be found at page 331 of the Minutes of Proceedings. All the amendments to this bill have been made by the Commons, and are an abridgement of the powers given to the company by the bill as it passed this House and sanctioned by the Committee on Banking and Commerce. Those powers which we have given to the company have been restricted to some extent. This House can hardly complain as long as the promoters of the bill are satisfied. I will not move the third reading to-day.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Third reading Bill (78) "An Act respecting the St. John Bridge and Railway Extension Company."

Hon. Mr. DEVER said: I merely moved the second reading of this bill in the absence of the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland, and as I see that the hon. gentleman from Halifax is about to move an amendment to the bill, I do not feel justified in going any further to-day. I therefore beg to move that the Order of the Day be discharged and that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of the Bill (M) "An Act further to amend the Companies Act. He said: I beg to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the provision of the law which I propose to supersede by this bill. Subsection five, of section five, of the Companies Act, Consolidated Statutes, as it now stands, reads as follows:

Such aggregate shall be paid into the credit of the company or of the trustees therefor, and shall be standing at such credit in some chartered bank or banks in Canada, unless the object of the company is one requiring that it shall own an estate; in which case any portion not exceeding one-half of such aggregate, may be taken as paid in, if it is bona fide invested in real estate suitable to such object, which is duly held by trustees for the company, and is of the required value over and above all encumbrances thereon.

Hon. gentlemen are aware that frequently differences have arisen in undertaking to organize under this provision of the law; that parties sometimes deposit their cheques, or the cheques of other parties, to the credit of trustees or other parties, to organize the company, and that when the company comes to be organized the cheque so deposited, or the money, is withdrawn; and we have had on more than one occasion applications for a writ of scire facias to cancel charters, even after serious liabilities by the companies have been incurred, for the purpose of escaping from the responsibility which being a stockholder in the company has imposed on the party. Now, in order to prevent that, I propose the following amendment:

Such aggregate shall be deposited to the credit of the Receiver General of Canada and shall be standing at such credit in some chartered bank in Canada, and the applicants shall, with their petition, produce the deposit receipt for such amount so deposited.

That will prevent any money that is being deposited as so much paid on stock subscribed being subsequently withdrawn from the control of those who constitute the company. The remaining words of that subsection 5 (a) I propose to leave out. The next subsection reads;

At any time after the signing of letters patent incorporating the applicants as a company, the said aggregate, so paid in to the credit of the Receiver General, may be returned to and for the sole use of the company, or in case of failure to incorporate, to the applicants who have paid in or contributed to the same, under regulations from time to time made by the Governor in Council.

Then the subsection (c) is the remaining portion of the section as it stands in the statute. I now move the second reading of this bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I confess I do not exactly understand the explanation given by the hon. gentleman. Did I understand him to say that he proposed to leave out a portion of the clause as it now stands on the statute-book, or a portion of the sub-clause (a) of subsection five in the bill that is now before us?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I propose to leave out the latter part, after the word "deposited" in this proposed bill; the following words are surplusage and would be required only in case there had been a trustee instead of the Receiver General. The money once paid to the Receiver General will of course remain in his hands in accordance with the law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What line is that from which you leave out the portion you mentioned?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I leave out all words after the word "deposited" in line ten of subsection 5 (a). Those are wholly unnecessary where the Receiver General is made the recipient of the money.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that is the case, then it is not necessary for me to take up the time of the House with a discussion of those words which the hon. gentleman now says he wishes to leave out. I had intended to do so; but now, the only point that strikes me is in reference to the placing of subscribed money with the Receiver General instead of two members of the company or a trustee in behalf of the company; but in case the company is regularly organized and commences operations, there is no power in this, or in any other law, that I am aware of, that would prevent the handing back of that money to the parties who advanced its. It is true the clause says it shall be paid back by the Receiver General to the company for the express use of the company. Well, once it gets back into the hands of the company, I take it for granted they can dispose of it in any manner they think proper. I do not see the great advantages that are to arise from the change in the law. I think I understand what the hon. gentleman intends to do. Under the present law, or under the present practice, money is deposited as provided by the law, and in many cases, more particularly in the case of the formation of companies, they can deposit a cheque certified by the bank; and that would be, so far as the government is concerned, and so far as the parties interested are concerned, just the same as if the money had been deposited, for the reason that the certificate of the bank to the fact of the deposits would be evidence of the money being there, and if the money even was not deposited, if they became security to the bank —gave their endorsed notes or by any other means, following the practice that has existed in the past, and saying, "we desire so much money for a special purpose, but we don't require to use the money, we deposit our note for the amount at a low rate of percentage"—of course, they do not take the money out of the bank, and the bank, on the strength of that, gives them a certificate. Will this place the government or the investors in any safer position than they are in under the present system? I have known cases where the money has been actually deposited (ten per cent on the capital stock), and after the formation of the company and its going into operation and commencing the transaction of business, that the money has been paid back to the party who deposited it. Now, is there anything to prevent a transaction of that kind being repeated; and if it be necessary, why is it necessary?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that the difficulty is in the inital steps taken in the organization of the company. The parties find, after having undertaken to form a company, that they can not raise the amount of money required in order to obtain the charter of incorporation, so they ask some member of the company to place a sum temporarily to the credit of the company until they make the affidavits necessary as to the amount that stands to their credit, and the arrangement is made for the granting of the charter; then the money is withdrawn and paid back to the party who has loaned it to those who undertook the organization of the company. Now that has often taken place. My hon. friend knows of the case of a company at Brantford, not long since, who were organized just in that way. The result was that, although they seemed to have a very considerable amount of money paid on their subscribed stock, they really had next to nothing. Others subsequently became members of the company and they also became directors. They incurred liabilities, losses were sustained, and after losses were sustained, in order to escape the personal liability upon them, they applied for a writ of scire facias to cancel the charter of the company. In many cases, if a provision of this kind existed, parties would not undertake to organize if they found they could not raise the necessary amount of money to obtain the charter of incorporation, or if they obtained it, the money would be paid in to the Receiver General and could not be next day paid back to the party who subscribed it. The charter of incorporation will be granted on the full amount of money being paid, and then the parties who constitute the company will be made fully responsible for the moneys paid over to them by the Receiver General until the charter of incorporation is obtained. Of course, my hon. friend knows that we cannot possibly prevent fraud sometimes occurring. It is impossible to prevent persons engaging in enterprises that are illusory, and especially those who have but little knowledge or experience of commercial or mercantile transactions, or transactions of this sort.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What will be the process for getting back that money?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see there is express provision in the bill, if the company is organized and money paid over to the Receiver General by the company, and if it fails in its organization it is paid back to the organizers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—While much may be stated in favour of the protection which my hon. friend seeks to throw around the public in reference to the formation of companies, yet in my opinion the purpose which my hon. friend has in view is not at all effected by the language of this bill. The Act at present covers precisely the case stated by my hon. friend. The company cannot be organized under the Companies Act at the present time until one-half of the stock is subscribed, and until ten per cent is paid up by the stockholder.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is the very point.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend says that is the point he desires to cover. The bill under consideration does not cast upon stock holders any greater obligation than they are under at present. My hon. friend must concede the point, that no additional obligation is thrown upon stockholders than that which devolves upon them under the present Act. Now at the present time, so soon as the subscription is made and the ten per cent paid in, the amount is usually arranged for in a bank and it stands there to the credit of the company until section five of the Act is complied with, which section reads as follows:

> At any time not more than one month after the last publication of such notice the applicants may petition the Governor in Council or the Secretary of State for letters patent. Such petition shall state that the money is paid in, etc.

The difficulty which has always obtained in the past, and which my hon. friend desires to remedy by this amending bill, is that the money, instead of being paid into a chartered bank and placed afterwards at the disposal of the promoters of the company or of the company itself, shall be paid into the credit of the Receiver General, but so soon as the letters patent are issued, the Receiver General at once pays back the money to the company, and the company can make precisely the same disposition of returning those funds in the same method as is done to-day by the company who pay the money into their credit in a chartered bank, for the purpose of making the affidavit necessary to be attached to the petition. If my hon. friend can point out any restriction in addition to the restriction which is at present provided for in the Act, I should be very much pleased indeed. I have looked as carefully as I know how at this bill, and I see no additional protection thrown round the formation of companies, except that instead of paying the money into the credit of the company it shall be paid to the Receiver General, and he shall at once pay it back. As soon as the letters patent are issued, the money gets back into the hands of the company, and they can make any disposition of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In that case stated by my hon. friend, it is just as he puts it, but when it is paid into a bank to the credit of the company the bank is sufficiently responsible not to pay it to any person till the company is organized. The hon. gentleman speaks of a payment into the bank to the credit of the company. If it were always paid into a bank to the credit of the company, I am quite sure no bank would permit the money to be withdrawn until the company was organized. But that is not the ordinary or common way The usual way has been to pay it into the hands of trustees, and the Act allows it to be paid in to the trustees. There is no security, the trustees continuing their trust until the company has been organized, but after the affidavits have been made and all the paper sent in it involves a delay then of from three to four, or sometimes five or six weeks.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Subsection 2 of the Act provides that it shall be paid in and held for the company. Then how can they pay it to any other person?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—"Such aggregate shall be paid in to the credit of the company, or of trustees therefor." The bank is not bound and does not, as a matter of fact, look after the duty of the trustees. You deposit $500 to the credit of A and B as trustees, and no further explanation is given; the affidavits are made that the money is deposited in the bank to the credit of trustees who hold it for the company. Those trustees are generally parties who are interested in obtaining the incorporation of the company, and it has been found that after the affidavits have been made, and while the case is pending and before the letters patent are issued, that the trustees, contrary to the trust they assume, have paid out the moneys to the parties who originally advanced it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the company is formed?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, before the company is organized. I suppose the same result probably would follow if the words "or of trustees therefor" were cut out, because I think we can always rely that the bank would not allow the money to be paid, because it would be a payment in contravention of law.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How is the bank to form an opinion that the company is fully organized?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It should not pay the money until notified by the original letters patent being produced at the bank showing the officials of the company, its treasurer and secretary and the proper officers who are to sign the cheque for the withdrawal of the money; but where the money is paid in to trustees, that protection is done away with. The trustees withdraw the money and there is no money to the credit of the company when it receives its letters patent, and it is not a company properly organized under the law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What better position will the company be in? It is only a question of degree, in time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Allow me to explain. As contemplated in the amendment, the money must be paid into the credit of the Receiver General, and the Receiver General must be advised that the charter has not only been issued, but that the company has been organized and its proper officers named, the treasurer and the president, and a by-law must have been passed defining by what signatures to the cheque that money is to be withdrawn, naming the officials who have the right to withdraw the money. If after that an improper use is made of the money, the individuals forming the company are liable.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They are liable to the amount of their stock anyway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but in the other case it was a fraud from the very beginning, and therefore they escaped. In this way if they make an improper disposition of the money, they are liable as stockholders.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend made provision for that money to be applied after the incorporation of the company for the purpose of the company, I would conceive it to be a safeguard, but you make a provision whereby, after the letters patent issue, the Receiver General may, on the application of the company, at once repay this fund which is held to the credit of the company. In what way is there any assurance that the money which has been paid in will be applied for the purposes of the company? If the Act, as it exists to-day, is susceptible of fraud, that a sum of money may be raised and diverted from the purposes for which it apparently was raised, surely the same weakness and infirmity is to be found in the bill introduced to-day, because if you do not provide machinery by which that money will be applied for the purposes of the company, so as to place it beyond the power of the company to repay it to those who contributed the amount, then it seems to me your legislation will be ineffective.

The motion was agreed to.

ATLAS LOAN COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (55) "An Act to incorporate the Atlas Loan Company." He said: In one respect this bill is like a number of bills which we have already passed. It proposes to take a corporation in the province of Ontario and make it a Dominion corporation, but the method by which the work is done is different from that usually adopted. I shall just read one or two clauses of the bill to show hon. gentlemen how the promoters of this bill propose to change the Ontario company into a Dominion company. The first clause is as follows :

1. The shareholders of the said the Atlas Loan Company, hereinafter called "the old company," together with such persons as become shareholders in the company, are hereby incorporated under the name of "The Atlas Loan Company," hereinafter called "the new company."

You see they do not undertake to transmute the old company into a new company, but they take the shareholders. Then the third, fourth and fifth clauses read as follows :

3. The shareholders of the old company are hereby declared to be holders respectively of shares in the new company to the same extent, and with the same amounts paid up thereon, as they are holders respectively of shares in the old company: Provided that two shares of fifty dollars each in the old company shall constitute one share of one hundred dollars in the new company.

4. The president, vice-president and directors of the old company shall respectively be the president, vice-president and directors of the new company until their successors are elected.

5. The by-laws, rules and regulations of the old company, lawfully enacted, shall be the by-laws, rules and regulations of the new company, subject to repeal, amendment or other change lawfully made.

The bill was read the second time.

MANITOBA RAILWAY AND CANAL COMPANY'S BILL.

RETURNED FROM HOUSE OF COMMONS.

A message was received from the House of Commons stating that they had disagreed with the Senate's amendments to Bill (66) "An Act respecting the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I move that the Senate do not insist on the amendment to the bill.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Before that motion is put, I would just like to say a few words, as the amendment was made on my motion. This bill went down to the House of Commons with my amendment and I see that it was received and that Mr. Bostock moved,

That the said amendment be disagreed to for the reason that it merely allows an amalgamation with a portion of a road owned by a company with which it is proposed to amalgamate and is therefore inconsistent with the object of the proposed amalgamation between the two companies, and is, moreover, repugnant to the object of the bill, which was agreed to.

Now, while I do not propose to argue on the merits of Mr. Bostock's objection, I should like to point out to the House the position in which the matter stands, and it will be for the House to decide on the course which they will pursue. I shall quote from May's Parliamentary Practice, at page 589, and show the mode of procedure in a case such as is before us :

When it is determined to disagree to amendments made by the other House—1, the bill may be laid aside; 2, the consideration of the amendments may be put off for three, six, or to any time beyond the probable duration of the session; 3, a message may be sent to communicate reasons for disagreeing to the amendments; or 4, a conference may be desired with the other House. The two first modes of proceedings are only resorted to when the privileges of the House are infringed by the bill, or when the ultimate agreement of the two Houses is hopeless; the latter are preferred whenever there is a reasonable prospect of mutual agreement and compromise. Sometimes when an amendment affects the privileges of the House, it is agreed to, the only reason offered to the Lords being that it would interfere with the public revenue, or affect the levy and application of rates, or alter the area of taxation, or otherwise infringe the privileges of the House; and it is added that the Commons do not deem it necessary to offer any further reason, hoping the above reason may be sufficient. This hint of privilege is generally accepted by the Lords and the amendment is not insisted on. The practice of parliament in regard to conference has been fully explained elsewhere, and it would be unnecessary and irksome to describe at length every variety of procedure which may arise in the settlement of amendments to bills by conference. It will be sufficient to state generally that when a bill has been returned by either House to the other with amendments which are disagreed to, a message is sent or a conference is desired by the House which disagrees to the amendment to acquaint the other with the reasons for such disagreement, in order to reconcile their differences, and if possible by mutual concessions to arrive at an ultimate agreement. If such an agreement cannot be secured the bill is lost for the session.

When one House agrees to amendments made by the other or does not insist upon its own amendments, or upon its disagreement to amendments, no reasons are offered; the object of reasons being to persuade the other House and not to justify a resolution of its own. Thus, on the 21st of July, 1858, the Lords having made an amendment to the Oaths Bill, upon which they insisted after reasons had been offered against it, at a conference; but having in the meantime passed a separate bill virtually to effect the same object—the admission of Jews to Parliament—the Commons, in order to record the true circumstances of the case, without departing from the usage of Parliament, agreed to a resolution: "That this House does not consider it necessary to examine the reasons offered by the Lords for insisting upon the exclusion of Jews from Parliament, as, by a bill of the present session, their lordships have provided means for the admission of persons professing the Jewish religion, to seats in the legislature." After which a message was sent to acquaint the Lords that the House did not insist upon their disagreement, without any reasons.

It will only be necessary to add, that it is irregular to demand a conference with the House which is in possession of a bill, which rule was thus affirmed by the Commons, 13th March, 1575: "That by the ancient liberties and privileges of this House, conference is to be required by that court which, at the time of the conference demanded, shall be possessed of the bill, and not of any other court." As the conference is desired by that House which is in possession of the bill, the bill which is the subject of the conference is always delivered by the managers, with the reasons and amendments, to the House with whom the conference is desired.

And then on page 490 of the same work.

A conference is a mode of communicating important matters by one House of parliament to the other, more formal and ceremonious than a message, and sometimes better calculated to explain opinions and reconcile differences. By a conference both Houses are brought into direct intercourse with each other, by deputations of their own members; and so entirely are they supposed to be engaged in it that while the managers are at the conference the deliberations of both Houses are suspended.

Either House may demand a conference on matters which by the usage of parliament are allowed to be proper occasions for such a proceeding: as for example, first to communicate resolutions or address to which the concurrence of the other House is desired. 2. Concerning the privileges of parliament. 3. In relation to the course of proceeding in parliament. 4. To require or communicate statements of facts on which bills have been passed by the other House. 5. To offer reasons for disagreeing to or insisting on amendments made by one House to bills passed by the other.

That is the rule which applies to just such a case as we have before us at the present moment. As I pointed out, in the first instance, the bill might be laid aside; secondly, the consideration may put off for three or six months, or at any time beyond the probable duration of the session; thirdly, a message may be sent to communicate reasons for disagreeing with the amendment, or fourthly, a conference may be sought with the other House. It is for the Senate to say whether it is desirable that a conference should be held in regard to the question that is now before us, whether the reasons given by Mr. Bostock, who moved the resolution in the House of Commons are are a sufficient justification for us to reject an amendment that was agreed to on Friday last. I desire rather to put the question before the House on that ground than to re-argue the question as I did on Friday last, when the amendment was carried. The reason I stated for moving the amendment, was that this bill sought an amalgamation with three companies, the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company, the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Company, and the South Eastern Company, and I desired, as I thought in the interests of the public generally, that the amalgamation should only be with the Hudson Bay line as far as the Saskatchewan River. Since I moved that amendment, I may say this afternoon—Mr. Mackenzie, of Mackenzie and Mann, called on me to know my reason for opposition to the bill, and I told him exactly the grounds on which I had moved my amendment. Mr. Mackenzie informed me that he was owner of the charter which was formerly under the control of the old Hudson's Bay Railway Company. That charter as explained to the House had a subsidy granted to it at one time up to the Saskatchewan River of 6,400 acres per mile, and $80,000 a year, and beyond the Saskatchewan River it had aid granted to the extent of 10,000 acres per mile between the Saskatchewan River and Hudson Bay; and the fact that an application had been made by the promoters of the Manitoba Railway and Canal Company to amalgamate with the company which was going to have an outlet by the lakes and also an outlet at the same time by the bay, gave me an idea that a monopoly of these two routes was in contemplation, and that it was against the interests of the people who lived in that country, who desired to see an effort made for the opening up of the Hudson Bay route. My amendment was not in opposition to the effort of Mr. Mackenzie or anybody else to open up the Hudson Bay route, but it was to provide against that contingency, which I thought might arise, of a monoply being created by having the outlets to the ocean and to the lakes controlled by one company and the tying up of the Hudson Bay route by litigation. Mr. Mackenzie informed me this afternoon that in the original bill which he put before the House of Commons he did not apply for an outlet to Lake Superior, that that was added in the Railway Committee of the House of Commons by Mr. Richardson, the member for Lisgar. Of that fact I was not seized when I moved my amendment on Friday last. However, the position in which the matter stands at the present moment is whether this House desires to have a conference with the House of Commons in order to inquire further into the question of the amalgamation of all the interests which possess large franchises, and which, I understand, are being utilized by the Hon. Mr. Greenway in his railway legislation which he has just passed in the Manitoba Legislature. He has I believe just passed a railway measure by which he assists the Manitoba Railway and Canal Company with a guarantee of bonds to the amount of $8,000 a mile for the extension of the 125 miles of road already completed to Lake Dauphin up to the Saskatchewan River. His legislation is to continue that guarantee up to the Saskatchewan, but not beyond that. My amendment was to limit the amalgamation up to the Saskatchewan River.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Mr. Greenway could not extend that beyond the Saskatchewan River. It would then be outside of the province of Manitoba and he could only give the guarantee to the limit of the province.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That forms an additional reason to the contention I held last Friday, that the company was practically divided in two, so far as that is concerned. I pointed out how the former Federal government, which dealt with this matter three or four years ago, divided the road and limited the application of the subsidies to the completion of a line up to the Saskatchewan River. The object of that was, I suppose—and in fact it was stated by Mr. Dewdney who introduced the measure—that it was not a question of going to Hudson Bay, but merely the construction of a colonization road up to the Saskatchewan River. However, I am not disposed to press those matters unduly upon this House. I merely put before hon. gentlemen the position in which the matter now stands, and to decide whether it is desired to have a conference committee under the rules to inquire further into the position of this amalgamation that is sought for now, or whether we will concur in the resolution which has been put before the Senate by the hon. member for Alberta. I do not claim to be sufficiently long in this House to understand exactly what is the proper course for this honourable body to pursue in regard to the matter, whether they should ask for a conference or whether they should let the matter drop where it is. I do not desire to make this question a source of conflict with the House of Commons. The company will have to come for further legislation before its interest in the charter north of the Saskatchewan is beyond question.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the question of procedure, I may say that a conference is a rather old fashioned and cumbrous method of procedure that is rarely resorted to now-a-days. At a time when everything is printed, a conference does not seem to be as necessary as it was in former years. I do not think, during all the time I have been a member of this House, I have known of a conference between the two Houses. If the question to be dealt with was one of a complicated character, there might be some ground for a conference, so that the members of the two Houses who went to the conference could discuss the various questions and arrive at a satisfactory solution of them, or at some compromise that might be satisfactory, but here the question is a very plain and simple one, and I think the procedure adopted by the hon. gentleman from Calgary is the proper one. If it is thought that the members of the House are not sufficiently informed of the matter, the hon. member for Calgary might give notice that he would move the motion which he has submitted now at some future day ; but if, on the other hand, it is thought—and I presume that is the case—that the members of the House are sufficiently familiar with the matter to deal with it now, the method adopted by the hon. member for Calgary is the most convenient. As stated by the hon. gentleman from Shell River, all the business of the two Houses would be suspended while the members were attending the conference, which the hon. gentleman seemed to indicate he thought would be a good thing. With respect to the reason given by the House of Commons for not concurring, it seems to me a reasonable one. It seems a rather remarkable thing to authorize a company to amalgamate with another company and then to say that the amalgamation shall apply only to a portion of the work which the other company is authorized to construct. And, further, I may say that it has struck me all along that if the hon. gentleman from Shell River is anxious to see this road built from the Saskatchewan to Hudson Bay, then the best chance he has of having his wish carried out is not to interfere with this legislation or to attempt to tie the hands of the company who are looking for the amalgamation, because if there are any people in the western country, or in any part of Canada, who are thoroughly capable of undertaking a work of that sort, they are just the gentlemen who are asking for this bill. As far as I am concerned myself, I do not think that it is in the interests of Canada that a road from the Saskatchewan River to Hudson Bay should be built, but the hon. gentleman is of a different opinion, and the only chance he has of ever seeing it built in his lifetime is that it should go into the hands of some company such as that which is looking for this bill. The old corporation have had this charter since 1883 and have done practically nothing. I think the hon. gentleman had better withdraw his amendment and concur in the motion made by the hon. member from Calgary.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I was one of the members who voted with the majority in support of the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman from Shell River the other day. I may say that for the last few years I have not been favourably impressed with the project of building a railway to Hudson Bay. I have been under the impression that it would rather affect the interests of the farmers in the North-west in dividing the traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But I had very little hopes of the railway being built under this company, because they had done nothing for a great number of years. I understand they did not pay the parties they made the contracts with. They were a failure, and I did not desire to support an institution which was defrauding the people, as I understood they had been, in connection with the short portion of the Hudson Bay railway which had been constructed out of Winnipeg, and for that reason I had been opposed to the Hudson Bay Railway. I thought it would interfere with the traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway. There was not enough business for two roads, and the Canadian Pacific Railway would be better able to give us reduced rates than if they had a competing line which would take traffic from them. Up to this time in the North-west we have been going through a stage of experiment. Our crops were not large and we had not as much grain to export as circumstances now indicate we will have. The last two years our country has been very productive; the farmers have acquired a knowledge of how to treat and prepare the soil, so that the last two years we have had magnificent crops and that has encouraged the people materially in going on to develop the agricultural resources of that country. It is said this year we will have 50,000,000 bushels of grain to export, and there is every indication of it. The soil is in good condition and the crop is promising. We will have a great harvest and much more grain to export than we have had in the past. This will inspire the people with hope and give tehm courage. In the very near future there will be 100,000,000 bushels exported out of that country every year. If that should be the case we would be justified in providing increased facilities for the transportation of the products of that country. Whilst in the past I have been opposed to the building of the railway, still I felt, when the bill came up the other day, we had no time to consider the matter, but taking the idea advanced by the hon. gentleman from Marquette (Mr. Boulton) that the Hudson Bay and Pacific was a strong financial concern of English as well as Canadian capitalists, I felt that the granting of this charter and giving these men a monopoly, which the amalgamation would do, would have a tendency to interfere with the rights of the other company, which rights had not yet lapsed. For that reason, I thought they were interfering with the project, and placing the road in the hands of a company who might not build it at all, because up to that time the Hudson Bay Railway Company had a very poor reputation for constructing a railway. I have learned since then that there is some doubt with regard to the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Company. I understand the moneyed man has died and the company is not in that strong financial position which we supposed. I understood that in view of that fact, the attorney of the Hudson Bay and Pacific Company made a proposition to Mackenzie and Mann's attorney to sell the charter. I am opposed to dealing with charters in that way, and I at once consulted the attorney of the Hudson Bay Pacific Railway Company. He said he had not offered to sell, that it was a misunderstanding on the part of the other gentleman, that he had only offered to amalgamate on account of the principal promoter in Canada having died, and having no Canadian member of the company, they were not in a position to go on and build the railway. That alters the case very materially. I do not now, in view of the prospects in that country, wish to retard the building of a railway to Hudson Bay, so that I may say that I will not offer any objection, because the company I was endeavouring to protect by my vote the other day has become a different company to what it was. One of its principal promoters is dead, and the company is not in that strong financial position which would warrant us in thinking it would build the railway, and therefore I do not object to the position taken by the House of Commons, and I am willing to allow the bill to pass without the amendment. I thought it but right to make this explanation in order to explain the position I took on the previous occasion and why my present position is a different one.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—With regard to the question my hon. friend has raised, as to the selling out of the charter of the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Company, I think it is called, I might just say that I asked the solicitor of this company the same question that my hon. friend asked him, and he said that it was quite a misunderstanding, that what they proposed was that they should amalgamate the two interests and promote the interests of the Hudson Bay Railway. That is a very desirable thing indeed. This Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Company has at its head such men as Admiral Markham and Col. Harris, and other strong financial men who are interested in developing a new ocean route to our prairie region, and therefore, if the discussion which I have occasioned in this House should result in amalgamation in the interests of the Hudson Bay route, I shall feel that my criticisms and my amendment have not been made in vain. I concur in the remark of the hon. gentleman from Wolseley and will not press for a further consideration of the matter by this House.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (114) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Department of Geological Survey."—(Hon. Mr. Scott).

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 6th May, 1898.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

WINDSOR AND DETROIT UNION BRIDGE COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (79) "An Act to incorporate the Windsor and Detroit Union Bridge Company," with amendments.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There are a number of amendments made to this bill, but they do not affect the principle. If, however, it is thought better to have these amendments printed in the Minutes, I would move that the amendments be considered on Monday next. If there be no objection, we could adopt the amendments now and take the third reading Monday.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I do not think there could be any objection, because the amendments do not affect the principle of the bill.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not know why we should concur in the amendments until we know what they are. There may be some objection to this bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then I move that the amendments be taken into consideration on Monday next.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (80) "An Act respecting the Ottawa and New York Railway Company."—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (67) "An Act to incorporate the London and Lake Huron Railway Company."—(Hon. Sir John Carling.)

BRITISH AMERICAN LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (109) "An Act to incorporate the British American Light and Power Company." He said: This is a bill which is principally applicable to the Yukon district and contains the usual provisions; there is nothing novel or extraordinary in it.

The bill was read the second time.

CANADIAN MINING INSTITUTE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (116) "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Mining Institute." He said: This bill is for the purpose of incorporating this association which has for its object the obtaining of various samples of minerals and metals for the purpose of giving information respecting the products of this country. It is necessary that this bill be passed in order to allow the gentlemen interested in the proposed organization to carry out their praiseworthy object.

The bill was read the second time.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (M): "An Act further to amend the Companies Act."

(In the Committee.)

On sub-clause b of clause 1.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I should like to place this case before the hon. gentleman: in British Columbia there is a clerk acting for the Receiver General. Is he to be a judge as to when he should return these moneys? How is he to take evidence, and to be satisfied that the organization has not been completed? This bill constitutes him a judge, and could a clerk in any outlying district undertake to settle questions of this kind? I can understand a case here in Ottawa being all right, because the Receiver General is here and has lawyers at his elbow to tell him the legal mode he should adopt.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that subsection (a) provides that "such aggregate shall be deposited to the credit of the Receiver General of Canada, and shall be standing at such credit in some chartered bank in Canada," that is the position in which the money is when deposited; and then clause (b) says: "At any time after the signing of letters patent incorporating the applicants as a company the said aggregate, so paid in to the credit of the Receiver General and for the sole use of the company." He will require the production of the necessary evidence, which would be the letters patent: that is, if the company fail to become organized, then the money is to be returned to the contributors. My hon. friend will see that the provision is as simple as it can be; it differs very little from the provision as it exists, except that the money is a deposit that stands to the credit of the proposed company in the hands of the Receiver General until the letters patent are issued, and then it is paid over to the officers, on the production of the letters patent, that are designated by the company as the proper parties to receive it. We are making no attempt to regulate the business of the companies. We are not undertaking to manage their affairs; we are not interfering with the rights of the public; we are simply, in the initial steps that are taken by a company to obtain letters patent, seeing that the acts done are a real and not illusory compliance with the provisions of the law. My hon. friend will see that in this regard the proposed bill does not differ from the statute as it now stands, except that the payment is to the Receiver General instead of to some officer of the company or trustee designated for the purpose.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is no trouble about depositing the money in the bank, but the trouble is to get that money out of the bank in a legal way, and a young officer charged with that duty might not be able to do it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There will be no trouble on that score; the Receiver General, or his agent, will see that the parties comply with the law.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It can be tried.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But all that has to be done now, with the exception of depositing the money with the Receiver General.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How will this avoid an illusory deposit of the character to which my hon. friend refers? In making a deposit of the percentage necessary to enable them to apply for letters patent, that is made under the solemn affidavit of the parties who have made the deposit, and unless they commit perjury direct, palpable and wilful, there could be no such thing, to my mind, as an illusory deposit of the money.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There have been many such.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am sorry to hear that, because, if they did, the parties who made it committed perjury.

The point I wish to receive a little more light upon is that to which my hon. friend referred when the bill was before the House before. He mentioned a case in Brantford in which the moneys had been withdrawn and handed back, as I understood him, to the parties who made the deposit before the letters patent had been obtained; and in the meantime they had received money from other stockholders, which was misappropriated. If that is correct I cannot understand, under the law as it stands on the statute book, how that could be accomplished.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not before the letters patent were applied for; but my hon. friend knows that the application is always made for letters patent and the affidavit is made before they are issued, and it is after all those facts are established, for the information or satisfaction of the officer to whom the application is made under the provision of the statute, and before they are received, that the moneys may be dealt with.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend point out to the House what public end will be served in the repayment of this money to the parties who advanced same immediately subsequent to the issue of letters patent. Assuming for the moment that the practice has been to repay the money to the parties advancing it before the issue of the letters patent, my own knowledge—and I have some knowledge on this point—is that the practice observed in the formation of companies of this character has been to leave the money in the bank till the issue of the letters patent; but the hon. Minister of Justice has stated that cases have come under his observation in which the money has been paid out previous to the issue of the letters patent. Now, the slight degree in time is almost unimportant for this reason: the present Act provides that within a month after the last notice the affidavit must be made that ten per cent has been paid in and practically that the money stands there to the credit of or for the company. If the money is simply to go back after the issue of the letters patent to the channels from which it came I am certainly at a loss to understand what good aim can be served by this legislation. I am in favour of assisting legislation of this character because I think that there is room for an amendment to the Act, but if an amendment to the Act is to be made it seems to me that some machinery should be introduced into the act by which those funds should be conserved for the purposes of the company, and some prohibition should be placed upon the promoters of the company repaying that money to the channels from which it came, excepting the money is for the legitimate purposes of the company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the formation of companies, after a month's notice is given, the papers are prepared and sent in to the Department of State. They are always accompanied, when in proper form, by a declaration or certificate from the manager of some bank that the ten per cent stands in the name of "A" and "B" in trust for the company. A delay of three or four weeks usually takes place in the preparation of the necessary documents. A good deal of correspondence is involved: the papers are frequently defective, and they have to be supervised, under present practice, by the Department of Finance and the Department of State. When the company is formed, it may be found that the money has been withdrawn. Of course, the Crown has no knowledge of that. The officials see that on a certain day the money was deposited, but there is no evidence that it continued to remain in the bank, that is, if placed in the hands of trustees. They may withdraw it any time. They may deposit it to-day, forward the certificate to the department and to-morrow withdraw the money, and when the company receive the letters patent there may not be a penny to their credit.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the new directors may know nothing about it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is the party who gets up the organization that may withdraw the money. You cannot say that he is guilty of a fraud, though it is a dishonourable thing to do. As the law stands, he can do it without committing an offence. Where the money has been deposited to the credit of the company, the fraud cannot be perpetrated, but where it is to the credit of trustees the money may be withdrawn, and this provision is for the purpose of keeping the money under proper control until the company has been organized, and it can only then be withdrawn on presentation of the letters patent and on the signature of the proper officers.

The clause was adopted.

On subsection C.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice that in paragraph "C," lines 30 and 31 says the deed is to be held by two trustees for the company. I do not know why it should be limited to two. You might have three.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We might say two or more.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then I move that we insert "or more."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the difference between this and the old law?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There was nothing in the old but "trustees."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—All this is one subsection in the old law, and the concluding part is now subsection "C."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I ask the hon. Minister of Justice why this is limited to real estate? Cases have come under my observation, and I fancy under the observation of almost all hon. gentlemen, who have had to do with this class of business, that, promoters of a company will organize a company and turn over to that company personal estate of very considerable value, and yet there is no provision by which that personal estate, say it be a manufacturing concern, shall pass into the hands of the company in the same way as real estate will do. It will be observed from subsection "C"—and in fact is the present law under subsection 5 of section 5—that one-half of the aggregate may be taken in as paid if it is bona fide invested in real estate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is the law as it stands.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED — Why it should be limited to real estate I am at a loss to understand, because most of those concerns which are organized are organized on the basis of a going concern, such as a manufacturing plant being turned into the company, and that manufacturing plant accepted as so much stock, but no provision is made for that class of property.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not venture to make any alteration in the law. I have just one object in view, and that is to see that parties organizing a company comply with the law up to organization, and once they are organized they are responsible to the parties with whom they deal. Clause "C" does not alter the law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not say that it does.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is precisely as it is in this bill. There would be very great difficulty in ascertaining the value of personal estate sometimes, and my hon. friend speaks of machinery and so on. If it is kept with a proprietory interest it might be regarded as a part of the realty, but in any event there is a great deal of personalty of such a transitory character, and so much subject to waste, that I suppose it was not regarded as safe by those who had large experience in these matters to undertake to extend this provision further than it is found in the law as it now is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the point of my hon. friend is met in this way; you form a company what might be called a "going concern." After the company is formed, then the owner of the personal estate sells it to the company and gets so much cash, in some cases, and so much stock, so that the personalty is transferred to the company and the owner in this way gets his pay.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But the difficulty is in turning in going concerns into such an organization.

The clause was adopted as amended.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

DEPARTMENT OF GEOLOGICAL SURVEY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (114) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Department of Geological Survey." He said: It frequently becomes necessary to appoint for temporary service gentlemen connected with the geological department for the purpose of making an exploration for mineralogists or geologists, or gentlemen who may be conversent with these matters to report on several parts of the country, and this bill is to provide that under the circumstances the minister may appoint, on the requisition of the deputy head or director of the department, such an official, and that he need not pass the civil service examination. There is ample precedent for such legislation, as officers having special qualifications rarely are required to pass the civil service examinations. It is not to be supposed that the examiners are experts in some of the special scientific subjects that special officers are appointed for.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is a strange provision in the second clause of this bill. It provides that the person so appointed may be paid at the rate of more than $400 a year. It might be $4,000 a year under that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No limit on that side. As it is now you cannot appoint an ordinary clerk. The late government made certain changes and abolished the third class clerkship, so now you cannot appoint a clerk at more than $400.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it necessary that the appointment should be made under the Civil Service Act?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, this is to relieve the department of the necessity for making the appointments under the Civil Service Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then why should you make the Civil Service Act apply?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You cannot appoint a temporary clerk under $400 at the present time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is under the Civil Service Act?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; a clerk of any kind. You cannot appoint a temporary clerk now drawing a higher salary than $400, and you cannot appoint him unless he has passed the civil service examination.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But you can appoint a clerk at any salary, up as high as a chief clerkship, if he possesses technical knowledge, and it is so represented to the government by the head of the department. The present government has acted on that principle. The hon. gentleman is in error—I say so respectfully—in saying that no clerk can be appointed except at $400. You can appoint a second-class clerk at $1,100, providing he has passed the examination and he has technical knowledge which brings him within the law, because the law provides for appointing a clerk in any capacity, or in any grade, in any department, if he has the knowledge necessary for that purpose. For instance, the Minister of Militia appointed an accountant at the highest possible salary given to a chief clerk. He had never passed any examination.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, he had not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There may be some technical reason why this provision is necessary in order to enable the hon. gentleman to make such appointments.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The point is this: The Auditor General assumes that parties who are appointed for technical purposes belong to one or other of the classes mentioned. The opinion expressed in my department is that the person appointed on account of technical fitness is a class by himself, and therefore is not of the second or first-class, or a chief clerk, and that his salary is not regulated in the way that the statute provides for the regulation of the salaries of those who are called second or first-class, or chief clerks, and therefore it was necessary to make some provision.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the construction which has been put upon the law always, but in this case you make a provision for appointing a person to a particular staff and you take the power to give him a higher salary than the minimum salary, provided he has a technical knowledge necessary to do the work on the geological survey. I think it is a good provision. I am not objecting to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because you think the regulation as to salaries applies to those who are classified clerks and not to others.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It seems to me extraordinary that the government should take power to employ a man at more than $400, and place no limit to it. Should it not be at a salary not exceeding so much? That would be more business like. You may employ him at $4,000. Cannot you make some limit?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that we always come down to parliament for money, and parliament has always control over the amount.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—But you take the power in your own hands and you must employ at a salary exceeding $400. Is there any way of saying the limit shall be any particular sum?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, you cannot regulate the salary. The man might only be employed for a month.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Say that you cannot pay more than a certain sum.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then they would all want the full amount.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not provide that the person so appointed as a deputy assistant shall possess any technical knowledge. You may appoint a labourer if you like and send him on the geological survey with one of your explorers, say Dr. Dawson, and all he might have to do would be to carry luggage on his back.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is provided for in the Civil Service Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This places the appointee outside of the provisions of the Civil Service Act, and it says:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act or any Act in amendment thereof it shall not be necessary that any person appointed a temporary assistant under the next preceding section shall have passed any examination under the Civil Service Act, and such person may be paid at the rate of more than $400 a year.

You can scarcely obtain a man with the technical knowledge necessary to be an assistant on a staff of that kind, unless he has it, but this does not confine the appointment, if I read it correctly. You could appoint a hod carrier under this clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Clause one reads:

> That upon the requisition of the deputy head and director of the department, the minister may employ such number of temporary assistants as are necessary, having the qualifications requisite for appointment as technical officers of the department under section 4 of the Act respecting the Department of the Geological Survey.

He must be a scientist, graduate of either a Canadian or foreign University, or the Mining School of London, or some other recognized Science School.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—What do you pay?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Just according to their value.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Cannot you establish a value?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, we do not know who they are. The men are appointed temporarily and it would be impossible to establish a value.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There can be no objection to the main purpose of this measure, but I hope the Secretary of State will be prepared, when the House goes into committee on this bill, to show that this clause two is absolutely necessary. I have always been a very strong advocate of enforcing the Civil Service Act, while I am reasonably ready to be shown that such a provision as is contained in this second clause is necessary.

SAFETY OF CERTAIN FISHERMEN BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

A message was received from the House of Commons to return Bill (G): "An Act for better securing the Safety of Certain Fishermen," with several amendments.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I propose to ask the House to concur in the amendments, and I may as well briefly explain what they are and let the House deal with them now. Page one, line four, leave out from "place" to "set" in line five. The amendment is to leave out the words "be launched or." Then in line six, the second amendment, "after the first fishing" insert "or be launched therefrom." The original stood, "shall be launched or set out from any vessel," etc. They propose to make it read, "set out or be launched therefrom." The third amendment: in line ten, leave out "and" and insert "to be." The original reads "unless there is placed in such boat and retained therein during absence from such vessel," and the amendment is "to be placed in such boat to be retained therein." Then line eleven leave out from "vessel" to "serviceable" and insert "a". The original reads "such vessel an accurate and serviceable mariner's compass" and they have left out the words "accurate." A mariner's compass, if it is not accurate is not serviceable and if it is not serviceable, is not of much use. Line 16, after "serviceable," insert "mariners." The bill read before "the owner of such vessel shall supply her at the commencement of her voyage with as many serviceable compasses as she carries boats," and the amendment is to insert the word "mariner's." It should be a mariner's compass to be serviceable at sea. The next amendment is line 18, after "a" insert "serviceable." She is to be provided with necessary utensils to hold water—a serviceable fog-horn or trumpet. Line 30, "this Act shall come into force and effect on and after the first day of October, 1898." We in this House, hon. gentlemen, are sometimes twitted with our tendency to make amendments which are merely verbal and not substantial. I venture to say that the amendments which the House of Commons have made to this bill, with the exception of the last, are quite equal in that respect to any amendments which this House has ever made to a bill coming from the Commons.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (N) "An Act to amend the Canada Evidence Act."—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY PURCHASE.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The Notice of Inquiry being called by the Hon. Mr. Wood, that he will inquire of the government:

1. Whether they will, during the present session, introduce legislation to ratify the agreement made with the Grand Trunk Railway bearing date the 1st February, 1898, and lately laid before Parliament?
2. Whether the government will, during the present session, introduce legislation to authorize the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, or consent to an agreement for the purchase of the same?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Will the hon. gentleman let this notice stand?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can the hon. leader of the House give us information as to when he will probably be able to answer these questions? Or can he tell us what measures of any importance are likely to come before the Senate before the prorogation of Parliament? It is usual, I believe, for the leaders of the government in both Houses, to indicate what may be expected, in order that the members will be better able to judge, not only of the length of the session, but of the character and importance of the measures which may be laid before them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not able to answer with regard to all the measures that may be yet laid before us, but will do so in a day or two. My hon. friend knows there is the Franchise Bill. There is the Superannuation Bill and the Plebiscite Bill which are before the House of Commons but which we expect to be laid before us in this House at an early day. They are measures in the hands of the government that will be before the Senate some time during the week. Then there is a very short Bill providing for the appointment of additional judges in conformity with the Acts passed by the provinces during the past session, which will necessarily be before us and perhaps one or two other measures, which I can give the hon. gentleman more definitely in the course of a week.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWLLL—Some little time ago the hon gentleman intimated to the House that it was his intention to introduce a bill providing for the government of the Yukon Territory.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, that is one of the measures.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The government have been remiss in not introducing more of their measures in this House. In the past few years before the accession to office of the hon. gentlemen, several very important measures were brought here, and the Senate had plenty of time to consider them while the lower House were discussing what I may call the political aspect of affairs, and if the hon gentleman would follow that practice, there are a number of bills to which he has referred which we might just as well have been discussing here, thereby saving time. It has been too much the practice in the past to bring down all important measures at the close of the session, when all of us desire to go home, and when they have really nothing to do in the Lower House, and if we delay them, there is a great deal of fault found. I may safely say to the hon. gentleman that when those measures of importance, to which I have alluded, and which he has indicated, will come before us the Senate will have to take full time for their consideration, even if they delay the prorogation of the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have no fault to find with the observations of the hon. gentleman. I entirely agree with him, and my experience here for a great many years confirms me in the view which he has expressed. I know since 1878 a large number of measures have been introduced in parliament at a very late period of the session. I think it is desirable to introduce the measures at as early a day as possible. Upon that point my hon. friend and myself in theory agree.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Let us try and do it in practice.

Hon. Mr, MILLS—Well, I cannot say much for the practice of my hon. friend. Then let me say further, that with regard to the Franchise bill, my hon. friend will admit it is a measure which must necessarily be introduced in the other House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not necessarily the plebiscite.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then I told my hon. friend that we would introduce the Yukon Bill very soon, and there will be ample time for its consideration. Certainly some day during the present week the measure will be introduced here.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND THE DOMINION GOVERNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P. E. I.) moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all correspondence and memorials from the members of the provincial government of Prince Edward Island who composed the recent delegation from that province ; and will inquire what action the Federal government have taken in response to such applications ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say to my hon. friend that as I see that the papers he refers to are proposed to be brought down from the other House, we will certainly make no objection to comply with my hon. friend's request to bring down the communications and memorials which we have received from the local government of Prince Edward Island. I may say that the Federal government have taken no action on the subject as yet, in fact we have been too much occupied with the work of the session to give to this subject the consideration its importance requires. The usual practice in the Imperial parliament in all matters of this sort is not to bring down communications which have been received till after they have been answered and dealt with, so that the whole case might be before the legislature and the country when the papers are published ; but as it is proposed to bring them down in the House of Commons I see no reason why they may not be brought down here, and so far as we can comply with the hon. gentleman's request it shall be complied with.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to Call the attention of the government to the following utterances made on the 2nd of May, 1898, by the Honourable the Secretary of State :—

"Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman must be aware that the present government have settled the school question with Manitoba.

"Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

"Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have adopted the same channels to settle that question as the late government did. The late government sent delegates to Manitoba, and had a conference, and failed to come to any agreement. The present government had a conference with representatives of the government of Manitoba, and they came to an agreement, which was confirmed by the Manitoba legislature, and that is the end of it, so far as the public are concerned."

And inquired :

1. In what position did the Federal Executive stand towards the litigating parties, the Manitoba Government on the one side, and the Catholic minority on the other? Was it the position of a judge before whose tribunal the debated question had been brought, and who had rendered a decision known as the Remedial Order?

2. Did the present Government in holding a conference with the Government of Manitoba treat simultaneously with the other litigating party, the Catholic minority?

3. Was that minority a party to the said conference, and has the agreement arrived at been accepted by the Catholic minority?

4. If not, do the Government really consider that an agreement to which the Catholic minority has not even been a party, but which has been arrived at without its participation, outside its knowledge, and contrary to its interests, may be considered an agreement that puts an end to the Manitoba School difficulties, as stated by the hon. Secretary of State?

5. Is the statement made by the Honourable Secretary of State accepted by the Government?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have given repeatedly the fullest information that the hon. gentleman can claim under the rules of parliament as to the action the government have taken, and I speak for the government in this chamber, and beyond that the hon. gentleman has no right to catechise me; moreover, his questions are in some respects debatable ones which open up matters that have been in litigation, and he is not entitled to ask me questions of the kind.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am not asking the Secretary of State, I am asking the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am answering for the government.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know how the hon. gentleman could say——.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am in order. The mere fact the hon. minister cries "order" does not make me out of order. I have asked the question of the Minister and I want an answer. I want to know if the minority was a party to that conference? The government is able to tell me whether it has or has not been such a party.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—That is fair.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the hon. gentleman unable to tell me whether the minority has or has not been a party to that conference?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman had his answer: the matter was settled by the government of Manitoba at the instance of the Federal government of Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But does not the hon. minister think that the hon. gentleman has a right to an answer to the simple question as to whether the minority were consulted in that settlement?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think he has. Who are the Catholic minority?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You ought to know.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—One of the litigating parties.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a great difference of opinion as to that; the Catholic minority might be divided. However, I am not going to debate it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not going to discuss that question now; neither am I aware that the Catholic minority has been divided on the question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But as to the method of settling the question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What I want to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to is this: In the question asked, reference was made to the answer to the former government, and it is stated that they had a conference with the Greenway government. I can say to the hon. gentleman that when they had a conference with the Greenway government on this very important question, they consulted the minority at the same time, as to what would be acceptable to them under the circumstances; as under the circumstances, the late government believed they had been deprived of certain constitutional rights. The hon. gentleman simply asks this, a very fair question, I think: was the minority consulted, either directly or indirectly, in what he terms the settlement of that question? I think that is a fair question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman shakes his head. Does he mean that my position is not a just one?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I had an opinion on the subject, and I often expressed that opinion on the floor of parliament. I had an opinion as to how that settlement should be made. The government acted upon the opinion that they had formed as to the best mode of settling this question.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Was the Catholic minority represented in the interview that the late government had in Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I submit to the hon. speaker that this question is not one of which notice has been given, and besides that, these questions contain controverted facts, and are therefore out of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Did the hon. gentleman say "contrary to facts?"

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Controverted facts.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am asking a simple question; I am asking if such or such a thing is or is not a fact. There is nothing controverted about that. I am asking if the minority were represented. Can the hon. gentleman tell me if it is a fact or not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not going to answer the hon. gentleman's questions. They are entirely out of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—You think so.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I wish to enter my protest against the remarks of the hon. leader of the House that no discussion can take place on this question. There is no use in having that point raised on every question of this kind that comes up. It has been several times decided by the chair.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is mistaken. These questions have been put, though not strictly in order, and have been answered, and my hon. friend has had this same group of questions upon the paper at least half a dozen times.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a controverted fact.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not putting it, however, as a question to my hon friend, but I do submit, Mr. Speaker, that the whole series of these questions contains controverted matter—facts which may be questioned, and therefore they ought not to be put.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would the hon. gentleman indicate the desirability of pointing out facts that are admitted? It is only controversial facts that would necessarily come up in such cases. If we all agreed upon the facts, there would be no necessity for discussing them.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The great fact is that the question was settled. That is the trouble with some hon. gentlemen. Their whole stock in trade has been taken away from them.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman is in the minority in this case. He can give an answer.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is it a controverted fact when I ask this question: was the Catholic minority a party to said agreement?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I ask the hon. Speaker for his decision.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am open to conviction, but I want to be convinced. How could you convince me that my question contains controverted facts? By assertion or by argument?

The SPEAKER—When a Minister is asked a question and when he declares to the House that he has answered it, and professess to have answered it fully, I know of no rule by which the Speaker could coerce a Minister to answer any more questions, and I believe that all other questions which follow that are entirely out of order.

MINERS' LICENSES AT SKAGWAY AND DYEA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) Rose to

Direct the attention of the Government to injury which will result to the towns of Victoria, Vancouver and Nanaimo from the directions recently given by the Minister of the Interior for the issue of miners' licenses by the Dominion custom house at the boundary line near Skagway and Dyea.

He said: Last winter the Minister of the Interior very properly gave directions for the issue of licenses at the towns of Vancouver, Victoria and Nanaimo, which resulted in great benefit to those towns. Thousands of passengers landed there who would not otherwise have done so and spent their money for supplies, and left with the government also, for licenses $100,000. The government could control that money at a day's notice. Now, I believe the minister has given instructions that miners may get their licenses at the places I have mentioned in my notice. According to the present regulations, persons going to the Klondike gold mines can pass Victoria or Vancouver altogether—need not call there at all, and it will be a great injury to those towns if that trade is diverted. I hope the minister will be able to tell me that these regulations are only temporary, and that the rule which prevailed last year will be enforced, so that miners will call at those towns, and Canadian towns will have the benefit of the trade as they had last winter and spring.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say to my hon. friend that the issue of miners' licenses within the territory of the Yukon was deferred by the government just as long as possible. Several people have gone directly from San Francisco and through United States territory to the Yukon country. They have sailed for Dyea and Skagway and landed there, and then proceeded on their journey. They had to obtain their licenses within the territory or they could not get them at all. We have not issued licenses in the United States territory. They have been issued within Canadian territory, and my hon. friend, so far as I know, has not assigned any definite or valid reason why these people should be compelled to go to Victoria or to Vancouver for their licenses rather than go into the Yukon country where the mining operations are to be carried on. We have been endeavouring to make satisfactory arrangements for ingress to that country through United States territory, and in order to do so we were obliged, as we were asking for concessions from the United States government, not to subject them to unusual inconvenience on our part. I should have liked very much myself to have seen the people entering the country from some Canadian point, and pursuing their journey on Canadian territory, but my hon. friend knows that by the success of his motion in this House he has put it out of our power, for the present at all events, to accomplish that result. I think it is unfortunate, but my hon. friend took a different view, and the matter of which he complains is, to some extent, the result of his own action.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman cannot forget that matter. It is said of Queen Mary she said that when she died they would find Calais written on her heart, and when my hon. friend dies they will find Yukon written on his brain. There is no use going back to that question till the government revives it again, which I hope they will do at a very early date. The hon. Minister of the Interior saw the force of the contention of these people living on the sea coast. It would give a great deal of trade to them and it would not hurt the Dominion in the least. We could not expect those who went to Skagway and Dyea without being aware of the fact to come back to Victoria for a license.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Licenses might be issued at the sea coast towns.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—How would those people that you refer to get licenses?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They will get them at Dawson and other parts of the country. If the hon. gentleman wants to drive the trade past Victoria he can do so. I do not want it done.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—These licenses are not issued in United States territory.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I know that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What possible difference can it make to my hon. friend, and those on whose behalf he speaks, whether these licenses are issued at Bennett Lake, just within our own territory, or issued at Dawson, 300 miles further north? The moment they go as far north as Dyea they are altogether past Victoria. That is a point which my hon. friend loses sight of.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think the government should be as open to conviction on this point as I am: it is a benefit to the trade of those towns. The hon. gentleman can see that if four or five steamers call at Vancouver and Victoria and a number of men land, it helps the trade of the whole country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We get their money when they get to the boundary.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—But the towns do not get any benefit from it. The men spend money in outfitting and in other ways, but now we will lose those benefits. But of course the government are determined to keep to their plans.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman made an important statement of which we should have more information. He says they have been in negotiation with the U. S. authorities in order to obtain certain concessions, I presume bonding privileges, by which we can enter the Yukon territory through United States ports and that it was necessary to make concessions to those of the United States who are going to that country in order to obtain some privileges in return for our concessions. Could he inform us whether, in making these concessions, he has obtained anything in return in the way of bonding or any other privileges which are incident to trade in other parts of the world, because the present regulation for granting the miners' certificates inures entirely to the benefit of the citizens of the United States, or those who sail direct by the Alaska Transportation Company's steamers from the United States ports, and if we have made a concession by which our towns and cities on the Pacific coast are deprived of certain trade which would inure to them if the old system prevailed, then we ought to know whether we have obtained anything in return ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend I think assumes what would be a matter of controversy. Suppose a man goes on board a boat at San Francisco, he may sail to Dyea and get his license, after he enters Canadian territory, for the purpose of mining, if that be the object with which he is going. My hon. friend says do not issue any licenses in the territory.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not say anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It means that or nothing : do not issue any licenses in the territory, issue them only at some point on the Canadian coast, either at Vancouver or Victoria, compel the man on board the United States vessel to run into the port of Vancouver in order to get his license. You may put him to great inconvenience in that way. There is no doubt about that. What do you gain by it ? He has his outfit before he starts. You do not in the slightest degree help the trade in any way. You only delay him on his journey and put him to a certain amount of trouble in order that he may get a licence there instead of getting one within our own territory at the end of his journey. I do not see anything in the world to be gained by that, but I do see that we lose by it. We subject a number of Americans to a very great deal of vexation and they complain to their own government, and you invite retaliation. That is one of the things, under existing circumstances, seeing that we are confined largely to the use of a route through United States territory that we think it is desirable to avoid.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has answered me very much as he did the gentleman who put the question to him just now, which is no answer at all. You have gone all round the stump, but you have not touched the point. I asked whether you had made any concessions or any promise of concessions, or was there any probability of receiving any in consideration of what you have done in order to facilitate the entrance into that country of people from the United States.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I supposed the hon. gentleman had risen to speak to the question of my hon. friend—not to put another question to me, not to stuff into the stomach of my hon. friend's question another expression : but I may say, in reply to the question which the hon. gentleman has put, that we do expect—that we have been promised concessions, and some of those concessions have been made. We have no doubt all will be agreed to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I object in toto to the interpretation put upon my language and to the manner in which it has been received. The hon. Minister, in replying to the hon. gentleman from Victoria, made a certain statement as to the reasons why they had adopted a certain policy, and I was not stuffing anything into his stomach because I asked him an explanation upon that point. That is all I did. He may term it controversial, or just what he pleases, but when a minister makes a statement and gives a reason for the course he has pursued, surely members of the House have a right, without being treated discourteously, to ask him a question as to these reasons. Perhaps, after the hon gentleman has been a little longer in power, he will learn to be a little more courteous.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is generally good humoured, but he probably did not hear the hon. Minister of Justice say, Yes, concessions were to be made.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, that came after. That was said in the last speech and not in the first.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No. I understood the hon. minister to do so. He can say whether he said it or not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend is always ready to come to the rescue.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. minister does not need any one to come to the rescue; I simply speak as a member of the House, because I feel certain the hon. leader of the Opposition would not use as energetic language as he has done if he supposed the question had been answered at first.

ALIEN LABOUR LAW OFFICERS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—inquired of the government:

Whether officers have been appointed to enforce the provisions of the Alien Labour Law? If so, who the persons are so appointed, and in what part of Canada do they reside?

He said: I may say that I had not seen the answer which the Premier gave in the other House when I put the question. Still I ask the question because it goes further than the answer which was given by the Premier.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The following is the list of agents appointed under "The Alien Labour Act:"

A. C. Paterson	Act. Sub-Collector Customs.	North Portal, N.W.T.
H. Tennant	do do	Coutts, N.W.T.
J. A. McMartin	do do	Huntingdon, B.C.
A. Lawrence	do do	Gretna, Man.
T. J. Mather	Acting Officer	do
G. G. Allen	Preventive Officer	Emerson, Man.
W. Mills	Acting Officer	do
W. F. McCreary	Immigration Commissioner	Winnipeg, Man.
James Lawson	Collector Customs.	Fort Erie.
Robert Rush	Provinc'l Constable	Sault Ste. Marie, Ont.
Arthur Boyle	Collector Customs.	Niagara Falls, Ont.
Jas. H. Kenning	Collector of Inland Revenue	Windsor, Ont.
F. Spain		Bridgeburg, Ont.

We have had a good deal of correspondence from these parties on the subject, and the correspondence shows that the law has not been always rightly apprehended. Of course, the government, in enforcing the Act, can only enforce it in the case of contracts made out of the country with persons in a country whose law imposes disabilities similar to those for which our law provides. The Canadian statute is purely a defensive measure. It does not undertake to impose any disability on foreigners or on contracts made with labourers in a foreign country where there is no disability imposed on Canadians. It applies only to the citizens of those countries where disabilities are imposed on Canadian people.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then no one has been appointed in the city of Toronto.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no name in Toronto on the list given to me; I think however there is a party in Toronto.

REPORTS FROM COMMISSIONER WALSH.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to remind the hon. leader of the House that some weeks ago I had a notice on the order paper asking that the government might lay on the table of this House any correspondence or report from Commissioner Walsh relating to his administration of affairs in the Yukon country, or in that section. Now at that time my hon. friend informed me that there was no correspondence. Doubtless by this time there will be correspondence on that subject. As we are promised an important measure relating to the government of the Yukon country, might I ask my hon. friend, the leader of the House, whether any reports received from Commissioner Walsh, or any other information which the government may have relating to that country, will be laid on the table of this House before the measure is brought up for discussion?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I may have said at that time that there was no correspondence, but shortly afterwards I made application to the Department of Interior, and they sent over all the correspondence which was not of a confidential nature, which I brought down and laid on the table. It was not very material. It was at the time he was at Salmon River, so that communication could not be got through. I think it came down when the hon. gentleman was away.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—All I want is that if there should be any further information, important for this House to know, we should have it.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—On the 17th March I made a motion with reference to the employment of W. H. Sowden as immigration agent, praying that His Excellency would cause to be laid before the Senate a detailed account by the Department of the Interior of the expenses allowed to W. H. Sowden, immigration agent, and the names of all persons who, in consequence of Mr. Sowden's work in the midland counties, went to the North-west, and other matters. I inquired to-day and found that no return had yet been brought down, but there are other items in the request which was made that might possibly take some time to ascertain. My hon. friend was kind enough, on a former occasion, to give some instalments of some returns which I had asked for.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are all down now.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I thought perhaps the hon. gentleman might not object to give me an instalment of this return. The part I am anxious about is the detailed account of the Department of the Interior of the items of expense allowed to W. H. Sowden, and I would ask the hon. gentleman, not in a captious spirit, but in a spirit of love, to allow me to have that information before the other is brought down.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will apply to the department about it.

PACIFIC AND YUKON RAILWAY AND MINING NAVIGATION COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

The Order of the Day being called :—

Second Reading Bill (F) "An Act to incorporate the Pacific and Yukon Railway, Navigation and Mining Company," together with the motion in amendment of the Honourable Mr. Mills "that the said bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED said : This bill has appeared so long and so frequently on the Orders of the day that I am desirous that the House should make some disposition of it. As hon. gentlemen will doubtless recollect, in the latter end of March the debate upon the bill was adjourned, in fact the second reading of the bill stood adjourned from that time down to the present. I was careful not to obtrude the second reading of this bill during the time which has elapsed since the latter end of March on this chamber, from a desire to permit the government to announce to the country any new policy which they might have on the construction of the enterprise which at the beginning of this session they had in view, namely the Yukon road. I appreciate the importance of such an enterprise, and though differing in a very radical way from the views expressed by the government on this subject, yet I recognized the desirability of in no way embarrassing the action of the government in regard to any new policy which they might think fit to pursue in view of the late defeat which the Yukon Bill met in this House. The days of the session are approaching a close—at least I hope so—and it is therefore not unreasonable that the promoters of this bill should desire some expression of parliament in regard to whether this bill for the construction of a Yukon road should be adopted or not. Now during the time which has elapsed since the defeat of the Teslin Lake bill, every opportunity has been afforded the government to make further inquiry into the carrying out of such an enterprise as was then contemplated and to obtain such information as would be of value to the government and of interest to this House and the country in regard to a modified bill for the carrying out of that undertaking. Various questions have been asked from time to time, not only in this House but in the other branch of parliament, regarding this subject, and so far as we can ascertain no steps of a definite character have been taken by the government to secure such information as would be desirable for this House to form a judgment upon. So far as we can ascertain, the only additional step which was taken since that time in any way to secure information—and we know how scarce information was in regard to this enterprise—was the sending of the chief engineer of the Department of Public Works to that section of the country for the purpose of making a new inquiry into this subject and reporting to his government. Now, although inquiry was made some weeks ago for the report, if any, which that gentleman had prepared, yet we were surprised to learn—I may have misapprehended the answer given by the minister—that that gentleman had not even been requested to prepare a report to submit to his government, or even to submit to this House; therefore, in view of that fact, we cannot come to any other conclusion than that we are not to receive any further information in reference to the building of this road.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Mr. Jennings's report had reference to this road; he made a report on it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I might say to the hon. gentleman from Marquette (Mr. Boulton) I am aware of that fact, but during the course of the debate the very great scarcity of information on the subject was accentuated, and that with considerable force, from the fact that the only report on the route was made by Mr. Jennings, and it of necessity had to be of a very casual nature. But as I have said, ample time has elapsed between that period and the present so that definite information might be secured that this House could be seized of more valuable knowledge than at present it is seized of. Now it seems to me that two conclusions must necessarily be drawn from the delay which has taken place on the part of the government on this question since the withdrawal of this bill from public discussion, one of which conclusions is, that the government does not intend to take any further action on this subject, does not intend to bring down to parliament another bill, does not intend to enunciate any new policy on the building of a road into the Yukon district. So much time has elapsed, as I have said, as to justify us in coming to that conclusion, and to justify the promoters of this bill, even though the government may not desire its second reading to be pressed, in concluding that, as the government intend to take no further steps, they are therefore entitled to have this bill proceeded with and, if this House sees fit, to pass on its second reading. There is another conclusion that may be drawn from the very great delay which has taken place. The fact that no publicity has been given to the proposed action of the government on this subject, has not prevented vague reports being circulated around the chambers of parliament within the last few days, that a new bill is in the process of incubation and that it may possibly see the light at a very early date. Now if that be the case, one cannot fail to express his condemnation of the government remaining absolutely quiescent in regard to so important an undertaking for so long a period and not seeking to secure public proposals and tenders for carrying out so great and so important a work as the one under consideration. I say that if a new bill is to be brought down and taken into consideration, so splendid an opportunity has been given to the government to ask from the public, not only in Canada but elsewhere, for proposals for the building of this road, or to ask for tenders from contractors for the construction of the undertaking as to fill the public mind with grave apprehension as to the honesty of purpose of the government in pursuing such a policy. Now we know very well that the government at this juncture cannot urge the reasons which were so strongly urged when the Mackenzie-Mann bill was first introduced, namely, the extraordinary conditions which faced them in the opening up of that new country, conditions which threatened starvation, conditions which threatened such a plethora of trade as to paralyze commercial channels in all directions if some new channel were not opened up for the purpose of carrying the immense volume of trade that was expected to go into that country.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B C.)—And also the annexation of the territory by United States miners.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And the further consideration, as the hon. gentleman from Victoria has pointed out, of that vast country becoming absorbed in the American union to the south of us. We know that all those reasons were strongly urged upon this chamber in the forcible and eloquent language of the hon. Minister of Justice and had some effect towards producing a conviction, in some quarters, that that bill on that occasion should have been carried. Now I say that all these reasons which I have enumerated, and I have mentioned only a few of them, have disappeared; therefore none of these reasons can be urged at this juncture for the bringing down to parliament at so late a period of the session a new bill for the construction of this road which in no way has seen the light of day up to the present, and which apparently is not to be submitted to public competition in any way for proposals and tenders. Therefore I say we are driven to one of two conclusions by reason of this bill, namely, that no other bill is to be brought down or that another bill is to be brought down surrounded and invested with all the objectionable features which marked the bill which this chamber in its wisdom saw fit to pronounce against. Now, hon. gentlemen have no doubt closely looked into the bill of which I have the honour to move the second reading. It is well known that the intention of the promoters is to construct a line of railway along the Dalton trail from the Lynn Canal to a point known as the Five Finger Rapids, and within sixty miles of Fort Selkirk, which I understand has been decided upon by the government to be the centre of the Yukon district, the capital of government. It would be unwise for me to direct the attention of this House to the various reasons which have been urged by the government against the adoption of this route. This phase of the subject has been so thoroughly thrashed out in this House, has been so thoroughly investigated and so strongly pronounced against by the hon. leader of the government in this House, that I need not refresh your minds by recalling the various reasons which have been urged against the bill. Permit me, however, to say—and the government, I hope, will be quite prepared to concede the fact—that the trend of public opinion has not only pronounced against the route adopted by the government, but public opinion has pronounced most emphatically upon the desirability and the practicability of the route embodied in the bill which we have now under consideration. No two opinions have been expressed in railway circles, in shipping circles, in commercial circles, or in political circles, so far as I can ascertain, except it be from the present government, as to the desirability of this route; and we find this fact admitted by the present government. The hon. gentleman the Minister of Justice, in the reply he has made to the question of my hon. friend from Victoria, concedes that the whole trend of travel is by way of the Lynn Canal. And to such an extent do we find this to be the case that the government have concluded it to be a desirable thing to issue miners' licenses on the boundary line at the Lynn Canal, so that the immense volume of travel which is going in that way might, without going down to Victoria and Vancouver, receive the licenses which are necessary to permit them to commence operations in the Yukon country. If the hon. gentleman will peruse the various bills which have been introduced in parliament this session for legislation for the carrying out of railway undertakings in that country, he will find all those bills have in view the adoption of a route from the Lynn Canal and from no other starting point. I doubt if hon. gentlemen will find in the legislation which has been introduced in both Houses of Parliament this session any legislation adopting any other route than one starting from the Lynn Canal. I am now referring to those roads which have their objective point in the Yukon and the starting point west of the Rocky Mountains. This being the case, why, I ask, should the government pursue a policy of insisting that the only natural route for access into that country should be entirely discredited, should be ignored by this government, and that a route invested with every difficulty which one could conceive of should be adopted and that that road should be constructed at enormous expense by the Canadian government. I am certainly at a loss to understand the way in which the government intend to defend their persistence in adhering to this route, which has not only been condemned by their own officials, but condemned by the public; because I challenge any one to read the reports prepared by the officials of the government and come to any other conclusion than that the reports so made are condemnatory of the route which has been adopted by the government. I might further point out, in answer to the patriotic view which has been taken by the government, that their actions have been entirely inconsistent with the so-called patriotic motives to which they have given expression and crystallized into the Mackenzie-Mann bill. No later than this morning we read in the Citizen of this city a telegram from Vancouver, B.C., as follows:

VANCOUVER, B.C., May 8.—Much indignation is expressed in local transportation circles at the action of the Dominion government in entering into an arrangement with the Boston and Alaska Transportation Company to deliver 400 tons freight, comprising stores for the Mounted Police in Yukon. This means that $8,000 of business that might have gone through Vancouver and Victoria firms has been given to Seattle.

Does this harmonize with the protestations of patriotism and of Canadian sentiment which have from time to time been so strongly enunciated by the government upon this particular question? Where do we find the Mounted Police which have been sent into that country to-day; we find them at Dyea and Skagway, not on the Stikine River route, not at Glenora, not at Telegraph Creek, not at this ocean port in the interior of British Columbia from which my hon. friend intends to start his road, but on the Lynn Canal. I care not what phase of the subject of Yukon administration you may look at and consider, you will find that the whole key to the situation has been the Lynn Canal. It has been the base of supplies for that country; it has been the portal through which all the government officials and their supplies have gone into that country. It is the base from which all the legislation originating in this House and the House of Commons starts, and it is the only portal into that country which the public have in view to-day and which the public are using. Are the public seeking admission to the country by the Stikine and Fort Wrangel, or by a port in the interior of British Columbia? I say no, most emphatically. As I have said attention is centralized on the Lynn Canal as the entrance into that country. Then, in the face of those natural conditions, why should the government persist in obstructing any enterprise, particularly an enterprise with such financial backing, because it adopts the view that is the only view, barring that of the government, of opening up transportation facilities into that vast country. I hope that this chamber may see the desirability of permitting this bill to go before the Railway Committee. As I pointed out on another occasion, when it was discussed before, it is very seldom—in fact I can scarcely recall an instance in which the principle of a private bill has been discussed in this House and the six months' hoist moved to it. On the contrary, it has been invariably the practice to permit such a bill to go before the Railway Committee, where the promoters of the bill may discuss its merits, may point out their ability to carry out the enterprise, may point out the desirability of carrying such an enterprise to a consummation. I therefore hope, in regard to this particular bill, that this chamber, in its wisdom, will see that it receives a second reading and is sent to the Railway Committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I regard this bill as one of very great and serious consequence. When my hon. friend introduced it and moved its second reading before, I moved the six months' hoist. I persist, hon. gentlemen, in that motion. This bill is an extraordinary bill for many reasons. The government came down at an early period of the session with a measure upon the subject of obtaining access to the north-western portion of Canada. They undertook to secure that on Canadian soil and to control the means by which we were to obtain entrance into our own territory. My hon. friend comes down with a proposition, not emanating from this country—not in the interests of the people of this country but emanating from people of another country, and he is spokesman of those people. My hon. friend knows well that when the government scheme was before the House of Commons and this House, active measures were taken by influential people on the western coast of the United States to defeat the government.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Who were they?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They went to Washington and induced the Senate of the United States to favour a proposition which was inconsistent altogether with the treaty rights of this country in the navigation of the Stikine River. That was done for the purpose of hindering and defeating and delaying the enterprise of constructing a Canadian railway through Canadian territory. I am not going into a discussion of the propriety of that measure. As a member of the administration of this country, I assumed the responsibility of approving of that measure, but a majority of this House voted against it. I did not understand by that vote that the majority of this House had committed themselves to favouring a United States enterprise, an enterprise that would practically annex a portion of Canada to the United States. I say here, as one of Her Majesty's ministers, as a member of the House, as a loyal British subject, that I cannot reconcile the supporting of that proposition, with my duty to Her Majesty, or my duty to my fellow citizens in this country. I am a Liberal, and I trust also a loyal British subject, and I am not prepared to betray the future prospects of this country by supporting a pro-American scheme of this sort. My hon. friend says that you can gain more easy access to our territory from the Lynn Canal than you can by a route wholly in Canadian territory. I do not care to argue that question. I do not think it is of the slightest importance to the consideration of this question. If the people of the United States were a free trade nation, disposed to put the people of Canada on a footing of equality with their own people in obtaining access to that country; if we stood on a footing of equality with them and had the same privileges and opportunities in their territory that they have had conceded to them in ours for many years past, then the commercial side of the question might not be so important a matter as it is at this moment. But over and above the question of commerce there is the question of control of that territory. You will have, perhaps, by the end of this year, 50,000 people, four fifths, or possibly nine-tenths of whom will be citizens of the United States, people who have not shown any great regard for law in their own country, and who are disposed to show even less regard for law in our country. Now, I say that if you build a railway through United States territory, you will place very serious—in my opinion, insuperable obstacles to the construction of a railway in our own country. There is not likely to be commercial support for more than one railway into that country, and when a road is built, if it is constructed in the first instance through United States territory, then you have no chance or prospect, without the expenditure of a very large sum of money, to obtain the construction of a road in our own territory. You will build up a town it may be of 20,000 or 30,000 people at Dyea or Skagway upon territory that is at present in the possession of the United States, and upon which, if a town such as I described were built up, would be for all time to come a portion of the territory of the United States. Now, are we so much interested in the prosperity and greatness of that country that we are going to assist them in building up on the Pacific coast a town which, if you are to start from a point upon the coast into Canadian territory, would be built upon Canadian soil? Is a population of ten, fifteen or thirty thousand a matter of no consequence to us? Is a city of such dimensions of so little importance that it does not matter in the slightest degree whether it is a Canadian or whether it is a United States city? I do not take that view. I say we are to consider the interests of our own country first. We are to determine what we shall do for Canada first, and if by building a road upon Canadian territory we can build up a Canadian town and secure the colonization and settlement of hundreds of miles of territory leading up to the Yukon, is it a matter of no consequence to us? I believe that if you start from Fort Simpson, or further north than that if a convenient port can be secured, a railway running from our own coast, you will run through a country that is rich in minerals, a country that will be occupied by miners thousands in number, scattered the entire length of the road, a people to whom you will give railway accommodation. Establish a continuous line, a matter of some very considerable consequence, and I am of opinion that by doing so you will substantially help the province of British Columbia, without doing any injury to Canada at large. On the contrary, we will help British Columbia and we will help the rest of the Dominion at the same time. Now as between a town in the United States territory and a town in British Columbia, I have no difficulty in making a choice, and I trust that hon. gentlemen in this House will have no difficulty in making a choice, and it is my firm conviction that every vote that is recorded in favour of the project of the hon. gentleman who has moved the second reading of this bill is a vote against Canada and against Canadian interests and in favour of the promotion of United States interests on the Pacific coast. I have no wish to injure the people of the United States. I am desirous of living on terms of amity with them. I am ready to extend trade relations with them. I am ready to make just and fair concessions to them as they make just and fair concessions to us, but I am not prepared to sacrifice the future prospects of this country, and I am not prepared to hold a portion of our own territory by the grace and sufferance of our neighbours, when I feel that we can hold that territory by the courage and self-sacrifice of our own people. That is my position and that is one reason, at least, why I am opposed to the scheme of the hon. gentleman. What reason does the hon. gentleman give for bringing this bill forward? What reason does he give for proposing to sacrifice the future prospects of those on the Pacific coast to the neighbouring republic? Why, he says, the government introduced the bill which this hon. House rejected. That is true. And the hon. gentleman says we have made no other proposition. Well, I might say in reply to the hon. gentleman, in the first place, we have had no indication from that large majority who voted on the government proposition what they would be pleased to support. Now in the United Kingdom, where something if found to be necessary and the House of Lords have rejected the proposal of the government, the Lords have indicated in what direction they think the government should proceed in order to obtain their support, but we have not, up to this moment, received from this House the slightest indication, in anything that has been proposed or said or done, that would hold out to us any glimpse of light as to the route which, in the opinion of this House, we should take. I say that has not been done. The hon. gentleman has made no proposition in that direction, but, on the contrary, he has planted his gun and pointed it at the government benches; he has threatened to fire it at us for the past six weeks, and now the hon. gentleman loads it and points it towards us and says: "you have done nothing and this is our proposition and our scheme." While I know perfectly well that this House rejected the proposition of the government and did not agree with the views which the government expressed, I have a better opinion of the loyalty of this House than to believe that it will support the scheme of the hon. gentleman in place of the one which the government proposed in the earlier portion of the session. I cannot believe that.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Do you believe in minority?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I believe in being a patriotic citizen. I do not believe in being a traitor, and I feel that I should be one if I were to support a measure of this sort. To speak of monopoly, on a question of this sort, is nonsense in my humble judgment, because every railway that is built is a monopoly, except in so far as you subject it to government control, and if you build two railways with the hope and expectation that you are going to have competition, the probability is that within six months they will come to an understanding, agree upon rates, and you have just as large a monopoly as if you had but a single railway line. That has been the experience of this country during the whole period of its railway history, and it is likely to be its experience for a good while to come.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The government did not do it that way in the Kettle River bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am ready to discuss the Kettle River bill when it comes fairly before the House, and I think I can both state and defend my views upon the subject.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if any progress has been reported by the committee appointed by this House to consider the subject of route to the Yukon?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know what report has been made.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There has been no report.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not a member the committee, and, further than that, I may say to my hon. friend that I could not attach very much importance to a committee's report about which, so far as routes are concerned, we have absolutely no information at all. The hon. gentleman says we have not acted. We have been, he says, as silent as oysters. Why, the hon. gentleman himself is the only one, so far, of that large majority that rejected our measure who has given us any indication of what is desired, and the hon. gentleman has practically said: "I prefer Washington to Ottawa." Now, let me say that the matter of railway construction has been before the government of British Columbia, and they did not take the view adopted by my hon. friend who moved the six months' hoist to the government measure. They think British Columbia has a substantial interest in the construction of a railway and in the construction of a railway upon Canadian territory.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Did any one in British Columbia, either boards of trade or public meetings, endorse the granting of 4,000,000 acres of land?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What I was about to say was that, while the subject was under discussion in British Columbia, while the legislature of that province are considering what is the extent of their interest in, and what contribution they could reasonably make towards the construction of a road that was locally advantageous to them, could it be expected that the government would come down to this House and make a new declaration upon a question under consideration in British Columbia, and upon which that government had not yet arrived at a conclusion.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I fully agree with that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is a fact which the hon. gentleman would have done well to have taken into consideration and to have borne in mind. The hon. gentleman from British Columbia asks me about 4,000,000 acres of land. Well, I did not think that that was an extravagant proposition, although the amount was really less.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We are not discussing that now at all.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am discussing the hon. gentleman's interruption, and it is a perfectly legitimate subject of discussion.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I asked a question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And I am going to answer and discuss the hon. gentleman's question. I will say that, so far as the land grant was concerned, it was a land grant that would, in all probability, cost those who obtained it, if they worked the mines, in labour the value of all the precious metal which they obtained. If it did not, the history of it would be wholly different from the history of the mines of California, of South Africa and of Australia. But, hon. gentlemen, however that may be, it was important, if the road was to be constructed, if the government were to obtain the customs duties upon the large amount of goods that would have been consumed there, if the people who went in there by the thousands were to have life and property made secure, that we should have ingress into the country and, so far as the government were concerned, the trade, and the revenues derived from that trade, were of far more consequence and far more importance than the land which the government proposed to place at the disposal of the company.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Mr. Speaker, I think we have not got the Yukon bill here now; we had it once, do we want it a second time?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has forgotten a fact—

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not forget anything.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Order!

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Order you, sir!

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If my hon. friend raises a question of order, I am ready to sit down until Mr. Speaker decides it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is no question of order raised.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Go on.

Several hon. MEMBERS—Go on.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If my hon. friend did not intend to raise the question of order he ought not to have interrupted me. Let me say this, that so far as the question is concerned I wish to say a word—

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman has not answered my question. Did any public body in British Columbia endorse the land grant?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—They all endorsed it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They endorsed the government scheme; they sent different telegrams approving it.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the land grant was part of the government scheme which they endorsed. There was not a single board of trade that made a report to the administration, or to any member of the administration, or to any friend or supporter of British Columbia in this House, or in the other House, that did not approve of the scheme which the government submitted to parliament. Let me say further than that, the hon. gentleman who proposed this scheme has discussed the subject of tenders, will he tell me of a railway constructed since confederation under the system of tender. The hon. Mr. Mackenzie called for tenders for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway but he obtained no response, and the government that succeeded his government in office of which the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition in this House was a member, constructed that road by a private arrangement with a syndicate and not by public tender. Why what are we doing every year? Look at the railways that have been constructed in the North-west Territories? Has there been any one of those roads constructed under a system of public tender? Have you not had men forming themselves into corporations, coming down to parliament asking for a charter to construct a road between one point and another? Let me say this, that not one of those roads has been constructed by tender. Look at the proposed Saskatchewan road, of which Mr. Sutherland had control; look at the Manitoba and North-western, the Calgary and Edmonton road, and I could name a number of others constructed all through Manitoba and the North-west Territories; you have given charters to parties, you have given so much land per mile, you have given postal subsidies for twenty years, you have given money grants; in any one of these, has any one advertisement been inserted in any public newspapers asking that tenders should be given in order to see whether somebody else would construct one of those roads for a lesser sum? Has not every one of them been constructed in this way; that men organize themselves into a company, proposing to construct a road between two points and ask for a charter, that you grant them a charter, and a subsidy of public land and public money, and postal subsidies, and you never seek to ascertain whether these roads could be constructed for a lesser sum. Has the Senate of Canada rejected any one of those propositions? Has the Senate of Canada proposed an amendment that any one of these schemes should be subjected to public tender? I say, hon. gentlemen, no they have not; they have scarcely been questioned here; they have come before this House as a matter of course, and as a matter of course those bills have been carried; and the parties who sought those charters and sought the public lands and the pecuniary aid by postal subsidy and by so much a mile, have obtained what they asked for, so far as they were enabled to carry out their schemes. But the proposition of the government met with a different fate. I am not going into a discussion of that, but I am answering the observations made by the hon. gentleman that we are censurable because we have not, at this early period, submitted a second scheme for the consideration of parliament, that we are censurable because we have not matured a measure which, for aught the hon. gentleman may know, might be under negotiation, because we have not matured a measure and asked for public tenders to see at what price, for what land grant, or for what money subsidy such a scheme can be carried into operation. Let me call the attention of the hon. gentlemen of this House to this: it has been said in the newspapers that in all probability at an early date the government of the United Kingdom and the government of the United States will be called upon to enter into negotiations for the settlement of a number of questions which are in dispute between Canada and the United States, and the settlement of which are of importance to both countries. What does the hon. gentleman propose? He proposes that, before we enter upon negotiations at all, we shall announce in advance to the people of the United States, "you need not make any concessions for permission to construct a railway from the head of Lynn Inlet, because the parliament of Canada have already made provision for that. You will get nothing for that concession, because it has already been made." Now, I say that if we were to construct such a road, if it were desirable to make a concession, of this sort to the people of the United States, it would be of infinite consequence that that matter should remain in the hands of this government and under its control in order to aid them in determining what the terms of the concessions on each side should be. Now, I think I have said enough, in reply to the observations of the hon. member, to show that it is in the interests of the people of this country that this bill should not become law; that is, if we are to be a self governing people, if we are to remain masters of our own destinies and capable of controlling our own affairs, we cannot afford at this time to permit a bill of this sort to become law, and I am not willing that this bill shall be read a second time, and that referred to a committee; I am not willing that this House shall be committed to a proposition of this sort; but when the hon. gentlemen undertake to hold the government of this country responsible for the government of that country they will at all events not undertake to embarrass the government both with regard to its control of the country and its negotiations with the neighbouring republic to carry forward a proposition of this sort.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B C)—Why did not the hon. gentleman's government last year stop two charters to build railways from the Lynn Canal into that country? The boundary question stood then where it stands to-day; there is no difference, and if the eyes of the government are opened to-day, they should have been open then to the danger of allowing those charters to be given. But it is a fact that they were given. Now, I am not in favour of this charter myself, and I would ask my hon. friend, if he sees any chance of the government taking up this matter, not to push this bill. I take exception to what he said about the eyes of everybody being now turned to the Lynn Canal as the route. The whole of British Columbia, I must say, look to an all-Canadian route from some harbour in British Columbia joining at Telegraph Creek. That must be the common point. I condemned the Stikine route; I condemn the water part of it still. It is not an all-Canadian route, and not an available route all the year round; but any road from Kitimat or Observatory Inlet joining at Telegraph Creek is about the only route we can have into that country as far as I know. The hon. Minister of Justice said—and I agree with a great part of what he said—that while the British Columbia government are trying to devise some means to help build that road, no other scheme should be put forward, that the government should have a free hand in joining British Columbia in carrying forward a through route. I would not have said a word about the Yukon country at all if the hon. gentleman had not pointed to me and saying that no public body in British Columbia ever disapproved of the land grant. I wrote to the board of trade in British Columbia and asked for a reply, but they gave no response, no approval, but passed resolutions and sent telegrams, but they carefully avoided the land grant question. The supporters of the Stikine route have been abusing me about my opinions on that route, but they said it was a matter of opinion as to whether the land grant was large or small. Well everything is a matter of opinion. The hon. Minister of Justice was patriotic just now and was talking about the benefit to British Columbia towns; but my hon. friend is going to acquiesce in a proposition which will injure those towns. He ought to see the danger of trade being carried past our towns, which will be the result of allowing all the licenses to be issued beyond the reach of these towns. I would ask my hon. friend who has charge of this bill, if he sees any chance of the government doing anything in the matter, to not push this measure. Of course the government can easily stop it in another place, and I believe there is a very great probability of the government doing so. I think it will be seen before very long who was right and who was wrong, and that the Senate of Canada has saved to this country an enormous tract of land, I have it on good authority—I won't give names—that a land grant of 10,000 acres per mile would be accepted by the contractors to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not feel as if I could honestly congratulate my hon. friend the leader of the House upon the tone and nature of the speech which he has just delivered. My hon. friend—he will excuse me if I say so—permitted a petulant truculant tone to pervade the whole of the speech from beginning to end. I have been told that my hon. friend has addressed the House on this question once or twice before in the same manner. When he started his speech this afternoon he complained that a majority in this House had defeated the government measure.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not complain. I stated the fact.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He complained that a large majority had defeated the government measure, and from that time to the present that they had not thrown a single glimmer of light in the direction of the government or anywhere else to show what they would do, or what they proposed to do in the place of the measure which they had defeated. In that statement my hon. friend was singularly unfortunate because he cannot have forgotten that very soon after the defeat of the Telegraph Creek and Teslin Lake Railway bill, a committee was moved for in this House for the purpose of eliciting information on that subject, and that that committee has had various sittings, and that men who were supposed to have infomation with regard to this subject, have been invited to appear before the committee. I learn a great deal of valuable information has been and is being obtained for the benefit of the government of which my hon. friend is a member, as well as for the benefit of this House. My hon. friend, too, in charging that there has not been anything done from this side of the House to give another measure in place of the one that was defeated, forgets that this very bill that we have before us is a proposition in that direction.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Here is a proposition from influential persons, British subjects—notwithstanding all my hon. friend has said to the contrary—nearly all of them, I think, British subjects, and all of them persons of means, asking this House to allow their bill to go to the Railway Committee, in order to show who these gentlemen are and what is their ability, and the merits of the route upon which they propose to go—all that is offered to my hon. friend free of cost. All this light and information is available, and yet he appeared, from the remarks he made, to be entirely oblivious of the fact that a committee of this House was sitting from time to time for the purpose of procuring information and light with regard to this very subject for the government. It is he and his colleagues who are doing what he says we have been doing, that is, retiring into their shell and doing nothing. My hon. friend's policy and the tone of his speech which he has made to-day, reminds me of Achilles, who retired into his tent and refused absolutely to take any part in the glorious struggle which his countrymen were carrying on at the city of Troy because he could not have his own way. My hon. friend by his own confession is somewhat in the same mood. He has retired into his tent, he is sulky, and hectors and denounces a majority of this House because they did not do something which he thought was very wise, and which the majority of this House thought was very foolish. My hon. friend in the course of his remarks indulged in a phrase—and this peculiarity is not at all confined to the speech which my hon. friend has made to-day for his friends in the country and in the press seem to be adepts in the use of misleading phrases, and they appear to have as much confidence in phrases inaccurately applied, as they used to have when they advocated commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity and asked the people to believe that they were working for free trade. They have adopted the phrase "all-Canadian route." Now they are talking of the all-Canadian route—of the unpatriotic members of this Senate who defeated the all-Canadian route to the Yukon. I confess that I require something more than the assertion of my hon. friend and his friends to convince me that the route which was proposed in the Mackenzie-Mann railway bill which this House defeated, is an all-Canadian one. We know very well, indeed the fact has been established beyond all doubt, that ocean ships cannot leave a British port such as Vancouver and Victoria and pass up that river, even if the right of navigation were of the freest possible character, without a transhipment, and that transhipment must be made on United States soil, at a United States port, and if you tranship at a United States port and moor your vessels to United States docks, they must necessarily be on United States soil and you will be contributing towards building up an American emporium at the mouth of that river. The hon. gentleman seems to ignore all this. With regard to the patriotic side of this question, which my hon. friend thinks he can make so very much of in this discussion, I think it will take but a glance to convince this House and the country that it is all on the surface. What did we find when this question first came before us—when the bill was introduced in the other House and in the Senate? We found the hon. gentleman and his colleague here and the gentleman who introduced the bill in another place, dilating at great length on what they said was a fact, that we had not such privileges on the Stikine River as we required and ought to have—that some one had stealthily and ignorantly given away privileges and rights which we had possessed on the Stikine River. It was a most extraordinary thing to find members of a government, having to contend for those very privileges, rise one after the other and put themselves on record before the diplomats of the United States, declaring that our rights on the Stikine River were minimized and were not of the nature they ought to be and which we require. Imagine my hon. friend, or some colleague of his, going to Washington to treat on those questions! These very speeches will be in the mouths of the Americans; they will quote from the speeches made by members of the government in which they argued that our rights are of a very restricted character in regard to the navigation of the Stikine River. Then we have another extraordinary position taken by the government; they have assumed all along that Dyea, Skagway and these other places at the head of Lynn Canal are in United States territory.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend said a little while ago that there was a question in dispute between the two countries, but the whole line of the hon. gentleman's argument was that they were in United States territory. If not why is he so alarmed at the prospect of this bill building up Dyea and Skagway? It is a very extraordinary course for the government to put themselves on record, making arguments for the United States to use in discussions over this very question when that boundary comes to be determined, and all this coming from hon. gentlemen who claim to take such an eminently patriotic view of this whole question. Then, again, as throwing some light on this subject, the question is the answer to the question asked by my hon. friend from Victoria with regard to granting licenses to miners at the boundary near Dyea and Skagway. We have not been told that the same privileges are granted at Glenora. Perhaps they are, but all the information we have is that the government, of which the hon. gentleman is a member, have recognized the importance of these United States ports, Dyea and Skagway. They are providing facilities for granting licenses at these points, the effect of which will be necessarily to draw trade and population and wealth to these very towns which he talks so much about and which he urges us, as it were, to freeze out. In connection with that point I may say that the papers of to-day have this information, that the government have sent a portion of the supplies for the Yukon contingent over United States roads to United States seaports on the Pacific to be transhipped from there, we do not know where, but anyway the trade is through the United States territory. The trade is diverted to United States ports on that coast and very likely will go through to Dyea and Skagway before it gets to Canadian territory. I mention these points to show that my hon. friend and his colleagues are not consistent; that there is not even a decent garb of consistency in the course of conduct they are pursuing in regard to the question that is now before the House. My hon. friend is very anxious to go back and thresh out the whole question as to the merits of the Stikine and Teslin Lake Railway scheme, and the land grant and all these other things. I had not the pleasure of speaking on the Teslin Railway Bill when it was before the House; but I have no hesitation in saying that my views on the subject are stronger to-day than they were at the time when that bill was under discussion. I have no hesitation in saying that the Teslin Lake route is open to very great and grave objections from an international point of view. It has the difficulty of transhipment at the mouth of the river, and a chain can be no stronger than its weakest link. In the matter of commercial and international advantages, the very fact that you have to tranship at the mouth of the river brings in international complications, and the chain is not, from an international point of view, any stronger than its weakest link at that point. But the commercial and physical features are open to the same objection of having weak links. I have a statement made by my hon. friend the leader of the House only a few days ago when he was asked why Mr. Coste had gone to that country. He said that Mr. Coste had been sent there for the purpose of inquiring into the navigability of the Stikine River, but when he reached there he found that it was covered with ice and he could not make a report on that point. It appears, therefore, that after all the high sounding talk we have heard, after the strong language which my hon. friend has used in denunciation of the majority of this Senate in rejecting that Teslin Lake Railway Bill, neither he nor his government were altogether safe about the navigability of the Stikine River up to the time Mr. Coste was sent there.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes we were.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then why send Mr. Coste?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We had reports that there were obstructions, and we were told that the possibility of their removal would be better with the ice on the river than at any other time. Mr. Coste went for that purpose, but the snow was very deep.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for his lucid explanation. The hon. gentleman rises to correct what he thinks is a very erroneous impression I had, and then he goes on to tell us that Mr. Coste was sent to inquire about some obstructions or something in the bed of the river, which would affect its navigability if anything did. The fact is, this is only one incident in connection with the navigation of the river. I have in my possession a map of that river for which my hon. friend the leader of the House is responsible himself. I suppose he will not go back on it. I have here a map of the Stikine River made in 1877, in connection with the department presided over at that time by my hon. friend, who was then Minister of the Interior. It was in connection with the dispute over the Peter Martin case, and Mr. Joseph Hunter, now a member of the British Columbia legislature, was sent there by the government for the purpose of settling on a provisional boundary line and ascertaining the exact location where the capture of Peter Martin took place. This map was prepared by him and submitted to the department, which shows a shoal across the channel at the mouth of the river with only one foot deep of water over it at low tide. Then, again, further up the stream, between that and Rothesay Point, it shows only two feet of water at many places during low tide. That is the statement of the depths of water made by Mr. Hunter at that time, and this evidence we will certainly accept as being, at all events, an attempt to get accurate information, because there was no question at that time of politics, as there is now, influencing the mind of anybody. Mr. Hunter was sent there under instructions, and felt it his duty to collect all available information with regard to the navigability of the stream, as well as other matters. There was another Mr. Hunter who went there another year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is making a speech on the bill which was rejected six weeks ago.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend did not see that point when he was on his feet to-day. We cannot help speaking on that matter, because my hon. friend persists in holding it up as an ideal scheme. And because that scheme was so good in his estimation, he insists that we should consider scarcely any other proposition, while in the same breath he denounces the majority who voted against that bill for not submitting an alternative proposition, yet when he introduced the bill in this House, in the very introduction of his speech he announced that the government could accept no amendment, that the bill had either to be adopted or rejected in its entirety. Here is what Mr. Hunter, a customs-house officer who was sent up that river in 1875, says:

> Boundary post of the Stikine River, 12th May, 1894.
> I beg to inform you that I arrived here yesterday, seven days from Wrangel. The river not being thoroughly open, I had a fearful time of it.

It took seven days, you will notice, to travel 30 miles from Wrangel to the boundary post.

> The river not being thoroughly open, I had a fearful time of it. In many places it was blocked 20 feet high with ice. The snow on the banks was from one to seven feet deep.

This was the clearest possible evidence that the statements which have been made that the river is open uniformly at the 1st May is incorrect, because from 16 to 20 feet of ice was found accumulated in that river at the 12th of May, 1875, and therefore the statements we have submitted to us about the navigability of that river from the 1st of May is not correct. It may be there are some seasons when it is open that early, and there may be some seasons when it is closed with ice later than the 12th of May. But there is another extreme weakness about the pet route of my hon. friend, so much of a pet in his estimation that he almost gets angry when anybody suggests any other way of getting to that country at all. It is true Mr. Saint-Cyr, in his report, says he left Teslin Lake on the 10th November, and that the lake was not frozen at that time. He says, however, in the same paragraph that the thermometer had ranged 44° below zero for some days. These two statements appear to me to be very inconsistent. How it was possible for a sheet of water, from two to four miles wide, comparatively still water, land locked by great hills, some 3,000 feet above the level of the sea on each side—how it was possible for water of that kind to remain open with the thermometer ranging 44° below zero, I cannot understand. All that has been claimed for the Stikine River is that it has been opened five months in the year. The head waters of the Stikine at Glenora are only 500 feet above the sea level. Teslin Lake is 2,500 feet above the sea level. There is an advance in altitude from the water of the Stikine River until you reach Teslin Lake of 2,000 feet. It is still water, as I said before. It is altogether 200 miles from Telegraph Creek before you are far into the lake—200 miles further north. Here you have 2,000 feet greater altitude, at a point 200 miles further north, and still water, and hon. gentlemen ask us to believe that Teslin Lake will remain open as long as the waters of the Stikine River that are so much lower in altitude and latitude and flow with such velocity. The fact is the bill was conceived under a great lack of information—I would almost say ignorance.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The bill before the House?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The bill was sufficiently before the House for my hon. friend to discuss it, and discuss it at a great length, and now he asks, is the bill before the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not discuss the bill at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not know what the hon. gentleman would call discussion. He went over it—the land grant as well, he told us that every board of trade, every public body in Canada, that had communicated with the government had committed themselves to the government scheme.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—All I said was in reply to a question by my hon. friend from Victoria.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The sentence I am now quoting was said in reply to that, but the House knows very well that the hon. gentleman went over every phase of the question, and now he becomes exceedingly restless when he finds something advanced which does not altogether agree with his pre-conceived views of the question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend, instead of making a speech on the Yukon bill, went down to Prince Edward Island to carry an election, and now he comes back victorious.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As the hon. gentleman did from Bothwell. What I say here will be heard in Prince Edward Island, and I speak with that object in view, and I am not at all averse to it being heard in Bothwell as well. When I speak in this House I try as well as I can to advance my general views, irrespective of locality altogether. My hon. friend refers to an election in Prince Edward Island. I suppose the point of the remark—which I suppose is altogether pertinent to the question before the House—is the fact that that election went favourably to the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. My hon. friend lost his opportunity of speaking on the bill and takes the opportunity now.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend has the advantage of me, for he has made his speech three times in this House this session. My hon. friend went into the question of the manner of constructing this road as well. He says he did not discuss it, but I think some hon. gentlemen in this House will remember that he discussed the question of the manner in which the contract was entered into, that he said it was just similar to all railway contracts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said nothing about it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend is very uneasy. It is hard to get him down to terms.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman who moved this bill says the government were to blame for not having advertised for tenders if they contemplated any scheme, and I was answering that portion of his speech and it had nothing to do with the bill of the government.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Indeed; and my hon. friend thought it of sufficient importance to go into a general justification of the manner in which the government awarded the contract.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend will insist upon being his own interpreter, but we must be allowed to interpret for ourselves now and then. The general trend of his argument was that the manner in which the government let that contract did not differ materially from the manner in which all other railway contracts had been let since confederation. He went on to say that tenders had not been called for in any instance. He referred to Alexander Mackenzie having invited tenders for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and not having received any. I know that every mile of railway that was built in Prince Edward Island was built by tender. Tenders were called for by the provincial government, and in the building of some eleven miles of railway by the Dominion government in 1884 in Prince Edward Island it was let by tender. My recollection is very distinct that the government of Sir John Macdonald, in dealing with the British Columbia portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, let by tender sections of that road. We remember Onderdonk's section, and while the government in building the British Columbia section did not let the whole of it in one contract, called for tenders and let it by divisions. My hon. friend tries to lead the House into believing that the manner in which McKenzie and Mann's contract was let was on all fours with the way the government was proceeding in chartering other railways, but I do not think there will be found in the legislation of Canada any parallel for this extraordinary contract which my hon. friend made with regard to the Teslin Lake Railway. We remember very well that it was made in secrecy, no public offers were solicited. Indeed, when the announcement was first made that this contract had been made, a great deal of surprise was expressed even by the supporters and friends of the government all over the country. It was different altogether from the ordinary way of letting contracts in the Dominion of Canada. We are for instance, now proposing to charter a railway. That is the first initiatory step. Was any such initiatory step taken in the case of Mackenzie and Mann's proposed railway? It is possible they may have got a British Columbia charter through another party, but there was no right given by this government, except what was given by the defeated bill, and in connection with giving them a charter we were going further and proposing to settle the consideration to be awarded to these contractors for building the railway. All that was proposed. It was very different from the course which has been pursued by the parliament of Canada with regard to other roads all over the country. With regard to the charter now proposed to be given, I think that hon. gentlemen will see it is our duty to advance this bill another stage. We should certainly send this bill to the Railway Committee. It will then be ascertained what these gentlemen propose to do, and whether they are willing to build a railway without governernment aid or subsidy. That fact has been elicited this year before the Railway Committee of the House of Commons with regard to the Kettle River Railway, and it was very satisfactory to the country when it was found that different parties were willing to build that railway without a subsidy. It may be when we go into committee on this bill that similar information will be elicited. For my own part, I cannot see that there is any question of national importance involved in connection with it. If, however, that should appear, the Railway Committee is just the place to have it inquired into. We can then have gentlemen before us who can give precise information upon all these subjects. It would be well for members of the government to be there, and if they find there is any diplomatic reason against granting the charter the committee would be willing to hear them. I do not think it would be right for this House to refuse to advance this bill and give it a second reading and send it to the Railway Committee. After that has been done, if it is found that the government have a measure maturing to deal with the question, which will better carry out the object which this bill has in view, to obtain a good Canadian commercial route to the Yukon, which will give us all we require, so much the better. But my hon. friend moves the six months' hoist. He is unwilling that this bill should go to the committee where we could get all this information. With regard to the bonding privilege, I have heard my hon. friend and his friends in this House talk about that question at various times during this session, but I cannot see the force of the argument they are trying to advance upon that question. To my mind the bonding privilege at that place would be assured. I cannot see how or why it should not. The Americans have a Yukon country which was, up to a few months ago, considered to be very much more valuable than ours. It may be yet as valuable as ours. It may be a stampede will take place from one side of the line to the other. At any rate the United States people have important interests there—as important as our interests, probably, in their estimation. They are as anxious as we are to get a route to the Yukon. If the route thence by Pyramid Harbour and Fort Selkirk and ultimately by rail to the Yukon is the best commercial route there, it is the best for them as well as the best for us, and they would be most willing—it would be extraordinary if they were not—to give the bonding privilege over 20 miles of territory which they are in possession of and which may be ours some day, according to the Canadian claim. At any rate they would be willing to give the bonding privilege for that 20 miles in consideration of obtaining the bonding privilege for 400 or 500 miles of our territory. By this route we would have deep water to Pyramid Harbour. We would get clear of all the rapids of the Hootalinqua and other difficulties. We would strike the Yukon River after the waters of the Pelly joined with the Lewes, make it a strong deep stream, and to reach Dawson City would be only a matter of 300 miles more. That is from Fort Selkirk to Dawson City. All these matters would come out. Hon. gentlemen lay a great deal of stress upon a railway starting from a port of British Columbia. I admit that if the other difficulties were not too great, that would be a very important consideration, an object that we should have in view, but we must consider the fact that it is 1,100 or 1,200 miles from a British Columbian port to Dawson City, that there is a grave doubt about the navigabllity, even in the summer time, of some of the streams between the Yukon and Teslin Lake; in view of the fact which is undeniable that these waters will be frozen about two-thirds of the year, some of them I think two-thirds of the year, if that country is going to be reached commercially it will have to be reached by railroad if it is as important as many think now. A railway from a British Columbia port would be almost as long as a railway from Edmonton. My hon. friend has never referred to an eastern route to that country at all, but the more I consider this question, the more strongly I am of opinion that the proper commercial route for the Yukon country for Canadian purposes, should have for its point of departure Edmonton or some place in the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is if we are to have a purely Canadian route. Any route that has its opening from the Pacific Ocean will give the United States people a great advantage. Take the matter of flour. We have a duty of 60 cents. That duty is a great deal more than overbalanced by the difference of freight which Canadians have to pay on flour from the North-west in going to that country by the Pacific Ocean, as compared with the United States people coming from Portland or Seattle where there is a wheat growing country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—After that you vote for this bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If my hon. friend is willing to undertake the construction of a road 1,100 or 1,200 miles long I think he ought to turn his eyes to the eastern route, because it will be admitted that that is the best all-Canadian route which could be suggested. If we are going to have a route from the Pacific coast at all, we cannot ignore geographical considerations entirely, and from the head of the Lynn Canal these considerations are very important as compared with any other place, and Canadians would benefit as well as United States people would. It would be no use for us to punish Canadians by forcing them to adopt that perilous, uncertain route by Teslin Lake and over the Hootalinqua rapids and all that way to force them under the strength of a monopoly to carry their provisions over that route for five years, simply because of the gratification of feeling that we were punishing United States citizens as well as the Canadians. These are all matters of inquiry before the Railway Committee of the Senate, but my hon. friend does not want to have these subjects inquired into. He appears to be satisfied with that one gigantic effort of his colleague, the Minister of the Interior, the Teslin Lake scheme, which a very able and distinguished member of the cabinet described in the House of Commons as a huge gamble. This huge gamble of my hon. friend appears to be the beginning and the end of his efforts to get access to this country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We do not require a committee for that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend told us we had to open our mouths and shut our eyes and swallow the contract. That is not the way to get information upon a question of this kind, but the government were supposed to get information. Have the government given any evidence to us since the question came up that they themselves possessed information? What did we find? We found they sent Major Walsh to that country as a commissioner clothed with very great powers, and they have gravely informed us that they sent him without any written instructions, at any rate we could not get any written instructions which they gave him. He was a long time up there. I am told there is some kind of return being brought down giving some information from Commissioner Walsh, but I believe it was so unimportant and insignificant that scarcely any member of the House took any notice of it and I fear very much when it will be examined it will be found to contain no information at all. Now, while the members of the government are averse to our going into committee on this bill for the purpose of getting the promoters of the bill before us, and getting all this information, they have absolutely refused to give us any information upon the subject if they possess it themselves. Considering all these matters I think it would be our duty to go into committee on the bill to hear all that can be said in favour of it, and for my part, if the government bring down a good sensible measure that will meet the difficulties of the situation and the demands of that country, I will be most happy and delighted to withdraw any support I am now giving to this bill, and to give the government measure every consideration. But the session of parliament is drawing to a close, and the government are not doing anything, they are not moving; they have not said they are going to do anything, but still they appear to stand in the way of anything else being done for the purpose of affording communication to that country. This does not at all accord with the professions which they made in the early part of this session, of the great urgency of this question and the importance of the measure which they submitted being accepted almost without challenge on account of that.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—It is but a short time since this House appointed a very strong committee to consider the subject now under discussion, to consider particularly the various routes that would lead into the Klondike country. It does seem to me that we are more or less premature in considering any bill upon this subject until a report of that committee is made to the House. From what I can hear, a vast amount of information has been received by that committee, and I understand that only a couple of days will elapse before they shall have made their report. Now it does seem to me that this House should let this matter stand until its own committee has reported, and if that committee make a report which will be acceptable to the House, to the country, and probably to the government, it will be much more satisfactory than to engage ourselves in the discussion of any bill of a private nature. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the merits or demerits of this measure at the present juncture, but simply to say that, in my opinion, in the face of this House appointing a committee to examine the question of routes and report, that the present bill should stand over or be withdrawn in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I rose at the same time as my hon. friend who has just preceded me (Mr. O'Donohoe) to draw the attention of the House to exactly what he has already drawn your attention to. Since this bill was before the House on a previous occasion the Senate have appointed a committee for the purpose of inquiring into the routes into the Yukon, and they have obtained a large amount of valuable information that will be accepted by the government, I have not the slightest doubt, so far as it goes. I hope to put the House in the possession of the report of that committee on Wednesday if it is possible to get it prepared and the committee to sit upon it for that time. For that reason I think it would be desirable that the debate on this question should be postponed until the Senate has been put in full possession of what the committee has to bring before them. The Senate has thrown out the Yukon Railway Bill, and, as the hon. gentleman who preceded me from the other side of the House said, the country justifies the Senate in the action which it took upon that occasion. Now, the Senate, in order to put itself before the country in a proper way, appointed this committee, and it would be desirable that we should adjourn this debate at any rate until next Monday in order to give the Senate an opportunity of ascertaining what the report of the committee may be, and how far its recommendations may affect the bill before the House. For that reason, and with that idea, I move that this debate be adjourned until next Monday.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I disagree with the hon. gentleman altogether about postponing this bill, for this reason : if the committee has got any information to give the House it will come in due time. The hon. gentleman forgets that this is a Senate bill ; if the government of this country do not choose to accept the report of that committee, and pass this bill, it is in their power in the other House not to allow it to become law. We know they have a large majority over there. If it suits them they will put it through, and if they do not they will have the information which the committee will give them, and if they think that we have pointed out a better route they will accept it. If not, they are not obliged to accept this bill. They can do what they like. When my hon. friend feels satisfied that the government will take the route that the committee recommend.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I am not so satisfied about that. Therefore, there is no harm at all in sending this bill to the committee ; it will be some days before it comes back to us, and the report of the committee will have been brought before this House before this bill is through the committee. If the report is favourable and the government want to adopt it, they have the power in their own hands to defeat this bill in the other House. My hon. friend said that we took the whole matter out of their hands. I do not want to take anything out of the hands of the House of Commons ; I want them to have the right and responsibility which pertain to them, and to discharge what they conceive to be their duty to this country. Instead of taking it out of their hands for one, I want to put it in their hands ; I want them to be responsible ; I want to send this bill over there, and if it is favourable, if they have not got a better scheme, they can take this or reject it as they think best. We have heard about starving people in the Yukon country. That cry has disappeared now. That was the ostensible object of forcing that Yukon railway bill through before. I do not want to discuss the Yukon bill, because I think that is dead and buried several feet down never to be raised again, and I hope such a bill will never be brought into this chamber in the future. I suppose we can have confidence in the committee, and if the government have not got a better scheme, we will put amendment in this bill requiring the company to commence operations immediately, so that they can relieve that awful starvation in that country which we have heard so much about. But if the government think proper not to allow this bill to pass after it goes through this House, it is a matter in their own hands ; so there is no use in delaying the disposal of this bill. Either send it to the committee at once or adopt the unusual course proposed by the Minister of Justice, and vote no confidence in the Railway Committee as well as in this bill. I want to leave the responsibility with the government, to let them make a choice. It is merely to cause delay, as I look at it, to ask us to wait for the report of the committee that is inquiring into routes. I do not want to say what that report will be; I am pretty well satisfied what it will be; but at the same time I want the government to have two strings to their bow, I want them to have a choice between two as far as this Senate is concerned. I question very much whether they will take either of them. They may have some other scheme, but whatever scheme they have, I hope they will advertise for tenders and let the work to the lowest bidders. They may not bring any bill down at all, because they have been defeated on this Yukon deal. You can see they loved it very much, in fact they were married to it; they would not allow it to be altered in any way, and it showed what great disappointment they felt because the Senate thought proper, in the interests of the country, to defeat the Yukon bill. You see what great disappointment my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice showed to-day because he did not get through that iniquitous bill. I hope my hon. friend will withdraw his motion to adjourn the debate and dispose of it now.

Several Hon. MEMBERS—Six o'clock! six o'clock!

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It is time to dispose of it now. I want this bill to go to the House of Commons and then the report of the committee would follow it and they would have to make a choice. Let us not embarrass the government in the other House; let us give them all the chance in the world. They are responsible to the people and let them take the responsibility. We threw out what we considered a bad scheme, but it does not follow that we are at war with them. We should do what we can to assist them in every way possible to govern this country. I am ready to do so. I have no party feeling at all in the matter. I am here, independent, to do what I believe is right and just in the interests of this country, and I hope my hon. friend will withdraw his motion and let us dispose of this question now.

Several members—Carried! Lost!

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Take the yeas and nays.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let us have the yeas and nays and call in the members.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to call the attention of the government to the following answers given, one by the Hon. Mr. Scott, Secretary of State, on the 2nd day of May, 1898, the other by the Hon. Mr. Mills, Minister of Justice, on the 25th day of April, 1898, to the following question :—

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. Whether the present government or the Prime Minister, or any member of the present administration, has had, directly or indirectly, or is having, directly or indirectly, any negotiation, either with the government of Manitoba or with any member thereof, or with the Catholic religious authorities of Manitoba, on the subject of the question called the Schools Question ?

"Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say, in answer to my hon. friend, that the government have not had any negotiations with the government of Manitoba, or with the Catholic religious authorities in that province, on the subject called the School Question, nor has it authorized any members of the government to hold any such negotiations. (25th April, 1898.)"

"Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The present government had a conference with the representatives of the government of Manitoba, and they came to an agreement which was confirmed by the Manitoba Legislature, and that is the end of it, so far as the public are concerned. (2nd May, 1898.)"

And inquire in what answer is the truth to be found ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hon. gentlemen will notice the excessive politeness of this question. The hon. gentleman wishes to know whether the hon. Secretary of State or I told the truth to this House in reply to his question. I can tell my hon. friend that we both spoke the truth. My hon. friend the Secretary of State was speaking of one period of time, and I of another. My hon. friend referred, in his answer, to the communications between certain members of the government and the government of Manitoba, which led to the legislation in Manitoba. That was a well ascertained fact upon which I did not suppose for a moment that the hon. member was putting a question. I supposed the hon. gentleman's question, as I understand it now, to refer to what transpired after that Act had become law, and I stated then—and I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the statement I made—that the government had not any negotiations with the government of Manitoba or with the Catholic religious authorities in that province, on the subject called the school question, nor has it authorized any members of the government to hold any such negotiations. I was speaking of what transpired after the legislation was passed in the province of Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am really glad to accept the explanations given by the hon. member. If there was a controverted fact, it was this question I put, and I see that when the facts are controverted the hon. member gives an answer, but when they are not he cannot give an answer.

THIRD READING.

Bill (102) "An Act to incorporate the Montmorency Cotton Mills Company," as amended.—(Hon. Mr. Ogilvie.)

ST. JOHN BRIDGE AND RAILWAY EXTENSION COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. DEVER moved the third reading of Bill (78): "An Act respecting the St. John Bridge and Railway Extension Company."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I propose to move the amendment of which I have given notice. Perhaps it is desirable that I should briefly explain to the House the position of this matter. This St. John Bridge and Railway Extension Company was incorporated in the year 1881 by the legislature of the province of New Brunswick. In the year 1883 the company applied to the Government of Canada, and the government agreed to advance a sum of money not exceeding in the whole $500,000; and the government of that day introduced a bill into parliament, in the usual way in which money bills are introduced, by message from His Excellency the Governor General and by resolutions in the House of Commons, upon which the bill was based; and the government were authorized by this bill to advance money to the company to the extent of eighty per cent of the cost of the work as it proceeded, the whole amount not to exceed $500,000. The company were to have the right to repay the advances and interest at any time within fifteen years from the date on which the first advance was made. The fifteen years will expire during the current year. The third clause of the schedule to that chapter 26 of the Acts of 1883 provided that the government might, if it were found advisable, take possession of the bridge, railway and appurtenances at any time within five years from the date on which the first advance is made, on payment of the difference then due for advances and interest on the same and the total amount expended by the company, and ten per centum on the total so expended. In the original Order in Council with respect to this company, the government were allowed to take over the work at any time within fifteen years, and it will be seen that by the new Order in Council, embodied in this Act of 1883, the time was limited to five years. That is very much to be regretted, because this bridge is one of the works which the government should have taken over. Then the company were to pay interest at the rate of 4 per cent on the amount advanced to them by the government, and the government's claim for these advances was to form a first charge, a lien, and to be secured by a mortgage on all the property, real and personal, of the company. Then there was a provisi on that if they did not pay the interest the government might take possession. The interest was to be computed at the rate of 4 per cent per annun. So that in 1883, and probably within the next year after the passing of this Act, the government, as I understand it, advanced to this company sums amounting in the whole to about $480,000, upon which the company have been paying interest at the rate of 4 per cent. The company also, under statute passed by the legislature of New Brunswick, issued debentures to the extent of $125,000, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. As I understand it—I may be mistaken about that—the work has paid the interest on these debentures also; and I understand, further, that most of these debentures are held by the members of the company.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Are they a prior claim to the government's?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No. Their claim was to be a second lien after the government's lien. Now, the fifteen years for which these bonds of the company were to run, and during which the government lien was to hold, having expired, the company come to parliament for an extension of time for both purposes. I do not find any fault with those gentlemen. It is only reasonable, I suppose, that they should be allowed, as they are allowed by the first clause of this bill, to issue new bonds for a sum not exceeding in the whole $125,000. I have some doubt (but that is not a question for this House now) as to whether the rate of interest should not be lower than it is. It is a rate not exceeding six per cent per annum. At the present time, the success of this work having become assured, I do not think more than five per cent should be paid. However, that is, perhaps, a matter for the company, and not for parliament. The third clause of the bill provides for securing these debentures by mortgage, and then goes on to say:

That the rents and revenues of the company shall be subject, first, to the payment of any penalty imposed for non-compliance with the requirements of the Railway Act, respecting returns to be made to the Minister of Railways; and, also, that such mortgage and the bonds and debentures secured thereby, shall be subject to the mortgage given by the company to Her Majesty, to secure advances made to the company by the Governor in Council under the provisions of chapter 26 of the statutes of 1883 of Canada; and provided also that all such advances made by the government of Canada under the last mentioned Act shall be and remain a charge and lien upon the property of the company conveyed by the said mortgage, prior to any mortgage made under the authority of this Act, or any bonds or debentures issued hereunder.

Now if the clause had stopped there no one would have been disposed to quarrel with it or find fault with it, but it does not. The clause ends with the final important words:

Until or unless the government of Canada shall otherwise agree or consent.

Now it will be seen that there is there, if not a direct, at least an implied authority to the government of Canada to postpone the government's claim on this work to the mortgage securing these bonds or debentures, or possibly to remit the claim altogether. I may say in the first place that I think this provision is unconstitutional. How that provision could have got through the House of Commons and the committee of the House of Commons without attracting attention is something I cannot understand; but hon. gentlemen know that it very frequently happens that little things do escape the notice of the members of the House of Commons and have to be dealt with here. The probabilities are that they were not supposed to be any politics in this bill, and consequently the members of the House of Commons were not particularly on the watch, or did not scrutinize the measure with the care which they would otherwise have manifested. The proviso to which I refer is, as I say, unconstitutional. That provision which authorized the government to remit the claim held by the people of this country on this public work for the amount of $480,000, could constitutionally have been adopted by the House of Commons only when recommended to that House by a message from His Excellency the Governor General. I presume the hon. leader of the opposition or any one who has had experience in government, will not deny that. Then there has to be a resolution of the House of Commons based on that recommendation, and then we should have a bill based on these resolutions. That such a provision as this should appear in a private bill, and that it should never have been considered in the way a money bill should have been considered, is remarkable, and it just shows what a useful purpose this House can sometimes serve. I do not think it is necessary to enumerate the sections of the British North America Act which deal with this matter. Section 53 says:

Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue, or for imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

Section 54 provides that it shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, &c., that has not first been recommended to that House by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, &c., is proposed. So I think the constitutional point is quite clear. Some hon. gentlemen might, perhaps, say that while any bill imposing a tax cannot be introduced in any other way, that a bill which proposes to release a claim can; but the authorities show that that is not the case. I am not going to trouble the House with references, but reference to Todd's "Government in the Colonies" and his "Parliamentary Government in England," will show that that is the case. The remission is in the same position as the imposition. So hon. gentlemen, I do not think it necessary to trouble the House any further on this point. I think the case is perfectly clear, the constitutional point is clear; and then, as a matter of policy, hon. gentlemen must all feel that there could be no more unwise or vicious policy than that of authorizing the government to give away the property of the people of this country without directly consulting parliament on that question. The proper and constitutional way is to have the proposed measure recommended by His Excellency, and dealt with in the usual way in which money bills are dealt with in the House of Commons, and I might say that, while what I say now may appear to reflect somewhat on the government of the day, my own impression is that the government were not any more aware of this peculiar provision in this bill than members of both Houses generally were. Perhaps they should be, but no one would look for such a provision in a private bill; though it is wonderful that the members of the Railway Committee of the House of Commons did not discover it. I therefore move:

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by striking out all the words in the third clause after "hereunder" on line tw nty of the second page.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The facts stated by the senior member for Halifax are correct. The loan made by the government was for the period of fifteen years, which expired, and I presume those words were added to enable the government to extend the time to take a new mortgage, because I understand an application for a renewal—

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It might mean more than that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think so. I do not share the alarm of my hon. friend to the same extent. It is to remain a charge and lien on the property unless the government shall otherwise agree or consent. The meaning is that the government could insist now on the payment, or could give them an extension of time. That is no doubt what was in the mind of the person who drew the clause, and it would be rather straining the position to say that the government would, or could, release a mortgage for $480,000 on which parties were paying interest, and on which, under the terms of this bill, they recognized their responsibility and made a first charge for the $125,000 authorized to be issued as a renewal of the former mortgage. The mortgage still remains and the government would have no power to release that mortgage unless it was paid, and could not possibly do it. It would amount to a fraud on the part of the government. I have no doubt the words were put in there to enable the government to extend the time. I understand an application has been made to the Finance Minister, and as they are paying four per cent there would be no objection to doing it. I do not put any stress on the words and so do not care whether they are there or not.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I think the bill requires to be amended, either as the hon. senior member for Halifax suggests, or by adding at the end of the clause "unless the government shall otherwise agree to extend the time".

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That will do.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not profess to be an authority on the constitutional question which the hon. senior member for Halifax has raised, but it does appear to me as if the position he has taken is correctly taken, the arguments which he has used prove conclusively that, at all events, these words in the bill must be entirely harmless. The hon. gentleman, if I understand him correctly, has stated to the House that no measure for the payment of moneys, nor any measure for remitting an amount of money due the government from any private source, can become law unless it is introduced by a resolution from the government, and afterwards by a bill. I am inclined to think, so far as I understand our constitution, that the hon. gentleman is quite correct in that, and if he is, the insertion of these words certainly give the government no power whatever to remit to the company under any circumstances, the amount of the lien or mortgage which they have on this work. The object which the company have in view, as I understand it, is to make provision in this simple way, in case of any change in their financial arrangements, to be able to make that change without being obliged to come back to parliament and have the expense and trouble of passing a private bill through this House, and the interests of the country will be quite safe, in a case of this kind, from the very fact that the principle exists in our constitution which the hon. senior member for Halifax has pointed out, that the government will be obliged to bring in whatever legislation may be necessary to perfect these changes on their part, and pass it through the House before the changes can go into effect; but with this simple clause in the bill, the company, on their part, will be enabled to give their assent to those changes without coming back to the House for any further legislation. I really do not see any ground for apprehension, so far as this clause in the bill is concerned, and I cannot think that the hon. member is right in assuming that the government in the other branch of the legislature did not fully consider this matter and the Railway Committee, did not consider it as well. That bill was carefully looked into by the Minister of Railways—at least so I am informed—and he saw no objection whatever to the words which the hon. gentleman has referred to. I hope this clause in the bill will not be altered. I really do not see any necessity for it, and unless some necessity can be pointed out, it is not desirable at this stage of the session that it should be sent back to the Commons.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The very fact that it is a doubtful point and arguable on both sides of the question, honestly and fairly, seems to be a sufficient reason for this House deleting these words. I am told the promoters of this bill disclaim—and we have just heard an argument in that direction—any intention that they should bear the interpretation put upon them by the hon. senior member for Halifax ; but we all know perfectly that if the question is at all debatable, if there is any doubt about it at all, no mortal man can foresee in what direction or to what extent the objection may take actual force in practice. I, for one, think ambiguity of every kind should be deleted from every bill, as far as we can possibly do so, and it is the function of this Senate to guard and watch with the greatest care, and put out every phrase and clause which admits of ambiguity, or which would confer upon any government whatsoever such power as this may reasonably be expected to confer. I therefore support the proposal to delete these words.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—This bridge, as has been stated, has received a large amount of aid through loans from the Dominion government. In looking at the returns, so far as we have them, of the cost of the bridge, the loan certainly covers the larger portion of it. This undertaking is under the General Railway Act in force in Canada, but I fail to find anything in the returns showing us what the earnings of this bridge are. Before the company comes to parliament and asks us to extend that loan for a further period, they should be able to show us what security they have to offer. We know they have paid interest at four per cent, but the bridge is always wearing out, and circumstances are changing.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—We are not asking to extend the government loan.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Should we not have some information about the road? There is no report of this road and has not been for some time.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—This is one of the leased lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—When a line is leased, is there any provision that it shall make no returns ?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—It is included in the returns of the other road.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—It may be so. We know nothing about what the earnings of this road are and what the lease is, and we should have some information as to how long the earnings of this road are likely to continue, which we would be able to do if we knew what it was earning. Unless we have something in the shape of an annual return from this company, I shall direct the attention of the government to the fact in order that such return may be made.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I have no interest in the bill excepting as a citizen of St. John and knowing the gentlemen comprising the company. Two insinuations have been thrown out in this debate that I feel should not be accepted by this House. The first is that gentlemen comprising this company would be so dishonest as to try to obtain money from this government without giving value. If they knew the gentlemen comprising the company as I do, they would not for a moment entertain such a thought of them. One of them is a leading judge of our Supreme Court, and others merchants of long standing. And secondly, even supposing they were not honest, is the government of Canada going to throw away the public moneys of the country to these men? These men were trusted by a former government and appointed to high offices in the country, and therefore it is not likely that they would be guilty of dishonesty. When this bill was placed in my hands, in the absence of the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland, I thought it was my duty to obtain the best legal advice I could. I made application to members of the government in whom I had entire confidence. The Minister of Railways, one of the soundest lawyers in the country, I have reason to believe, was of the opinion that this amendment did not affect the security at all. The government are amply secured whenever they choose to realize upon the amount of money loaned to this company. Therefore, under those considerations, whilst I do not care whether the amendment be carried or not, I think out of courtesy to the House of Commons and to the committee of that House, and in deference to the knowledge of the several legal gentlemen who pronounced that this bill was satisfactory, we should allow it to pass; but I leave it in the hands of the House.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—As I view this matter the government are now in possession of and hold the first mortgage on the property.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not in possession.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Well, they hold the first mortgage.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not see why they should give up that lien and allow other parties to take advantage of it. It is true they can sell the property, but subject to the lien the government have upon it. Under this clause they could dispose of that mortgage for any amount of money they thought proper. Is it advisable to place that power in the hands of any government? That is the question, and it is a simple one. They can foreclose that mortgage to-morrow, if they desire to do it. At present they are in possession of the mortgage to its full value. I do not think it is right to dispossess them of it, or give a possible chance of the government interfering in anyway. At the committee meeting I think the understanding with the government was that they intended to realize on the mortgage all they could, and allow the second mortgagees to come in and buy it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, the transaction was this: the $125,000 bonds are now overdue, and the holders of them wanted to get a renewal for fifteen years. They come to parliament with this bill for that purpose, and they specially provide that it does not disturb or interfere with the government, and they have applied to the government to allow this mortgage to stand at the rate of four per cent. All the interest has been paid regularly.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—But still I think it ought to be beyond all doubt that the government retain their security as first mortgagee under any circumstances, and they should have no power to dispossess them of that property until their full mortgage is paid.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Nor have they power.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—"Or unless the government of Canada should otherwise agree or consent"—what does that mean?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It must strike the hon. members of this House that this is, to say the least of it, weak legislation, it is imperfect legislation when a clause of that kind is put in. We are dealing with what this bill now practically renews, the government lien, the amount of $480,000 which has always been a good asset. These new holders want to raise $125,000. They occupied, prior to this bill, a second place; this bill opens the way to give them the first place.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It looks like it.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—There is not a word to that effect.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not say the bill does so provide; it gives the government power to make such an agreement. If this bill did not provide for the renewal of the first lien, and that legislation had come from the government in order to secure themselves again, parliament would have control over this particular question, but this bill provides for a renewal. There is no necessity for the government asking for further legislation upon the first lien, because they have it and they have it under this bill. But this bill has an ambiguous sound in it in the words referred to in the amendment, that is to say "until or unless the government of Canada shall otherwise agree or consent." Consent to what? Consent to make those bonds of $125,000 more valuable.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am not prepared here to say what is right, but as the hon. member of Kennebec (Hon. Mr. Drummond) says, if it is a debatable point, if there is any doubt upon the question, we ought to remove the doubt by expunging all those words. There can be no harm in taking them out, and there can be no value to the company in having them in.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I cannot see that these words in the bill give the government any power to change the position which the company holds towards parliament in the lease. The words that are in the bill do not give power to the government to overrule constitutional law. They give it power only to act under the present Act and under the constitutional law; so I do not see any danger about that; but, on the other hand, I must admit that I do not see the use of those words standing as part of the bill. The company have made arrangements which have been carried into effect by the law of parliament. Should the company wish to change their position after having made an arrangement and the government having submitted to parliament those changes, parliament would be at liberty to accept or refuse. Such is my opinion, and for that reason I shall vote to strike out the words referred to.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This question has been discussed as though it were a government measure and as though the government had some interest in keeping these words in the bill. This is a company's bill and in it are proposals made by the company. There is no proposal here made by the administration and the government have no interest in the world in keeping these words in the bill.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I did not imagine they had.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let me say further, that I think there is some misapprehension as to what the powers of the Crown are in a matter of this sort. With regard to the exercise of executive authority, the Crown possesses its power just as much as private individuals possess control over their estates. The Crown, so far as the executive government is concerned, where parliament has not intervened, may create a new department or may decide what the functions of that department is, may distribute the executive authority for the purpose of carrying it out as it thinks best in the public interest, just the same as any private individual might make arrangements for the management of some institution of which he was proprietor. Now the Crown, with regard to the property that is vested in the Crown, possesses exactly the same power, except in so far as there is express limitation by parliament, as any private individual has over his estate. The Crown may make a good and valid title to property that belongs to the Crown; it may make such conveyance as it sees proper, so long as the conveyance is made in conformity with the law. A large portion of this whole continent has been conveyed away by the Crown in that way, simply as any other proprietor could make a conveyance of property that is vested in him. As I understand it—I have not looked at the bill but I am stating the general principle—if the Crown takes a mortgage upon property, the Crown's interest in that is precisely the same as that of any private individual who took a mortgage upon such property, and it may dispose of that mortgage in conformity with the law, it may deal with the matter precisely the same as any individual.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not without power from parliament.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, unless parliament witholds or restricts the power. The power is inherent; it does not need to be conferred; it is power which the Crown possesses, but if parliament chooses to intervene in the legislation and limit that authority, then of course parliament has a perfect right to do so. It does so on the assumption that Parliament, consisting of two Houses that are Counsellors of the Crown, are superior to the Privy Council of the Crown. Now, the principle in regard to a matter of this sort is that if the Crown were to deal with this kind of property in any way inconsistent with the public interest, the administration would be responsible, not the Crown, and the administration would be censurable by either House or both Houses of parliament for any act of misconduct in dealing with the estates or properties of the Crown which are held in trust for the benefit of the public. Now I see no reason in the world for retaining those words. I would say, from reading the concluding portion of this section, that the parties—the company interested in this Bill—propose to deal with the Crown perhaps with regard to a part payment in order to alter the manner in which the securities are held. What they say here is:

And provided also, that all such advances made by the government of Canada under the last mentioned Act shall be and remain a charge and a lien upon the property of the company, conveyed by the said mortgage prior to any mortgage made under the authority of this Act, or any bonds or debentures issued hereunder, until or unless the government of Canada shall otherwise agree or consent.

The company may have had in view a part payment to the government; they may have had in view a diminution of the amount of their indebtedness to other parties; they may have wanted to secure a diminution of the interest; they might think that if they largely reduced the amount of their indebtedness, it would not matter as to the order in which the securities stood. All this may have been in contemplation by the company; they may, for the purpose of enabling them to deal with greater freedom with the government, may have proposed this provision. I may say to hon. gentlemen that if the Crown have not the power, it is not a power they desire to exercise in this case; they have no intention of exercising it if the words remain in the bill; they are perfectly willing that these words shall be struck out, because they do not expect to deal with this except with the approbation of parliament.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman mean us to infer that the government would have the power to reduce the interest on these mortgages bearing 4 per cent without the consent of parliament?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The mortgage is overdue; I know no power—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not the question I asked. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the members of the company might have had certain things in their mind when they placed these words in this clause, and among others he mentioned the reduction of the interest. What I ask is this: Whether the Hon. Minister of Justice desires to convey the idea to the House that the government, without the sanction of parliament, would have the right to reduce that interest from four per cent to any other percentage?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend puts me a question, but my hon. friend will see that I said nothing about what the government had in their mind; I said what the company have in their mind. The government had nothing to do with the bill. I do not understand that any member of the government was consulted with regard to the provisions of this bill. But if my hon. friend asks me, supposing there should be no restrictive legislation, no express restraint put on the administration, have they power to deal, I say the government have always before their mind the view that parliament will sanction their exercise of the power. Supposing, for instance, that this mortgage had been taken at a period when money was worth ten per cent, and supposing, now that the mortgage is overdue, that the parties propose to pay it off, and that the government did not want to receive the money, and they were to agree to take a new mortgage at five per cent or at four per cent or at any rate that was reasonable, my hon. friend does not suppose that the government would not have power to make such an arrangement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes I do.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then I differ from him. I say the Crown has a proprietory interest in the mortgage, and in that respect it does not differ from any other individual except that being a corporation it acts through its executive.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I take issue with the hon. gentleman in the latter part of his statement. If the government has loaned money at 10 per cent, and that mortgage falls due, the mortgagor has the right to pay off the amount. If they do not the government have no right to make a new loan without the sanction of parliament.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—They get the sanction in this.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is a loan to this company of $400,000.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And is still a loan, because it is not paid, and it will continue to be a loan till it is paid. If that company desire to pay off the mortgage they have a perfect right to do so, but what I say is the government, I mean the executive of the day, has no right to dispose of public funds by making a new loan to that company of $400,000 at three per cent or any other percentage, without first obtaining the sanction of parliament. If they do so they do it on their own responsibility as an executive, anticipating the sanctioning of their act by parliament. Governments have entered into contracts which have not been approved of by parliament, and consequently they have been of no effect. The only point in this case is simply the question as to whether the government would have any power, under the words in this clause, of the character the hon. gentleman has indicated? Those who are interested, that is the company, might desire to accomplish one of the objects that he indicated, and, as has already been said, it is so full of ambiguity it is much better that the words should be struck out. If the intention of the promoters of the bill were those which were indicated by the hon. Secretary of State, they should have said so, and not left parliament in a position to put a dozen different interpretations on the clause.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—If I understood the argument of the Minister of Justice right, it upholds my own contention as well as the contention of the senior member for Halifax, and the contention of the leader of the opposition, that these words in this bill confer on the government no new power whatever. Whatever powers they have, they possess either as a matter of right or by virtue of some other legislation. My view is that they are simply there in case of a sale of the property or any new lease or arrangement to enable the government to enter into an arrangement with the company without coming back to parliament for legislation. I should like to know if I am correct on that point, because if I am it removes a misapprehension which is in the minds of the hon. gentlemen from Ottawa and Montreal and some other hon. gentlemen, that we are by this clause giving the government some new power to deal with this company.

Hon. Mr. WARK—I did not intend to take any share in this debate, but a little explanation to the House might not be amiss. This is a work that ought never to have been undertaken by a company. If there is any undertaking in Canada that deserves to be made a public work, this is one. The Intercolonial Railway came down to within a quarter of a mile of where the bridge has been built, carrying mails and passengers from the whole of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and eastern New Brunswick, and even travellers from the eastern parts of Canada. It brought them down to the banks of the river, and there they had to stop and get out of the cars to cross the river. The traffic had all to go by ferry, but there was a private bridge where coaches could take passengers over. On the other side there was a railway coming in that collected all the traffic from western New Brunswick and all the mails and travellers from the United States, and when they came to the bank of the river at this point they were stopped in the same way. There was no undertaking, perhaps, in Canada that deserved better to have been constructed as a public work than this bridge, and it was a great mistake that a company was ever organized to construct it. But a company was organized and we have here the conditions on which this money was loaned. At the time this loan was made, although New Brunswick had two representatives in the government and Nova Scotia had two, the representatives of New Brunswick at that time were too modest to ask to have this done as a public work, and they were very glad to get a loan at four per cent, while in Nova Scotia there was six or seven millions of dollars expended at that time on public works at the public expense. If the present government would take this bridge over they would be perfectly justified in doing so, and remitting the debt to the company. As we are situated there now we have the company collecting about eighteen thousand dollars a year from the public, while all these public works of Nova Scotia are free. There is a bridge with a draw, as the hon. gentleman from Halifax may remember, at the Grand Narrows which was constructed and has ever since been maintained at the public expense, while this bridge company at St. John is collecting eighteen thousand dollars a year from the public and handing it over to the government. We have now a representative of New Brunswick in the government that I think will look more sharply after the interest of his province than those who preceded him, and I hope his two colleagues here will support him if he, on some future occasion, brings forward a proposition to have the government take over this bridge and make it a public work.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed.

TRADE MARK AND DESIGN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (61) "An Act in further amendment of the Trade Mark and Design Act." He said: This bill was up on a former occasion and was postponed. Some hon. gentleman wanted further explanation, and it was suggested that the opinion of the Department of Justice should be obtained. I think on analysis it will be found that the language of the section conveys pretty clearly and accurately the intention of the bill and the object of the person who drafted it. It practically means that all marks adopted by any union of workmen shall be considered and known as trademarks as far as that association or union is concerned, that any union of workmen can adopt and register a trademark. The hon. Minister of Justice was present I believe and heard the members of the unions and may be able to give their explanations. I move the second reading of the bill. I may say that this is not a government bill. It was taken up by me, as I explained before, by mistake.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the hon. gentlemen fathers it now; it is his adopted child.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It looks very like it; the Minister of Justice has been consulted and the bill is here.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—This bill requires a great deal more consideration than we are able to apply to it on a second reading. In fact, I feel inclined to move that it be postponed sine die for further consideration. As I understand this bill, it is from the trades union organizations to have a special trade mark for their own purposes. It is not to provide that in case trades union men desire to form a company in order to prosecute their work as if they were one individual, in which case they would be perfectly entitled to any trade mark or design that is open to any joint stock company in the country. They would come under the general law and could employ any mark that they desire; they could be a distinct organization and manufacturing concern, or anything of that kind, just the same that anything of that kind is. The law, I fully agree, provides for trade marks and designs in all cases of that kind, but this, as I read the bill is not the purport of it. The purport of it is to allow trade unions to force their employers to use their trade mark in order to emphasize the fact that the work of that employer has been done by union labour.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh no, that is not the meaning of it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is my understanding of it. I have gathered my understanding of it from what has taken place in Toronto as I have observed it in the public press. This has been a great question in the city of Toronto; in fact, I believe that the election of councillors was run somewhat on the line of this legislation, and a by-law was secured in the city by the trades unions for the purpose of carrying out in the city of Toronto the principle of this legislation. That by-law was only carried by a majority of one, but it is, so far as it has been put in force by that majority, the law in the city of Toronto that all public documents or all public printing, or anything of that kind must have the mark of a trade union. It was severely contested, and as I have stated one of the opponents of this very legislation was hotly opposed, but he was returned and the by-law was brought up and carried by a majority of one. My reason for opposing this bill is that I do not think there is sufficient public opinion behind this legislation to warrant us in putting it on the Statute-book without further consideration, and without further discussion in the public press on the merits or demerits of the principle. There is no one who has greater sympathy with the labouring men in their efforts to raise the standard of their calling than I have. But at the same time I only sympathize with them to the extent that they constitute what I might call defensive measures. The very moment they attempt aggressive measures, then I think we should inquire very closely as to the legislation they desire for that purpose. As hon. gentlemen know perfectly well, I am opposed to the principle of monopoly, and this bill is conceived in that principle, and whether that monopoly should come from a congregation of men or from the great Canadian Pacific Railway, so long as I think there is monopoly in it, I consider it against the welfare of the citizens of Canada and of the country generally that that spirit should be allowed to grow. There is no greater tyranny than that engendered by a congregation of people or a joint stock company. The old saying is that they have no soul to be burned or body to be kicked, and a congregation of trades unionists is very much on the same principal when they seek legislation that gives them the powers which this bill proposes to confer according to my reading of it. Now, supposing any one is carrying on a manufacturing concern, or a printing establishment, or anything else, this bill requires that in that manufactory or printing establishment the trades unionists shall have the right to put their work upon the goods to show whether that establishment employs union men—so that they can distinguish those employers who are employing strictly union men or non-union men. That is a principle that is not safe. It is a spirit of boycott. If the bill has any such meaning, it is a dangerous provision to put on our Statute-book, and for that reason I think it is desirable to have a further consideration of this measure and allow the public to discuss it more generally in its details. If the public, through the ordinary means of communication, the press, and other ways, think it is a harmless measure, I think this House may then give it favourable consideration ; but when a bill is brought here without any public discussion of any kind or description, and contains the provision which I have explained to the House, I think it is wise, in the interests of the trades unionists themselves, who certainly do not want to weaken the sympathies of the public by any aggressive legislation of this kind, as well as in the interests of the legislation of this country, that the consideration of the bill should be postponed. I therefore move that the consideration of this bill be postponed sine die.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—May I ask the hon. Secretary of State what benefit they expect to derive from the bill if it passes? Because I have not heard of any benefit.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think this is a somewhat heroic course to adopt towards an amendment asked for by a large section of the community, the labouring classes. I do not see that the proposed amendment to the Act interfers with the right of anybody. All these men ask by this bill is the privilege of marking articles with their trade mark. That is all that is provided for in the bill. The legislation is exactly the same as the legislation of the United Kinddom upon this subject. It is neither more restricted nor more comprehensive. If hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to read the bill they will see that that is all that these people asked for. Where members of the Trades Union or Labour Council are engaged in any factory, or any manufactory, they ask for the privilege, of course with the consent of the proprietor.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, no.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They certainly could not do it without his consent nor could we authorize them, and if that is the objection of the hon. gentleman he can remove that doubt.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We cannot reply to any arguments now; the motion was carried

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No; it has not been put.

The SPEAKER—I put the motion but did not declare it carried, because the hon. gentleman was rising to speak.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman is in the wrong in this as in other matters.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I thought it was carried.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And what do these men ask for? The members of their union are exclusively employed in the production of particular articles, and they ask that the goods may be marked with their trade mark. This is not a proposition that they can mark the goods without the consent of the proprietor.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—What do you make of the expression in line 12? Not only does it apply to goods manufactured by the association, but "compounded, produced or packed by or through the labour of any of the members of such association." The description of it given by the hon. gentleman from Shell River is strictly accurate.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Not a co-operative society, but working for an employer.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But they may mark the goods with the consent of the proprietor.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—There is nothing about that in the bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We cannot so far interfere with property and civil rights as to give one man the privilege of marking another man's goods without his consent. All that these parties are asking for is that nobody else shall use their trade mark—that the proprietors shall not use their trade mark without their consent; when any goods are marked with that trade mark it will show that they are the production of members of this society. The bill does not go beyond that.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I think it goes a long way beyond it. I share the views of the hon. gentleman from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) that if an association or union of working men are engaged themselves in the manufacture of any goods, they are as much entitled to a trade mark and to retain that trade mark as their own property as any other combination of proprietorship, such as companies or private individuals. But if you put into this bill words which extend that power and enable them to claim that, having bestowed their labour in the production of such goods, they are entitled to mark it with some special mark of their own which will carry its consequences much further, you are transgressing the very principles you yourself laid down.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is this a government measure?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it is not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I may say this measure has been slightly discussed on two or three occasions, and I do not think it has come before the House in a proper manner. It deals with a very important matter of trade and commerce, and it should really come to us as a government measure.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When it came up in the first instance the name of the Hon. Secretary of State was attached to it, and he told us frankly that it was rather a mistake that his name was connected with the bill. I notice that from that time my hon. friend has been acting as a very cold foster father, and it does not seem that the government are very strong in support of it. In fact, the conduct of the member of the government who has been connected with it, and the way in which he has treated it time and again, indicate that he is not very enthusiastic in regard to it. I think, therefore, we should allow it to lie over until the government can consider it, and if they are prepared to deal with it we can have a measure from them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is ready to send to a committee for their consideration matters of much greater importance than this, and to dispense with responsible government in connection with them. Now it is proposed to read this bill a second time, and the committee of the whole House will have an opportunity to consider it, and if my hon. friend thinks that the bill interferes with the right of any party, it would be the easiest matter in the world to add the words: "Provided always that no mark shall be put upon the goods without the consent of the proprietor." The objection then would be entirely met.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then you would create a row between employee and employer. I think the House has a right to take a stand on this bill one way or the other.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are supporting the measure.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend opposite takes no position.

Hon Mr. POWER—I have no objection to the substance of the bill, but to form, and I had hoped that the Department of Justice would have taken some action in the way of improving the form of the measure. As I stated on a previous occasion, the passing of this measure is likely to lead to some confusion. The object of this bill does not come within the purview of the chapter respecting trade marks and industrial designs. If the Minister of Justice will give me his attention I will try to make that clear to him. Section 4 of the Trade Mark and Design Act says:

A trade mark may be general or specific, according to the use to which it is applied or intended to be applied by the proprietor thereof:

(a) A general trade mark is one used in connection with the sale of various articles in which the proprietor deals in his trade, business, occupation or calling generally.

This mark, which is intended to indicate that a certain article has been made by a man who was a member of a given trades union, does not come under that general head.

(b.) A specific trade mark is one used in connection with the sale of a class of merchandise of a particular description.

That is to say, Bass's ale, Burk's porter, and so on. The trade mark for goods of that kind is a specific trade mark. The mark which this bill wishes to have recognized as a trade mark is neither one nor the other. It is a different thing. I do not myself see that there is any very special objection to parliament given recognition to marks selected by trades unions, if that is thought desirable, but I do not think that these marks should be confounded with trade marks, which are intended for a different purpose altogether. Section 12 of the Trade Mark Act says:

The Minister of Agriculture may object to register any trade mark in the following cases.

It gives several cases and paragraph B is:

If the so-called trade mark does not contain the essentials necessary to constitute a trade mark properly speaking.

Should the bill go into operation, it would be the duty of the Minister of Agriculture to refuse to register a mark of this kind, on the ground that it was not a trade mark.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If there was no law authorizing it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The object of the Trade Mark and Design Act is not the object of this bill. I think it would be a perfectly reasonable thing to say "With the consent of the proprietor of the factory, members of the trades union shall be allowed to place such marks on the goods which they manufacture as will identify those goods," but I do not think I should call that a trade mark, and I do not think it is good legislation to describe it as being a trade mark, because it does not come within the scope and our purview of the Act respecting trade marks. I think we might amend it in committee.

The House divided on the amendment which was agreed to on the following division:—

DEPARTMENT OF GEOLOGICAL SURVEY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (114) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the Department of Geological Survey."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The object of this bill, as was explained on the second reading, is to enable the minister at the head of the Geological Survey branch of the government to appoint, from time to time, temporary men without their having qualified under the Civil Service Act. They must have the qualifications required under the Act organizing the department, and those qualifications provide that any one so appointed must be a scienced graduate of a Canadian or foreign university or science school in London or some other recognized school, or a graduate of the military college.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE, from the Committee, reported the bill without amendment.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (127): "An Act further to amend the Fisheries Act."

He said: The amendments referred to in this bill are in a sense important, but they are amendments that are bound to be actually necessary from the practice of the department. In clause 14 the only change is with reference to the running of fish between the times indicated in it. As the law stood, it only affected those persons who held licenses, and it ought to apply to persons whether they hold licenses or not. So the words in this clause are: "Whether under license or not." And the word "apparatus" is introduced in order to give a wider meaning to the various appliances that are used. Subsection 19 of section 14 is new.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That takes the power out of the hands of the minister.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It widens the application of the Act. Then the changes in clause 18 are simply with reference to the penalties. There was a range of penalties first, second and third offences, in the law as it stood; it commenced at $20 and was an increasing penalty. The other clause is rather larger and embraces all kinds of fish. I will give a fuller explanation when the bill is before the Committee.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I have no doubt this is a very necessary and important bill, and I hope the government will find some means of carrying out its provisions. Lately, as you know, we passed an Act in reference to a matter that has been in agitation in this parliament for the last eight or nine years—I allude to the pollution of our rivers. That Act came into force on the 1st of May last, and is a dead letter today. Some of the mill owners, at any rate, are throwing sawdust and refuse from the mills at Ottawa into the river the same as they did before the law was passed. Now there ought to be some action taken to enforce any Act of parliament. This Act is, no doubt, most desirable, and one that will be productive of great good; but if there is no provision for carrying out its provisions, should it be allowed to be a dead letter as it is in the present instance with respect to the Ottawa River? I think that it is the duty of the government to see that the Act is enforced, as well as all Acts on the Statute-book. The pollution of this river is under the very eyes of the government of this country, and that they have not taken any means to prevent it. It is certainly deplorable to think that an Act passed, as this has been, under a variety of circumstances should be allowed to remain a dead letter. It shows that the parties who are polluting the river are determined to frustrate any Act of this Parliament, and to defy the people of this country. It is a disgraceful thing that it should be allowed to continue one day longer. I take this opportunity of bringing the matter prominently before the notice of the government in order that they may take the necessary means to enforce this law. Ample time was allowed the mill owners to make provision for the extinction of this nuisance, because the nuisance has existed for the last twenty-six or thirty years within the knowledge of the government, and so after eight or nine years' agitation, the evil ought to be remedied, I hope and trust that not an hour will be lost by the government in enforcing this law. What is the use of passing laws here unless we make provision for their enforcement? I suppose I may be told that when we pass laws our duty ends, that is the duty of other parties to carry them out; but in this instance the duty rests with the government. I am told that these parties contend that the government had no right to pass the measure referred to. Well, the sooner we know whether we have the right the better. Let us understand the thing thoroughly.

Some years ago an Act was passed by parliament to prevent the polution of rivers, but the government from time to time introduced amendments to exempt certain rivers, among them the Ottawa, from the operation of the act, and thus prevented the law being carried generally into operation. I hope this will not occur in this or any other matter, because it is the duty of every government to enforce the laws on the Statute-book without preference to rich or poor. The hon. Secretary of State knows perfectly well the ruin that this has been to our magnificent river.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The law prohibiting the polluting of streams has been in force since the 1st of May, and it is in the power of any private prosecutor to take proceedings against any person who infringes the provisions of that Act. This bill now before us is not, perhaps, germane to the subject to which the hon. gentleman has referred, as it relates to an entirely different subject. However, if I am correctly informed, all the mill men on the Ottawa River, except one, have erected cinerators for the purpose of consuming the sawdust, or have made provision for disposing of it in some other way. I have no doubt there will be guardians among the private citizens of Ottawa who will see that the river is not polluted in the future, whether the government take any action or not.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not believe this action should be left to any private individual. It is the duty of the government, I contend, and they ought to fulfil their trust; and it is not right to ask any individual to become an informer, because we all know there is a strong feeling in this and every other country against informers, and I again call upon the government to see that the provisions of the act are enforced, and if they do not take action, the people of this country will hold them responsible for such neglect.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—There is scarcely a session in which we have not had some legislation introduced for protecting the fisheries of the country, but if that legislation is not in force it is very little use for us to be passing acts respecting it. We know that there have been various acts passed for the purpose of protecting the fisheries, more especially the lobster fishery, which is a very important industry in this country, and notwithstanding those acts limiting the time within which fishing is to be carried on within the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the waters of the Dominion, the time is frequently extended by the authority of the minister at the head of the department, and therefore the acts are made null and void, and the lobster fishery, which, as I have said, is a very important industry, is ruined. Now, it is very well for us to introduce legislation of this kind here, but if the government is to continue suspending regulations which are made under acts of parliament, it is time that we should look into it very closely and see that those acts are enforced. The act to prevent the pollution of rivers with mill refuse is not the only one which has not been enforced according to the terms of the law, for the various acts which have been passed respecting those fisheries are in the very same position; and, although we are making very stringent regulations here, I doubt very much whether they will be enforced more effectively than the laws already placed on the Statute-book.

The bill was read the second time.

THE GREAT NORTH-WEST RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF COMMITTEE'S AMENDMENTS.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, to Bill (L) "An Act respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I was present at the meeting of the committee on Friday last when this subject was under discussion. I then raised the point that while the rights of the bond holders and Charlebois, under the bill which was then being discussed, were fully protected, the various other claims against the railway are being cut out entirely. I called the attention of the committee to that fact, and also to the fact that I then held in my hands the claims of certain gentlemen who are residents of this city, one of whom is J. R. Devlin, whose claim is $33,000 and another, W. A. Allan, with a claim of between forty and fifty thousand dollars, and that those large claims by the passing of this bill were being legislated practically out of existence, and I asked the committee that they should insure that the claims of Mr. Allan and Mr. Devlin should be sufficiently protected as well as these others. I gathered from the expression of the committee that they were entirely in accord with my views, but I have been informed that an amendment was introduced after I left the committee room, whereby the very fact which I wished to guard against was actually carried into execution, and a number of claims, in fact all except those of Charlebois and the bondholders of this road, are legislated out of existence.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who incurred those debts?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—That is not a matter we have anything to do with.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is just the thing we have to do with.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—We have nothing to do with the validity or non-validity of the claims. What we ought to provide against is that no claimant, no matter what position he may occupy, shall have his claim legislated out of existence. That is all I ask. Now, for the benefit of some hon. gentlemen who may not be acquainted with the working of this road, I may state that it has been in litigation now for the last fifteen or sixteen years, and during that time it has assumed changes of a protean character. There has been a constant series of litigation. You can hardly pick up a newspaper in which you will not find a reference made to a judge or an application to a master of some court or some other official in reference to this matter. No doubt all of us have had experience in the course of our lives of the cost of legal proceedings. If we knew the cost of this litigation it would make our hair stand on end.

Hon, Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—About $40,000.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I do not think that approaches what the cost has been in connection with this litigation. There were suits brought in one court and another, and judgments were appealed against and reversed, and finally the matter got to the Supreme Court where a judgment was given which placed a certain number of the contestants in charge of the road; and then it was taken to the Privy Council and the result was the reversing of the judgment given here, and putting a lot of other people in charge. I may say that I have been informed that it took the Hon. Mr. Blake, who represented some of the contestants in this case before the Privy Council, the space of six weeks before he could get thoroughly to understand what was the line of argument he was to adopt before the Privy Council. In the face of all this, a committee of this House composed very largely of laymen, all men of excellent judgment and ability, no doubt, but lacking in professional and technical knowledge to understand these matters, are asked to adjudicate upon this complex and abstruse matter and the result has been that by an ingenious amendment framed by the solicitor for the promotors of this bill, the very fact which the committee themselves, I learned from the chairman, were really anxious to guard against, has been carried into effect, and now with the exception of the claims which I have named and which are specially recorded in the bill all the other claimants of whatever nature have been legislated, or will be if this bill is passed out of existence. I may say in reply to the remark of my hon. friend from Victoria that we have nothing whatever to say as to the validity or non-validity of any claims against that road, but in the spirit of fairness, and in the anxiety which I know permeates the mind of every hon. gentleman of this House that only justice shall be done to people who come before us seeking legislation, I would say that this should be rectified, and the committee should see that justice is done to all parties. I had intended framing an amendment to this bill myself, but taking it up rather too late, before the House was in session, I found it difficult to frame it to my own satisfaction, besides which, I did not wish to incur the responsibility of framing such an amendment as might perhaps not cover the point. The more I looked at it, the more difficult it was to cover exactly the point, although I know perfectly well what I wish to cover; therefore, I think this should be referred back to the committee.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Has the hon. gentleman got the bill before him? If so, would he give us an opinion on the matter?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—In answer to my hon. friend I would quote the words of the hon. member for Montreal, we do not want it to be a matter of opinion of one lawyer or another; we want the thing definite; if this House is of the opinion that certain parties rights, of which they know nothing, should be legislated against, let them pass this bill.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am not a lawyer; I want an opinion as a member of this House.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I am not going to give an opinion upon it, because I have heard adverse opinions ; and legal gentlemen will give opinions very much according to which side retains them. I ask that this matter should be referred to the committee so that this shall be definitely guarded against, and I do not think anybody, in fairness, should object to such a proposal. I therefore move :

That this bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours with instructions to see that the rights of all parties that may have claims against this railway should be protected.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The hon. gentleman is slightly in error respecting some exceptions he makes against this bill. It does provide for all possible claims against this company in accordance with the decision of the lords of the Privy Council in England. It is necessary, in the first instance, for this company to obtain authority to issue new debentures to take the place of the old debentures, because without that it would be perfectly impossible to float this reorganized company on the financial market. It provides that Mr. Charlebois shall be paid a quantum meruit out of the proceeds of these bonds. The old bonds shall be given up and the parties holding these bonds shall be satisfied from the proceeds of new bonds to be issued in their stead. I may say that I am one of those who are in the position of Messrs. Allan and Devlin and it would be very much to my advantage if my hon. friend's contention prevailed that these parties should participate with the other parties interested, with Charlebois and the old bondholders, but unfortunately the Lords of the Privy Council have declared otherwise. They have declared that in this suit it is not proper to pronounce any decree as between Charlebois and any individual holder of shares, but that they and Charlebois are at liberty to pursue any remedy to which they may be entitled to by reason of the sum of $50,000 being contributed to construction. I may say that the claims of those parties against the company was on stock, and not for the construction of the road, and therefore was taken out of the arena of first payments to be made to Charlebois to be made out of the proceeds of the new bonds. It does not affect, as I understand the decree, to interfere with any existing rights of any parties except the privileged claims for money actually put in for the construction of the road which should be first paid, and if there is any surplus over and above that, which there cannot be, because we all know when there is fifty thousand pounds advanced in the first instance, and one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for rails, and the payments to the different contractors, the entire amount of the quantum meruit is absorbed. It thus leaves the matter in the hands of the parties who contributed to the stock to enforce their rights, whatever they may be, against A, B and C. You will all see that I am taking a very disinterested position in this case, because I should be one of the participants in the advantage to be derived from my hon. friend's proposal with Messrs. Allan and Devlin, but I am obliged and we are all obliged, to bow to the decision of the Privy Council, and there is no way of getting out of this difficulty except by accepting the bill as it is now, by raising the money for the purpose of paying off past indebtednesses and going on with the construction of the road, and giving the country the benefit of a road which they ought to have had eight or nine years ago. It is true that this question has been in litigation for the last eight or nine years and I can tell hon. gentlemen that it has cost the parties interested in those law suits a sum of not less that $60,000 ; I think it is high time now that this matter should be settled, and that this company, which is being reorganized, should have all possible advantages for the purpose of carrying out their plans. Their intentions are good, and this is the only way to carry them out to a successful issue. If you prevent these old bonds being cancelled in the way proposed, no financial concern will advance a dollar to the reorganized company, and it will retard the construction of the road and place the matter in the position in which it has been for the last eight or nine years. I hope that after the explanation I have given my hon. friend will come to the conclusion that he accept this bill and allow it to go to the other House, and if there is any objection to be urged it can be argued there ; but it has been up two or three times with us, and a sub-committee was appointed. Therefore it is far better that it should go to the lower House ; let them thrash it out and let us get the advantage of their further advice and counsel in the matter ; and if there is anything in the objection, it can be raised there and this course will not postpone the settlement of this bill. Parliament, as you all know, will not sit very much longer, and it is of the utmost importance to the country at large that this bill should be passed during the continuance of this present session. I therefore ask hon. gentlemen to give us every opportunity of facilitating this bill and sending it to the lower House; and if they find any substantial difference in the new printed bill, then they can set it forth in the lower House and it can be properly adjudicated on; but I think they will arrive at the same decision that I have come to, that under the circumstances no better solution of this difficulty can be obtained than the one proposed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I trust that the House will not adopt the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Brandon. I do not think that he has placed himself in a position to expect that his amendment would be adopted. This bill, originating in this House, was placed in the hands of the hon. gentleman from Rideau Division, and introduced in the Senate a very considerable time ago. The hon. gentleman had the bill read a second time and referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours. It was discussed for a considerable time by that committee. Some of the leading counsel in the country, representing different interests involved in the bill, appeared before the committee, and it was thought better to refer the matter to a sub-committee, which could give a more careful hearing to the counsel and deal with proposed amendments perhaps more satisfactorily than the full committee. The sub-committee was appointed and held two prolonged meetings. They heard some of the first counsel in the country, representing different and opposing interests, and reported the bill to the full committee, with several amendments. Then the matter was discussed and some trifling changes were made by the full Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, in the bill as reported from the sub-committee, and the bill which is now before us is the result of the labours of the committee and sub-committee and the learned counsel who were heard in the matter. An unusual amount of time and trouble was expended upon this bill, and it represents the best efforts of the Railway Committee. That committee do not claim that it is perfect, but it is as good as they can be expected to make it. Now, the hon. gentleman from Brandon never lifted his voice before the Railway Committee or sub-committee.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The hon. gentleman must have been absent from the meeting, because I did. I stated distinctly that I did not know anything about the merits of the case, but that I had been asked to represent those interests before the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman was not here, perhaps, and that was a reason for his not appearing at the committee meetings, but the interests the hon. gentleman speaks of were represented and they have been protected as far as possible by the bill. The claimants to whom the hon. gentleman refers are persons who claim under Mr. Charlebois, and Mr. Charlebois, under the decision of the Privy Council, has to bring a suit on what is called a quantum meruit, and this bill provides that a sufficient quantity of the new bonds shall be set aside to secure him whatever he is awarded by the court, and then those gentlemen, to whom the hon. gentleman from Brandon has referred, have a claim on Mr. Charlebois and that claim is protected by this bill. The hon. gentleman from Rideau put the whole position in a nut shell. This unfortunate Great North-west Central Railway, a very important undertaking, has been tied up by litigation for a number of years and vast expense has been incurred in the way of costs; and this bill affords the only way of having that railway built, and the amendment of the hon. gentleman, though it appears a harmless one, might have the effect of preventing the bill becoming law this session. The bill would have to go to the House of Commons, and being one in which conflicting interests are concerned, it is safe to be discussed at considerable length in the Railway Committee of that House, and if the hon. gentleman's motion prevails, the great probability is that the bill will not pass at all, and this important undertaking will be brought to a standstill and there will be a new crop of litigation during the coming year. I do not think the Senate should do anything to bring about a result like that. If this were a final and ultimate court, and all we had to do was to send it back to our Railway Committee and then let this House finally decide upon the matter, the position would be very different.

But it has to go to the other House, and if there are any interests not sufficiently protected by this bill in the shape we have it in here, the gentlemen who feel their interests are not protected will, no doubt, be able to secure the necessary protection from the other House. The committee think that all the interests concerned are protected as well as they can be under the circumstances of the case. Where there has been such a tremendous waste of money in the way of costs and otherwise, somebody is safe to be hurt, and I think if we pass this bill there will be as little harm done as can be done under the circumstances. The parties all consented to the bill.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—No.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The bill under discussion refers to a railway in the district which I have the honor to represent in this House. It is the Great North-west Central Railway. It was projected a great many years ago, and unfortunately got into position between the contractor, Mr. Charlebois, and the other interests that were concerned, and got tied up in litigation that it is not necessary to dwell upon at the present moment. The hon. gentleman who has moved the amendment is arguing for one of the creditors, and I desire to express myself on behalf of people who depend upon this railway communication for their very life, one might say, for the progress and development of their own interests which they were led to believe would follow on their settling in that district a great many years ago. In consequsnce of this litigation the road has been tied up a great many years. Now, the litigation is ended and the Privy Council has got information which I think everybody acknowledges is justified under the circumstances, and is evidently in accordance with our legal position. The amendment is simply for the purpose of referring back to the committee a question of law. This has been before the Railway Committee already, and we spent two and a half hours one day trying to disentangle the arguments. The Railway Committee appointed a sub-committee of five members and spent two days hearing the legal arguments on both sides, giving the most patient hearing they could to all parties Then it was sent back to the sub-committee where the creditor, represented by the hon. gentleman from Brandon was present, and the most careful consideration possible was given to this bill. I think the hon. member has brought this forward merely in accordance with what he believes to be his duty to one litigant, but it is not our business here to interfere on a question that is in litigation. What we are here for is to consider how we can promote the interests of the people of this country. That is the stand I have always taken, and it is certainly in the interests of the people of that western country who live on the line of this railroad, that no obstacle should be put in the way of enabling the company to clear itself of the liabilities put upon it by the Privy Council, to discharge those liabilities and proceed with the work. I see a telegram in the paper from that district expressing the joy of the people there that this litigation is ended, and that the party who is constructing the road has his surveyors at work and is to proceed at once. Therefore, I think that any delay in getting legislation through this session would be most injurious to the interest of the people. For that reason, I shall support the bill.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I do not really see that if the labours of the committee have resulted in doing an injustice that that should be an objection to referring it back to see justice done. An injustice has been done. There need be no loss of time if this bill is referred back to the committee which is to sit to-morrow morning. If I were to object to this report going through it could not pass to-day. I am willing that this bill shall go to the committee and be dealt with to-morrow. There would be no time lost, and letting it go through now would be sanctioning a bill which does an injustice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has no right to make a statement of that sort. It does not do an injustice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The difficulty which confronted the sub-committee as well as the Railway Committee in considering this bill lay in the fact that only one set of creditors seemed to be represented, or, I might say, two sets of creditors. The one representing practically those who at present control the road and the other class the creditors who had been in control; but, unfortunately, after the amendments had been agreed upon, and after the sub-committee had made its report, and, in fact after the Railway Committee had made its report, we were confronted by another class of creditors whose claims, it is alleged, we had not taken into due consideration. Although a member of that sub-committee, yet I have not sufficient confidence in myself to say that the committee have fully covered the ground which it was their duty to cover in preparing legislation to meet the various classes of claims which were presented. Now if there is any feeling that an injustice has been done to any creditor holding a valid claim against the company, it is the duty of this House to create such confidence in the minds of those creditors that their claims are receiving due consideration as we can possibly impress upon them. I must say I have lost a certain degree of confidence in the ability of the sub-committee to deal with the matter thoroughly. On the representations made to us, we thought we fully provided against all the contingencies that have arisen since we commenced to consider this bill. No injustice would be done to the promoters of this bill, whom I have endeavoured, in my humble way, to assist in every way I could to secure the legislation in view, if the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Brandon (Mr. Kirchhoffer) were carried out, namely, that this bill should be re-committed to the committee, considered to-morrow morning, brought in to-morrow afternoon and then given its third reading. Hon. gentlemen will easily perceive that if my hon. friend takes exception to-night to the report it will be impossible for the bill to receive a third reading until two or three days hence; consequently, if there is an agreement on this legislation, as undoubtedly there will be, because I accept the statement of my hon. friend that he will consent to it, this bill will receive its third reading to-morrow, and any representations of the creditors can be made before the committee to-morrow morning and any necessary amendment made. I may point out that at the very last moment, at the time when the committee thought they had disposed of the bill—that is, at the last meeting of the committee—a very important change was made. Three or four words were inserted at the instance of Mr. Arnoldi, who represented the present company, which would absolutely limit the claims to those claimants who base their claims upon the bonds. I refer to section 7, line 33 :

In respect of the bonds based upon the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The committee did consider they were dealing with a class of claims entirely irrespective of bonds, but if claims are to be limited to claims based upon bonds, then I certainly as a member of that committee, should like to have some further information, and I regret very much that the chairman of that committee is not present this afternoon. After the change was made he observed the inconsistency of the change, and I think it was likewise observed by the law clerk a few minutes after it was made, and in my humble judgment those claims, by the insertion of that phrase, have received a very much greater restriction than it was contemplated they should have.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What claims do you refer to when you say they are more restricted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The claims are now limited to all claims based upon bonds, whereas the report of the committee was intended to deal with all claims, irrespective of the fact as to whether they were based upon bonds or not. About the time the committee was rising Mr. Arnoldi suggested that those words be inserted " In respect of the bonds." The hon. Minister of Justice will see that there is quite a distinction between that class of cases and claims based upon the judgment of the Privy Council. The report of the sub-committee was that the legislation should extend to all claims based upon the judgment of the Privy Council. Now, a great limitation has been placed upon those.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should suggest to the hon. gentleman from Brandon, if the amendment he wishes to make is to strike out those words " In respect of the bonds," that he should move that that part of the amendments be not concurred in. He has a perfect right to do that.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—No, I do not think that that would have the effect of bringing in all the other claims and having them considered. I want to have such legislation passed as will allow all claims to be considered. We have nothing to say as to their validity, only to provide that if parties had claims they can enforce them legally.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They are not cut out by that.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—It seems monstrous that this House should pass such legislation as to cut them out. The chairman of the committee told me he was in accord with what I said, that he understood the effect of this bill was to allow those claims, but he thought the amendment proposed by Mr. Arnoldi was quite different from what it turned out to be.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And the result will be perhaps to kill the bill just because some hon. gentleman was not present.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I will agree that the bill go back to the committee. There is no such intention as the hon. gentleman from Brandon suggests. The intention is to place everybody in the position he occupies in this matter according to the decree of the Lords of the Privy Council. That decree is that these creditors shall not have any right to come in and claim any portion of proceeds of bonds but their rights against Charlebois or whoever may be the owners of the stock are fully protected. I think that I have such a right. The bill is framed with a view of doing substantial justice to everybody, and I am perfectly willing that it should go back to committee for consideration.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no objection to its going back to the committee, but without instructions.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Simply for further consideration.

The amendment was agreed to.

CANADA EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called,

Second reading Bill (94) "An Act to authorize the Canada Eastern Railway Company to convey its railway to the Alexander Gibson Railway and Manufacturing Company."—(Mr. Power.)

Hon. Mr. POWER said: I understand that there is some opposition to this bill or some desire to discuss it at the second reading. Two hon. gentlemen have spoken about it, and I therefore move that the order of the day be discharged and that the bill be read the second time to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I venture to suggest that the bill receive the second reading to-day and be sent to the Railway Committee to-morrow. Would not the hon. gentleman consent to that?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have been requested by hon. gentlemen to postpone the second reading.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (101) "An Act respecting the Harbour of the City of St. John in the Province of New Brunswick."—(Mr. Dever.)

INCOMPLETE AND DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the adjournment, I desire to call the attention of the Secretary of State to a return which he brought down in answer to a motion I made last year. There are no returns from the Privy Council, or the Departments of the Secretary of State, Finance, Agriculture, Inland Revenue, Militia, Public Works, and Railways and Canals. Of course there may have been no dismissals and no commissions in some of the departments, and if that is the case it is all right. I also call attention to the fact that the special return for which I moved in reference to the reduction of the Belleville post office from a city to a town office has not been brought down.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will call the attention of the Postmaster General to that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And as to the others?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I sent a messenger over with a strong letter to the Minister of Railways and Canals, asking for the returns. I presume there were none.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—May I ask the hon. Secretary of State whether he is prepared to bring down the return I asked for with regard to the steamer "Petrel" and steam communication with Prince Edward Island which I moved for, and also a return with regard to the cold storage facilities for Charlottetown?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will make inquiry.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

PEARSON DIVORCE BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER, from the Standing Committee on Divorce, reported Bill (D) "An Act for the relief of James Pearson." He said: It is usual to allow a certain time to elapse before the report is considered, but this is a case in which the evidence is very clear, and I think there is no objection to the report. Therefore, I move that the report be now adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

TORONTO AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported bill (77) "An Act to incorporate the Toronto and Hudson Bay Railway Company," with amendments.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I move that the amendments be concurred in. I might mention that the amendments are not material, but make the bill much plainer than as it was when passed by the committee, by protecting the interests of those who have the former charters, and it is agreed to by all parties interested.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In moving that the bill be read the third time to-morrow, I desire to give notice that at the third reading of this bill I will move that the words "James Bay Railway Company" be inserted after the word "company" in the 19th line of the 10th section of the said bill. It was omitted in the printing of the bill, accidentally, I am informed. The 10th clause gives power to this company to enter into an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Ottawa, Arnprior & Parry Sound Railway Company, and the Nipissing & James Bay Railway Company. The James Bay Railway Company have also a charter, and their rights are reserved by this bill, and the desire is that this company shall have the right to amalgamate with, or enter into any arrangement for the construction, with any one or the whole of these companies.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRIES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to:

Direct the attention of the government to the following words uttered on the 7th May, 1896, by the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, at La Salle Jacques Cartier, in the city of Quebec, and reproduced the next day in L'Electeur, of 8th May, 1896:—

Do not misunderstand me as to my intentions, I repeat here, that I wish the minority in Manitoba to obtain entire justice. It is a principle written in letters of gold in the programme of my party that the rights of the minority must be respected.... .

If the people of Canada bring me into power, as I have a conviction they will, I will settle this question to the satisfaction of all parties interested. I shall have with me in my government Sir Oliver Mowat, who has always been in Ontario, at the peril of his own popularity, the champion of the Catholic minority and of separate schools. I will put him at the head of a commission where all the interests at stake shall be represented, and I affirm to you that I will succeed in satisfying those who are suffering at this moment. Is not Sir Oliver Mowat's name alone a guarantee of the success of this plan?

..nd then, finally, if conciliation does not succeed, I shall have to exercise that constitutional recourse which the law furnishes, a recourse which I shall exercise completely and entirely.

And inquired:

1. If it is still a principle, written in letters of gold, in the programme of the Liberal party that the rights of the minority must be respected?

2. Whether the government, of which the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier is the head, has settled the school question to the satisfaction of all parties interested, and more particularly to the satisfaction of those who were suffering on the 7th May, 1896?

3. Whether, conformably to the solemn engagement which he had undertaken, the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier has placed Sir Oliver Mowat at the head of a special commission, and whether this commission has succeeded in making a settlement which gives entire justice to the Catholic minority of Manitoba ?

4. In case nothing of this sort has been done, what are the intentions of the government for the future ?

5. Does the government intend to exercise that constitutional recourse which the law furnishes and which the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier promised to exercise completely and entirely ?

6. If it is admitted that it is now two years since the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier made such promises, is it the intention of the government to put them into execution soon, and when will they be fulfilled ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I beg to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that this series of questions is wholly out of order, and I ask your ruling upon that. My hon. friend begins them with a statement of facts which is controverted and which is controvertible, and the whole series of propositions which follow are based on this controvertible introduction.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Who controverts them ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And so my hon. friend is wholly out of order. I take it to be a well settled rule of this House that matter which is controvertible cannot be introduced into a question or made the basis of a question to be put to any hon. gentleman in this House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I beg to speak on the point of order. The hon. minister says that the beginning of this series of questions is a controverted fact. Where is the controverted fact ? Is it the speech of the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier which is controverted ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I beg to say to my hon. friend I do not know that such a speech was ever made ; I do not know if a speech made by the premier upon this subject was accurately reported, and my hon. friend has assumed these things. My hon. friend is introducing a matter that is capable of being controverted, and therefore it is improper to be embraced in a question put in this House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will observe to the hon. gentleman that the fact to which he alludes has never been controverted. The words were taken out of the organ of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in Quebec, the organ of the Liberal party. This was a promise made on the public hustings ; it went all over the country. The prime minister won his election with that promise. It has never before been questioned, and it is a singular thing that it should be controverted to-day and I do not know what authority the hon. gentleman has to deny it. If he is authorized to deny it I am willing to withdraw the question

Hon. Mr. ALMON—If it is wrong to bring up a matter that is referred to in the newspapers and which may be controvertible, how do we read in this morning's paper that last evening Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Charles Tupper discussed a report which appeared in the Globe and Halifax Chronicle of a speech made by Sir Charles Tupper ? If it is right in the House of Commons to discuss such matters, I do not see why the hon. gentleman should come here and say that it is out of order to do so in this House. I think we have more liberty here than they have in the Commons, and instead of devoting the talents, which I acknowledge he has, to curtailing the power of this Senate, I think he should employ them rather in endeavouring to increase the powers and privileges of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before a ruling is made by his honour, the Speaker, on this question, I should like very much if we were allowed to fully understand the objection taken by the hon. Minister of Justice. If every question is to be ruled as out of order which may be submitted to the government by reason of the fact of alleged facts in the question being controvertible, then it would simply mean that almost every question so submitted would give rise to the objection made by the Minister of Justice that the statement is controverted, and therefore the question should not appear on the order paper. The practice laid down does not go, so far as I can ascertain, to the extent indicated by the hon. Mi ister of Justice. You cannot put a hypothetical question and ask the government to answer it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You cannot put a narrative of fact.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You cannot put a matter of opinion in a question ; that would be objectionable, but you can state a matter of fact, and the hon. gentleman from Stadacona has placed on the order paper a matter which he alleges to be a fact. If the government take the position that it is not a fact, they can simply deny it, and that dispenses with the necessity of answering it. If it is not a fact, it can have no existence.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman is not discussing the point of order; he is discussing the policy which should be pursued in putting questions. I do not admit the rule that the hon gentleman has stated, and it is not necessary to argue it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am adhering as closely as I can to the question of order submitted. The question of order submitted, as I understand, to the House is that a question susceptible to the objection made by the Minister of Justice, that it is controverted, is entirely out of order and cannot be submitted. Now, what I do say is that my hon. friend will find no authority going so far as to sustain his contention that because a statement of fact in a question is controverted, that it is therefore out of order. Before a ruling is made upon so important a point, a ruling which if it should be adverse to the contention of the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, the House should fully appreciate the extent to which such a ruling would prevent questions hereafter being submitted to the government I therefore submit, with due deference to the opinions of the House, that only questions embodying an opinion or hypothesis are out of order. Beyond that the government should answer the questions if they are questions of fact, if they are not questions of fact a simple denial will fully comply with all the requirements.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If I understand the objection taken to this inquiry of the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, it is of a technical character. I think he is quite right in saying that in placing an inquiry on the notice paper, you must not state a fact and ask a question in connection with it. This question might have been so worded as to obviate the point which has been raised by the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But it does not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not say it did. The hon. gentleman from Stadacona puts the question and states the fact. As I understand the rules of parliament, in asking a question you cannot state a fact as a fact, but all questions are controvertible, and the words controvertible, as applied to any question, is not applicable in this case. The hon. gentleman puts his question in this way:

That he will direct the attention of the government to the following words uttered on the 7th of May, &c.

That is a statement of fact that the words were uttered. He might have put it this way: "That he will direct the attention of the House to the following words said to have been uttered." That would have been strictly within the rules of parliament, and the question predicated upon the preamble, as I have indicated to the hon. gentleman, could have been changed in such a manner as to bring them strictly within the rules of parliament, and at the same time place the minister in a position to either deny that such utterances were ever made, or that he had no knowledge of their being uttered, and consequently could give no answer. Then the question as to whether certain principles laid down in the speech supposed to have been made by the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier would have been quite pertinent. It would be for the government to say whether they had any policy on that question, or whether they held any such principles. That, I understand, is the order of putting questions on the notice paper, and that interpretation will be borne out by Bourinot, Todd and other parliamentary writers on this subject. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman from Stadacona that he drop this notice at the present moment, re-word it, and place it on the order paper for to morrow or next day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have no objection at all, if the House will allow me, to withdraw the question, I will endeavour to frame it so as to meet all the requirements of the hon. Minister of Justice.

The motion was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

Whether, since the commencement of the present session, the government, or any one of the members of the present administration, has received from the government of Manitoba, or from the Catholic minority of that province, or from the Episcopate or any member thereof, any communication whatsoever, in the form of a demand, of a claim, of a protest, or otherwise, on the subject of the Manitoba schoo question?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say, in reply to the question put by my hon. friend, that I am not aware that any member of the government has received from the government of Manitoba, or from the Catholic minority of that province, or from the Episcopate, or any member thereof, any communication whatsoever in the form of a demand, of a claim, of a protest, or otherwise, on the subject of the Manitoba school question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Might I ask the hon. minister if he could answer in any other way than that he is not aware? Could he say if the government has or has not received, or that any member of the government has or has not received the communication alluded to in my question? I am not asking if the hon. minister is aware of such a communication. I am asking if the government has received such a communication?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have no knowledge of the government or any member of the government having received anything of the sort.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—That is not an answer.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister should have inquired. I know they have received something.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then the hon. gentleman does not want the information if he knows.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the Minister of Justice is taking an extraordinary position. I do not know the practice of his government. I know the practice of former governments when questions of that kind were put. The facts are ascertained from the different departments, or from the departmental heads who have been holding negotiations upon questions of this kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not aware that any department has.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is the hon. gentleman's duty to know. He might have asked me that question and I could have said, "I have no knowledge," because I am not in a position to inquire, but we have here a gentleman holding the most important portfolio in the Dominion government. He is here as the leader, not only of the party to which he belongs, but also of the government in this House. A question of great importance is placed on the notice paper, and the hon. gentleman rises and says: "I have no knowledge that such communication has been received." I say plainly and distinctly that that question having been put on the paper, his duty was to have obtained from his colleagues a knowledge of whether such a transaction had taken place.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And if it were not unparliamentary, I would say it is an exceedingly evasive answer, and it is begging the question in a matter of such grave importance that he, at least, should not resort to it. The government—and he is one of the government—should know when this question is to be put, and when he comes to the House he should be able to answer it, yea or nay, or in such other manner as to inform the public whether any negotiations have taken place or not, and not merely to state, "I have no knowledge." A minister might, in all matters he did not wish to answer, take particular pains not to find out in order that he could come to parliament and say: "I have no knowledge that such an act has been committed, or that such communications have taken place," and thereby evade directly the giving of the knowledge which every member of parliament has a right to demand of any government, and at all times.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I notice the cheers of my hon. friends and I suppose they approve of the doctrine laid down by the leader of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend says certainly, but I say I do not agree. I say that I have answered the question of my hon. friend that I do not know.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—And do not care.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And I do not believe that the government have any information upon the subject. My hon. friend knows right well—for he has been years in a government—that a minister may have a private discussion with a party, an unofficial discussion, a discussion that he never communicates to his colleagues, that his colleagues have no right to inquire about unless there is some action which involves them in some responsibility. I say that if my hon. friend had come here and said that the government had done something, that certain mischiefs had flown from it, that he deprecated it—anything that would make myself or my hon. friend beside me responsible for such an act, why then it would be brought to our notice in that way and the responsibility would be fastened on us if we did not withdraw from the government or disapprove of the act or have the act repudiated. But my hon. friend the leader of the opposition knows right well that a minister may have a discussion on a hundred topics with the local prime minister. I do not know that any one has, nor is it my business to know.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Unless he was acting on behalf of the government or taking some step that was to bind the government, but if he chooses unofficially to have a discussion, if he chooses unofficially to undertake to arrange matters in a way that he thinks will prove satisfactory, and action is taken on that by other parties, that is a matter of which we have no cognizance and no right to have any cognizance. Let me suppose for an instant—and I am supposing what I do not know at all has taken place—that some minister had met Mr. Greenway and made a suggestion to him, and Mr. Greenway had assumed the responsibility in his own province of acting on it. That is the act of Mr. Greenway and he is not responsible for it, and it is not the act of this government or any member of it which is called on to explain or defend it in this House or in the House of Commons. Lord Palmerston, on one occasion, said that he had settled more questions of controversy between England and foreign countries at his dinner table than by dispatches, but the dispatches are brought down to parliament and form the subject of controversy, while the discussion which Lord Palmerston had at his dinner table were never made the subject of discussion in parliament nor was there a question put to any one of his colleagues that he should explain in the House what Lord Palmerston had said at his dinner table. With all respect to this House, I deny the right of the hon. gentleman or any other member of this House to know what a member had said privately or unofficially.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—That is not asked for.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not a matter for consideration here or in the other House. When the act of a minister becomes a public act, an act for which that minister and his colleagues are responsible to parliament, then it is time enough for the hon. gentlemen to call on me or my colleagues to explain what a minister did, or with whom he had held a conversation. Does my hon. friend say that if the prime minister, or some other member of the government, happened to meet Mr. Greenway or any colleague of his government, or the Archbishop, and said good-day to him, that I must come down to the House and report that to the hon. gentleman? I deny such proposition, altogether. My hon. friend has put his question from day to day. We have had patience with him. We have borne with what is intended to be a species of badgering carried on in this House.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But I say I shall take my own course in regard to questions of this kind in the future, and decline to answer every question which I, as a minister of the Crown, responsible for the conduct of the administration, feel has no relevancy to the duties of the administration.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I do not think there has been any necessity whatever for the hon. leader of the House to work himself up into a white heat.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to talk about white heat. There has been no white heat.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—If the expression is unparliamentary, I will withdraw the word "white" and say that he has worked himself up into a heat over this question. The hon. leader of the government is under a misapprehension as to the way the question was put. He has not been asked what his opinion was about these matters, or what he knows about these matters, but he was asked what the government has done with regard to certain things. The question is a very simple one:

Whether, since the commencement of the present session, the government, or any one of the members of the present administration, has received from the government of Manitoba, or from the Catholic minority of that province, or from the Episcopate or any member thereof, any communication whatsoever, in the form of a demand, of a claim, of a protest, or otherwise, on the subject of the Manitoba school question?

He is not asked his opinion. He is here as the leader of the House and representative of the government, and it was certainly his duty to lay this question before his colleagues and be in a position to give us an answer, yes or no. It seems to me that the term applied to the answer given by the minister, as being an evasion, is not too strong a term to apply to it, and when my hon. friend taxed my colleague for putting this question and speaking of matters which had taken place at private dinner tables, of course nobody is asking what is taking place at any dinner table or private conversation, but this is a public matter which has been spread broadcast over the country, and if any communication or demand has been made of the government, it is the duty of the leader of the House to inform us on it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to answer the statement made by the hon. minister that I have put this question from day to day. I ask the hon. gentleman what warrant he has to make such a statement as that? This is the first time I have put this question on the paper, and it is the first time I have brought this matter before the House, and the hon. minister is losing his time entirely if he thinks he will prevent me from doing my duty. I will go on with my question until it is answered, and if I cannot get an answer from the hon. minister, I will try to find out another way to get it, but I will have it, and the hon. minister may be sure that he will not silence me by threatening or otherwise. What I asked was a pertinent question; the hon. minister is unable to answer it. He speaks of Lord Palmerston's methods respecting dinners and dinner tables. What does he mean? Must I conclude that if he invited me to his table I might have an answer? Is that the conclusion I must accept? He cannot answer the House here, but if he invited me to his table he might give an answer. That is the precedent he brings forward. I tell the hon. gentleman that I must get a reply to this question, yes or no, but he must give an answer. If he is ignorant, let him go to the ministerial school, let him learn from his colleagues what happened. Something has happened. I know that a document has been sent to the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Why then ask it?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Because I want to know what the government are doing in the matter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman might give his information to the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If something has happened why does not the minister say yes or no? If such a communication as the one asked for has not been given why did not the minister say no? It is only to matters that happened since the beginning of the session that the question relates. I am entitled to have a reply. Does the minister say no?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I decline to give my hon. friend any further answer than I have already given him.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman did not give any; he said he was ignorant, that he knew nothing at all about it.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Here is a plain question. Has the government received any communication? Does the government answer, yes or no? We are entitled to that answer.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It strikes me that this thing has gone far enough. The Senate of Canada, in my humble opinion, ought to be more dignified than to allow such a thing to go on. Here is an hon. gentleman who, apparently, does not know when he gets a direct answer, and he repeats his question and asks the hon. leader of the House to say yes or no. The hon. leader of the House distinctly told him that, as a member of the government, he knew nothing about it.

Several Hon. GENTLEMEN—No, no.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—As a member of the government he knew nothing about it, but he said as an individual—he said the word individual—in his private capacity he might have had a conversation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We did not ask that.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Well, notwithstanding all this, he persists and wants the hon. leader of the House to commit himself and say yes or no. How can the hon. gentleman say yes or no when he has said distinctly that, as a member of the government, he knows nothing about it? Surely, under these circumstances, this House should not allow this matter to go any further. It is a disgrace to the Senate to permit scenes of this kind, because they know a large majority of this House is against the present government, and it cannot be considered anything but enmity to a few members. It is nothing less than a disgrace that this House should allow things to proceed in this brutal manner from day to day, and permit these scenes to be prolonged by men who have no shame, who have no sense of religion, men who are willing to prostitute religion; because if their religion is so low as it is represented by some hon. gentlemen, then God help the religion and the country that is governed by such religion. The government have declared positively in this House that they knew nothing of this matter. If the hon. gentlemen want to find it out let them consult the several members of the government and possibly in their conversation they may arrive at a proper knowledge of it. But here we have two members of the government hour after hour and day after day declaring that they knew nothing about this still this hon. gentleman persists in his questions and declares that he will continue to persist until he gets a reply yes or no. I say this thing has gone so far that I do not see how any hon. gentleman who claims to be a gentleman, can sit here any longer and allow it to continue.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—We do not want any misunderstanding. A question has been asked and the hon. Minister of Justice has declined to answer that question. He professes to speak only for himself and not for the government. But, on the other hand, here is an hon. gentleman who says that the government has not received any communication. Do the government take the position stated by the hon. gentleman from St. John? Do the government say plainly no, to the question, or do they decline simply to answer the question?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If my honourable friend thinks there is any correspondence or information in possession of the government on this subject, he can put a notice upon the paper.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I beg to remind the hon. gentleman that over a month ago I made a motion for returns which was adopted, and am still waiting for the returns. I asked several times of the hon. gentleman when I should expect those returns to be brought down, and I have yet to wait for them. I am sorry that there has been such delay, and I will again take this opportunity to ask the hon. gentleman to bring them down as soon as possible.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I just desire one word to add to what I have already said, and that is to express my personal regret at the position taken by the hon. leader of the government in this House. There is no one in the Senate who would sustain him sooner than I, if questions were asked as to individual communications. But that is not the question that is put here. If we are to accept the dogmatic manner which has been assumed by the hon. minister to-day, that he will not answer questions which are put upon the paper unless he thinks proper to do so, the sooner we know it the better. There is nothing in this question which justifies the position that has been taken by the hon. gentleman. It is a plain, straight-forward question upon a very important public matter, and I hold it is not only as a matter of courtesy but his absolute duty, unless he is prepared to say that it is not in the interests of the public that the information should be given, to say whether correspondence has taken place or not. There is no question asked as to the action of any individual member of the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not quite so fast. Please wait till I get through. The question implies, and can receive no other interpretation, that it relates to the action of the government, not of an individual as an individual. It says this: "since the commencement of the present session has the government or any one of the members of the present administration," —that implies the action of a member of the present administration, acting under the authority of the government and by the instructions received from the cabinet, and can receive no other construction.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say as to that, no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why did you not say so in the first place.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The question is very much broader than that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No; but let me say parenthetically that I put a question once or twice almost analogous to this, as to what had taken place between the government and the authorities in Manitoba upon this question, the late leader of the government gave me a respectful answer; the hon. Secretary of State, upon one or two occasions, said that no such communications had taken place, or that certain communications had taken place, but that he was not in a position to give an answer, as it would not be in the public interest while negotiations were going on. I could not expect any more. Had the same answer been given to-day, no objection would have been taken; but the hon. gentleman assumed to say to this House whether they shall have any information that they require upon great and grave public questions Now, it simply ask this: whether there has been any communication between the Catholic minority of the province of Manitoba or with the Episcopate, any communication whatsoever, in the form of a demand of a claim, of a protest on the subject of the Manitoba school question. In my long parliamentary experience, of over thirty years, I must say I never read a plainer, more distinct, or more direct question put to any government, and we find the hon. leader of the government in this House, in a style of absolutism saying, "I will not answer that question. I do not know anything about it myself, and, consequently, it is not for me to inquire of my colleagues or the government whether this communication has taken place. I will not answer; that is the position in which I am placed." It is for hon. gentlemen to say whether they are prepared to submit to that kind of treatment from any hon. minister of the government in the future. I cannot say that I would blame my hon. friend if he asks that question every day until he gets an answer, which I think should be given by the hon. gentleman. It is the first time in my parliamentary experience that ever I saw a minister in this House or in any House assume such a dictatorial stand.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to make the following inquiry:

The Honourable the Secretary of State having asserted that the present government had had a conference with representatives of the government of Manitoba, and that they had come to an agreement, was that agreement accepted by the Catholic minority of Manitoba, and was that same minority a party to the said agreement?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I explained very fully that the conference was before the legislation that took place in Manitoba, under which the agreement that was made was approved of by an Act of that legislature. I am unable to answer the hon. gentlemans, question whether it has been accepted by the Catholic minority of Manitoba. As far as I can gather from the public press and unofficial sources, a large number of Catholic schools are being carried on as public schools —somewhere about eighty of them.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am advised that there are a very considerable number of Catholic schools now being carried on as public schools.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Can I have an answer to the latter part of my inquiry?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no official knowledge, but so far as I can gather from unofficial sources, a considerable number, certainly over fifty or sixty of the Catholic schools, are being carried on under the Public School Act.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am asking a reply to the latter part of my question: Was the said minority a party to said agreement. The conference was between the Federal Government and the government of Manitoba. Surely the Federal government ought to know if the minority were a party to the convention ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it is exceedingly unfair that a minister should be catechised in this way day after day. The question has been answered over and over again. I am anxious to give the hon. gentleman as full information as possible. I am not reticent on these questions ; perhaps I have at times said more that I should. The hon. gentleman knows there was a conference over a year ago with the members of the Manitoba government, and that the understanding then arrived at was ratified by an Act. All the world is familiar with that Act. I do not know whether the Catholic minority have accepted it. I cannot tell. As I said before, a considerable number of schools have come under the law. That is the only answer I can give.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no use wandering about.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot give any better reply.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman could answer if he would. What I asked is this : the hon. Secretary of State asserted that a conference took place.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—With the members of the Manitoba government.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The present government conferred with representatives of the Manitoba government. They came to an agreement. I think I have a right to ask the hon. member if the Catholic minority was present at that conference—if they were a party to the agreement. The hon. minister does not know, I suppose. He had a conference with the Manitoba people, and he cannot tell if the Catholic minority were represented.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Federal government were acting on behalf of the Catholic minority and endeavouring to get as large concessions as possible from the Manitoba government. Everybody knows that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman must be exceedingly ignorant if he does not. The object of the conference was to obtain concessions. We obtained as full concessions as we could secure in the interests of the minority. We acted for the minority. Whether they are satisfied or not I am unable to say. All I can say is that a very considerable number of the minority have accepted the settlement. I know that by public announcement from unofficial sources.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman contend that the government was acting in the name of the minority and with its authorization ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman put his question and got his answer. He has made half a dozen speeches since he put his question and got his answer. We have something else to do.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The minister infers from the fact that he has seen in the papers that a number of schools are now conducted under the public school system that the minority have accepted the settlement. I may say that none of those schools have accepted the settlement to which he refers, but certain conditions outside of that settlement have been made to such a number of schools by the local government, and those schools of the minority, while not accepting the agreement, while not accepting even as a finality the advantages given to those schools, yet in the state of poverty in which they are, they are trying to take advantage of those concessions made outside of that agreement; but the agreement is not accepted by the minority at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no observations to make on this, except that I hope the government will bring down the papers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That return was moved for in the other House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not aware that these papers have been called for.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This may be fuller. I was going to suggest that if any of the papers brought down have been printed, it would not be necessary to bring down that part of it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will the hon. gentleman make inquiries to-morrow?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

The motion was allowed to stand.

Bill (L) "An Act respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company."—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

RECORDS OF RULINGS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to direct the attention of the House to the fact that the minutes of last Monday do not report the decision given by his honour the Speaker on a question debated in this House on that day. A point of order was raised and debated, and the ruling of the chair was given, and there is no record of it in our Minutes. In looking up the practice in the past, I see that on the 13th June, 1887, the order of the day being read, a question of order was raised, and his honour the Speaker ruled. The same day, a motion was made that a certain bill be not now read the third time, but that it be further amended. A question of order being raised, his honour the Speaker ruled that the said motion in amendment was out of order under the seventeenth rule of this House. The next day, the 14th June, Hon. Mr. Vidal moved, seconded by

Hon. Mr. Scott, that the bill respecting Chinese immigration be now read the second time. A question of order was raised, and the Speaker decided that the bill was out of order as interfering with the public revenue. A few days later, on the 22nd June, a petition was presented, and a question of order being raised, namely: that the petition did not bear the signature of the man who presented it, the Speaker ruled that the point was not well taken, as such practice had not prevailed before in this House. I take later volumes, and I see that in every instance when a ruling of the chair was given, that ruling was inserted in the Minutes of our House. I should like that the decision arrived at by the Speaker on Monday last should be inserted in our Minutes. I think it is according to the practice and precedent, and I hope his honour the Speaker will give the proper instructions, so that the course followed in the past will be followed in this instance.

The SPEAKER—I am of opinion that the cases cited by the hon. member have no analogy whatever to the case on which I ruled the other day. All the cases which he has just cited were necessarily entered in the Minutes. It was necessary for the clerk to mention in the Minutes for what reason the petition or the bill had not been proceeded with; but in the case where a point of order is raised in the course of a discussion on a public question, or on any inquiry or question put to a minister of the Crown, I have no knowledge of any instance in which the ruling of the Speaker is entered in the minutes. The ruling of the Speaker appears in the debates because it is necessary always that the discussions be reported at length. But I do not consider now that any decision given by the Speaker on such rulings should be entered in the Minutes and the reasons given for it. I believe the reporting of the ruling in the debates is all that is required. At all events I am entirely at the hands of the House. If the House decides that ruling on all questions in the House should be entered in the Minutes of course it will be done.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then I am to understand that nothing will be done?

The SPEAKER—I believe it should not be done.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I shall take means to have it done.

The SPEAKER—If the Senate does not endorse my ruling on that question, it is open to any hon. gentleman to take the ordinary course to have my decision overruled, and then the decision of the Senate will be carried out.

NAKUSP AND SLOCAN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES moved the third reading of Bill (92) "An Act respecting the Nakusp and Slocan Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I beg to move that this bill be not now read the third time but that it be read a third time this day three months. As hon. gentlemen know perfectly well the position I have always taken in public debates and upon public questions is decidedly opposed to anything that pertains to monopoly, and with that in view, I made a motion against what I conceived to be a monopoly yesterday in regard to the Trade Mark and Design Act, and I convinced this honourable House at the same time that it was a class of legislation that it was not wise to enact. It is rather an invidious position for me to assume in rising to discuss the question of the Canadian Pacific Railway, more especially as Judge Clark, who is responsible for the Canadian Pacific Railway legislation comes from the same town as myself and has been a friend from my youth up to the present, and to a certain extent, as far as he is concerned, I feel that in rising to oppose questions that are brought before this parliament through his instrumentality on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I am placed in an invidious position to a certain extent. There is also the idea in some people's minds that I have something against the Canadian Pacific Railway—that I am always picking at and criticising the company. It is not from any sense of feeling against the Canadian Pacific Railway that I am animated—a railroad which I, in conjunction with the rest of the country, feel proud of, but at the same time having created a railroad 6,500 miles in length, which has an earning power from the people of Canada of $24,300,000 last year, and increasing this year, I think it is a fair subject for criticism when it comes before parliament asking for additional legislation, which happens nearly every year. It is only from a sense of public duty that I take the position as critic in regard to this powerful corporation, which is so powerful that it is a common utterance in the western country that they control whatever government is in power in Canada, and that it is useless to try to offer opposition. I think that is a mistaken idea. I think there is a power over the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other corporation, and that is the parliament of Canada, which represents the people of Canada, and it is a great pity that by any Act, this parliament should allow it to be supposed by the people of Canada that this condition does exist where this parliament is concerned. We are living in a free country, and the freest constitution in the world is the British constitution upon which our parliament is modelled, and it is superior to every power that exists in Canada where the legislation of the country is concerned. This question has been before the committee. It is a question as between this railway, 6,500 miles in length, and a railroad thirty-two miles in length in the province of British Columbia —the only independent line, I think, in that region of British Columbia which the Canadian Pacific Railway passes through. The people of the towns along this railway have come down and petitioned parliament that this legislation should not be put upon the statute-book. Kaslo is on the Kootenay Lake and has navigable waters which lead into the United States. The other end of the 32 miles has connection with Sandon, and the road was built in the interest of the mining developments which have taken place by the friends and associates of the people in these towns, and I presume this railroad was in there pari passu with the interests the Canadian Pacific Railway had acquired. It is in the neighbourhood of the Crow's Nest Pass—a line which has been projected by the Canadian Pacific Railway assisted by the Dominion government bonus of $4,000,000 and by the British Columbia legislature with a land grant of 20,000 acres per mile within the province of British Columbia between Nelson and the boundary of the province. The bill is designed now to give power to the Canadian Pacific Railway to build a branch from Nakusp, on the Arrow Lake, for 10 miles parallel to this railway of 32 miles. As you all know, in the province of British Columbia the railroads have to run in narrow valleys and the paralleling of this line is within a few feet of the small branch of 32 miles. It would only be one or two hundred feet away from the other line, and the motive given by the Canadian Pacific Railway for the construction of this line is to give competition to the mines that are served now by the short line of 32 miles. If I thought that that was the object, or that it was going to give competition to the people of those mines in that neighbourhood, to the people who live in the towns along this short line, it would be contrary to the principles I advocated in opposing monopoly of any kind, for me to oppose their bill. I want competition, but from my knowledge of that country, so far as it has been presented to me, it is not for the purpose of competition that this short branch of 10 miles is projected paralleling this road into the neighbourhood of the mines, for the development of which the 32 miles were built, but it is to kill the competition that they already have, and will have when the Crow's Nest Pass is completed to that point, by the railroads and the water navigation which they designed first of all to utilize, water which the Crow's Nest line crosses a few miles south of it. That is to say that the people who live along that line of railway, the people who live in those towns and the mines that are developed by that short line of railway, have already access to railway accommodation by the water route. They have navigation to take their ores down there and bring their stuff by the railroads in the south. They already have that and it was built in order to develop the mines. Now, we are projecting the Crow's Nest Pass line into that same neighbourhood, and the moment the Crow's Nest line is constructed the Canadian Pacific Railway says: "This little branch of thirty-two miles is going to have competition between us and the railways to the south. Now, that is not in our interest. That is not the lines we work upon. We work upon business principles; and whenever anything stands in the way of effecting our objects or our business it must go, so far as we are able to come to this parliament and get the necessary legislation to abolish that." If the Canadian Pacific Railway is built by the Crow's NestPass, this railroad and the people who live along its line will have the choice of shipping by the Canadian Pacific Railway or they will have the competition of this road to send their ores further south, and also to bring in their supplies from the south. We who live in the interior of that great country are quite aware what it is to have competition.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We may like to have a choice of two routes by which we can ship our produce. At present we have only one route. Competition is the life of any trade, and the making of any country, and it is also the making of any man. It will develop his abilities and his qualities, and competition will develop the qualities of Canada, but the very moment that you allow monopoly to rule the country you produce stagnation. The directing minds are not going to be those who are producing the wealth of Canada, those who are labouring in the country and producing the exports which go out every year; it is not those who will control the country, but the heads of these monopolies.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—How will two lines give you a monopoly.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The object of this legislation is to build ten miles paralleling this short line of thirty-two miles to the mines for which the thirty-two miles were built. That divides the traffic with that railway company, and it will bring that company down on its knees and compel it to sell to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Then the people who live on that thirty-two miles will have no competition—it will be monopoly.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—They have no competition now.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They have competition between the Crow's Nest Pass and the water communication which leads to the south. They can say to the Canadian Pacific Railway: "What will you carry our ores for? What will you bring in the produce for?" I do not want those people to be placed in any worse position. I do not want the Canadian Pacific Railway to say to them: "You cannot run this railroad. We are going to compete with you and are going to control this district in which this railroad is, so that there will be no competition coming from the south with the Canadian Pacific Railway." That is the position that these people who have come down with their petition have presented us in the Railway Committee. We heard what they had to say about this matter. We listened to them for two hours. They have come down here all the way from that neighbourhood simply for the purpose of protecting their interests. There has been no application from the people in that district who are working the mines, who are living along the line of that railway asking for this competition, or for the railway that is now asked for by the Canadian Pacific Railway that I know of, or that I think was put before the committee. This railroad is applied for by the Canadian Pacific Railway—a railroad which has already 6,500 miles of its own. The people who came down brought affidavits to say they were quite satisfied with the position they were in, because they will be in a favourable position when the Crow's Nest Pass Railway is built. They will be able to develop their industry by the competition between the two roads which they will have. I feel quite confident that I shall not appeal to this Senate in vain under the circumstances. I am quite aware that the Canadian Pacific Railway has a great deal of sympathy from the members of this House. I am well aware that the Canadian Pacific Railway can explain their point of view to members of this Senate privately. It would not do for me to allow the other side to fail to present it from a public standpoint, and for that reason I have moved this resolution. I do not think it is in the interests of the country that this bill should be put upon the statute-book. I do not think it is the interest of this parliament that we should ignore the rights of the public or the interests of the people who come down to parliament and ask for protection. I do not think it is right for us to assume that we are going to place this parliament under the control of a very large power—a power that controls the expenditure of 24 millions which they earned last year, with all the strength that its millions will give it. It is not a wise course for us to take to say that we will ignore the position of private people who come down and ask us for sympathy and protection, and have it said to them, "we are going to bind you down, and force you into such a position that you will be tributary only to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that the Canadian Pacific Railway when they have control of this road will shut you off from any competition to the south of the line." That is the position it is in at the present moment. I stand here to advocate the cause of these people who are not strong; who are not powerful. The argument is used that the bonds that built this Slocan Railway were negotiated in the city of New York. That argument was used to prejudice the minds of people, but what difference does it make whether those bonds are floated in New York or London or Montreal? We all know that the Canadian Pacific Railway bonds are floated wherever capital is to be raised. We all know there are people in New York who hold bonds of the Canadian Pacific Railway and of many of our railroads In the same way they are held in London and other capitals in Europe. Therefore, that is not an argument that should be used to prejudice the minds of the people. I am quite aware that there is a prejudice in the minds of some that no competition from the south should be allowed, that the Canadian Pacific Railway is to have a monopoly and be protected from any competition by the Northern Pacific Railway to the south of our line. That is a principle which I think is not just to the people in the interior, who are working where competition is the life and soul of their industry. We have to pay an enormous mileage for the carriage of our produce, and if we have to pay mileage for 1,600 or 2,000 miles——

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—This is only ten miles.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, but the object of this ten miles is what I have stated Hon. gentlemen will remember that the Heintz Railway was purchased by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It was a question for a while whether it was going to remain an independent road or not, but it was purchased by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company afterwards. It got some land and the smelter that belonged to Heintz. This railway is in the neighbourhood and forms a connection with this road that I am speaking of. If these people do not want to sell it, if they do not want to lose the competition they are getting at the present moment, is it right for us to say to them "you have got to sell the Canadian Pacific Railway in the same way as the Heintz Railway did?" Is it a fair position to place them in? Supposing there was a question of selling out on the part of the railway, does not this legislation, giving the Canadian Pacific Railway Company power to build, depreciate the value of their property? Is it fair that we should institute legislation in this parliament in order to depreciate the value of any property of private individuals, especially pioneer settlers who have gone in there to develop the interior of that country for the benefit of themselves and to the trade of the country at large? Is it fair that we, by our legislation, should put them in such a position that they would have to bow down and take whatever the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would give them? I say give them a free hand. If the Canadian Pacific Railway cannot make terms without this legislation, and there should be a petition from those people sent down here saying "we would like to have this legislation put through," that would be another question altogether, but there is no application from the people for this legislation. There are petitions and affidavits from the people against this legislation. You have to take your choice whether you are going to grant the prayer of the people in the interior there, or support the Canadian Pacific Railway, who have more facilities for reaching the ear of this honourable House than the people who are out in the west. I feel I would not be doing my duty if I did not carry to the fullest extent, the principle I maintain, and that is the principle to keep down monopoly as much as you can in the interior of that country. It is very well, sir, for you who live on the Welland Canal to smile and criticise and depreciate the position I am taking. You have all the competition you want; you have your lake competition and railway competition, east and west, and in every way. Those people in the west are locked up. Go up there and become a pioneer settler and you will soon find what side you will take in the matter. The position out in that western country, which we are seeking to develop for the benefit of the trade of Canada, is quite different. I would therefore urge upon this House to do justice in this matter and not ignore the rights of the pioneers who built this line and opened those mines; and now this powerful railway comes in and says, by aid of this legislation, your railroad or your ruin.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I am sure my hon. friend is quite sincere when he says he feels himself impelled by a sense of duty to oppose the third reading of the bill, but it seems to me extremely difficult to find consistency in an hon. gentleman who declares himself to be the champion of competition and opposed to all monopoly, when he opposes the third reading of the bill which is now before the Senate. I am not going to be drawn into a controversy with my hon. friend as to the merits or demerits of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am not going to enter into a discussion as to whether the Canadian Pacific Railway is more indebted to the Dominion government than the Dominion government is indebted to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Every one who is acquainted with the history of this Dominion knows that the Canadian Pacific Railway has done more for the development of the resources of Canada, that it has done more to bring Canada into prominence and to make its capabilities known to the world outside of Canada, than any other enterprise that was ever inaugurated in the Dominion. I am not going to be drawn into any controversy as to the merits of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or as to whether a debt of gratitude is due from it to Canada or from Canada to it. I shall confine myself to a discussion of the merits of the bill now before the Senate. It is a simple bill. The company merely ask by this bill permission to construct ten miles of its railway, further inland. It is not asking for a subsidy nor for assistance. It is merely asking permission to complete the enterprise which it has in hand. This railroad has already been built a portion of the distance, and it is proposed by the bill to give authority to the company to built a line from Three Forks to Whitewater Creek. The facts are that that country is studded with mines. The object of the company is to be permitted to develop the mineral resources of the country. They ask for permission to build a branch of ten miles for the purpose of being able to bring out from the interior the produce of the mines. My hon. friend is opposed to monopoly, and yet he wants to exclude this company from extending its works in order that it may come into competition for the trade of that section of the country. The statement is made that it parallels for a certain portion a completed road, a road already in existence. Is the doctrine to be laid down in this House that no railway can be built which is parallel to a railway in existence? The Railway Act provides not only for paralleling railways, but for expropriating property when it is necessary to carry out an enterprise. It does more than that. It provides for taking power from the Railway Committee to run over another railway on such terms as may be ordered. There are many instances of parallel railways. No man can travel from Toronto to Montreal by the Grand Trunk Railway or Canadian Pacific Railway without observing that for miles they run parallel to each other, running neck and neck. It is necessary, in the construction of this proposed line, to approach the existing railway. I am not disposed to enter into any harsh criticisms as to the object with which this bill is being opposed by those who are interested in the other railway, but it is a railway that does not commend itself with any great force to the consideration of this Senate. It is a railway which was chartered in 1892. The road was opened in 1895, and since that time they have built a mile of railway. I hold in my hand an extract from Poor's Manual of 1897, which is an authority upon the subject, and in that I find the total mileage of the road is $31\frac{80}{100}$ and the gauge is three feet.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Three feet six.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—They give here three feet, but give them the benefit of the extra width, and we will say for the sake of argument that this railway has a three feet six inch gauge. We will give them the benefit of that additional length, but I am giving to the House an extract from Poor's Manual, which is received everywhere as an authority on all railway matters. They have a grant from the British Columbia government of 254,000 acres, of which they have received 198,240 acres; they have three locomotives, two passenger cars, fifteen freight, cattle and box cars, and twenty flat cars, or a total of twenty-two cars, also one snowplough. The statistics are given by which it is shown that the income of the road from all sources is $37,725; the expenses $77,590, leaving a deficit of $39,865.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—For which the Canadian Pacific Railway wants to compete.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—The Canadian Pacific Railway wants simply the privilege of completing the road into this mining district. The hon. gentleman heretofore has spoken in favour of pioneers, and his sympathies are all in favour of the pioneers. It will be a decided advantage to the pioneers of this mining district to have competition. They are now limited to the service of this—I do not like to speak disparagingly of it—of this tramway, which is exceedingly limited in its resources, which is limited in its capabilities; and I think it would be a decided advantage to the pioneers in the country and the miners if they were afforded further facilities, and the authority to build this railway will secure to those pioneers the competition for which my hon. friend seems so anxious upon other occasions, but which he seems to be opposed to on this occasion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have not the same direct interest in this matter that the hon. gentleman from Victoria has, who, I understand, is seconding the resolution moved by the hon. gentleman from Shell River, and I do not know that I should have said anything now if it had not been for the rather remarkable speech made by the hon. chairman of the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours. Now, my hon. friend the chairman of the committee is too old a politician, and too old a lawyer, and too old a business man, to suppose for one moment that if this bill passes and goes into operation there will be any prolonged competition between the Slocan and Kaslo Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway. The object, which is not denied at all, of this bill is to enable the Canadian Pacific Railway to extend their line to the mines on this White-water Creek, and the object of constructing the Kaslo and Slocan Railway was just to accommodate those same mines. The result will be, if this bill passes and receives the assent of His Excellency the Governor General, that the big corporation will be in a position to crush out the little corporation almost immediately. It may be that the service which will be rendered to the people of the district by the big corporation will be as good, or possibly better, than the service which is rendered by the little corporation, but the people who are on the spot, the miners and the people who are living there, ought to know their own business; they do not seem to think so, as far as they have been heard from. They prefer that their own little corporation should be allowed to conduct their business; they do not complain that the rates charged by the small corporation are excessive. They do not complain that the small equipment which the hon. gentleman has referred to, is not sufficient to do their business, and as they are not suffering from monopoly, and are not asking to be relieved from a monopoly, I do not think we need concern ourselves very much about it. We are 3,000 miles away, and we should not profess to know their business better than they do themselves. In this connection I think it deserves the attention of every hon. gentleman in this House, that the gentlemen who represent British Columbia in this House, representing both sides of politics, are opposed to this bill and in favour of allowing the Kaslo and Slocan Company to go on and do their business as they have been doing. I understand the same is the case in the other House, that the representatives of British Columbia in that House are not in favour of this bill. I think hon. gentlemen—it is true in both Houses—that weight should be given to the opinions of the majority of the representatives of any province with respect to a matter which related to that province, and in this House, which is supposed in an especial manner to represent the provinces, the fact that the representatives of the province are unanimous in their opposition to this bill, ought to carry a great deal of weight with the gentlemen who come from other provinces. That is a sound and reasonable principle, and any hon. gentleman who has read—as no doubt the hon. gentleman who has just sat down has read—the debates which took place at the time of confederation will find that one of the great objects of constituting the Senate as it was constituted was to represent provincial interests and the provincial principle. There is this to be borne in mind, that not only will the Canadian Pacific Railway be in a position to kill the other company and prevent its operation in a very little while, but that the only people who will suffer directly are not the owners of the bonds—I understand that the bonds were most of them purchased in the United States, but prominent citizens of British Columbia who put large sums of their own money into the stock of this company; and there are two or three of the most prominent and enterprising men in the province of British Columbia, who, I understand, will be financially ruined if this bill goes into operation. These were the men who had the enterprise and the courage to undertake to build this road at a time when the resources of the district had not been developed and when the Canadian Pacific Railway had not proposed to go in there; and I think for that reason that this House should hesitate about passing this bill. One of the serious effects of our legislating in the direction in which we are asked to legislate now is this: if the parliament of this country lays down the principle that whenever a local railway is built by a comparatively small corporation one of the big corporations—the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Pacific Railway, or some other big corporation—will receive from parliament authority to take such steps as will render the money which has been invested in that small undertaking worthless, will wipe it out, we shall have an end of all independent railway construction in this country. I do not think that in the interest of the public that is a desirable condition of things, because the big corporations will not go into these undertakings unless they promise to pay. When this Kaslo and Slocan road was built, it had not promised to pay largely; but the people on the spot and interested in that section of the country were prepared to risk their money for the benefit of the district. Now it appears to be a paying investment and we find a big corporation ready to go in and grasp the whole enterprise and take it out of the hands of the people who put their money in it when it was a very doubtful speculation. There is another fact. It is not necessary, in order to give the Canadian Pacific Railway a connection with Kaslo and with the mines. I may say that the present road, the Kaslo and Slocan Railway, goes within a mile and a half of the point to which the branch contemplated by this bill proposes to go, and it serves the mines in that way just in the same way that the branch contemplated by the bill would; so that you are giving no further advantage to the people there; and when this little corporation has been squeezed out of existence as it will be undoubtedly, then the big corporation will have the power to raise the rates to whatever figure they think the traffic will bear. That has been the practice in the North-west Territories, Manitoba and elsewhere, and it is what railway corporations always do. So that there is nothing whatever in the plea of competition. On the contrary, the district will suffer, I am satisfied, if this bill passes. Then it is not necessary for the purposes of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The Canadian Pacific Railway have taken over the Nakusp and Slocan Railway, which runs to the western terminus of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway. They can connect with the Kaslo and Slocan Railway. I do not know whether they have already connected or not, but they are in the same settlement and they can connect with the Slocan and Kaslo Railway, and do business in the district; so that the construction is not necessary for the purposes of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not think that it is necessary, or desirable, that I at any rate should say anything more of this measure just now. I may summarize; the bill is quite unnecessary; it is not called for by anybody; it is not looked for by the people of the district at all; it is not going to do any good; and it is not approved of by the representatives of the province in which the railway line is to be constructed. It will have the effect of discouraging the construction of independent railways throughout Canada, which is a most objectionable thing; and it is going to do serious injury to the enterprising and independent men who put their money into this Kaslo and Slocan Railway; and for that reason I feel that it is my duty—while I recognize all the country owes to the Canadian Pacific Railway—to speak as I have done. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have some six thousand odd miles of road already, and they have several hundreds of miles now under construction; and I think they have quite enough to attend to without taking up this unfortunate little Kaslo and Slocan road. It is a case like that of Naboth's vineyard, and the company should be warned by the fate of the covetous king.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I just wish to correct the chairman of the Railway Committee with regard to the figures he gave, I am quoting now from the printed report of the Department of Railways and Canals. The Kaslo and Slocan passenger traffic was $40,000; the freight traffic was $75,000; mails and express were $1,000—I am just giving the round figures—and other sources, $1,200. The total earnings were $117,000 gross, and the total net earnings were $66,000. The hon. gentleman spoke of it as a deficit, whereas there was a net profit of $66,000.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With the permission of the House I should like to make some remarks on this bill. When I say that the position taken by my hon. friend from Marquette, and also by the senior member for Halifax, is very unique and novel, I inferentially pay them a tribute. It may be inferred from that that no two hon. gentlemen in this House have been stronger opponents of monopoly than those two hon. gentlemen; and yet on this occasion we find them declaiming in very strong language against competition and in support of a road having an absolute monopoly of one of the richest districts of mining country in the whole of British Columbia. My hon. friends cannot possibly escape from that position. Furthermore, the inconsistency of the position taken by them would be equivalent to the ground which I am about to advance that this House hereafter would have to take in respect of all similar legislation. In the first place my hon. friend from Halifax would practically delegate to the members of each province absolute sovereignty, so to speak, in legislating for all the matters relating to that particular province.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I said their opinions should have weight with the House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman certainly advanced that as a reason why this House should be governed along the line and by the view expressed by him in rejecting this bill. Now, I entertain the very highest regard for the sagacity and for the wisdom of my hon. friends from British Columbia, who have expressed themselves in opposition to this bill; yet, at the same time, I certainly cannot forego exercising my judgment in regard to the principle involved in the position which they have taken. The principle involved would be simply this; that wherever there is a vested interest, assuming it to be a vested interest and I grant as strong a position as the opponents of this bill can possibly take, that upon a representation being made to this House that that vested interest is in any way interfered with, it is not desirable in the public interest to grant legislation which could possibly create competition or rivalry to that particular interest, irrespective entirely of whether the public interest would be subserved by carrying out that view. Let us investigate the facts relating to this bill for a moment or so. Two or three gentlemen appeared before the Railway Committee and expressed themselves in very emphatic language and represented in a very forcible way and with very great credit to themselves, the fact that this bill would be adverse to the interests of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway Company, and adverse to certain persons living in that particular district. Why? Because it would interfere with the interests of the company at present operating the various interests in that district. Now, one would have fancied that if the people of this road projected by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would result in the absorption of the Kaslo and Slocan road in the paralyzing of it from doing business hereafter, that the parties interested in the bonds of that road, the mortgagees of that road, in fact the owners of it would be the very first persons to appear before the Railway Committee, not only of this House but of the Commons, and protest against the legislation which we have under consideration; but when I say to hon. gentlemen present who were not at the Railway Committee, that there was no representation made on behalf of those who have bonded interests in the road—men most vitally interested — then hon. gentlemen can easily fancy that the Railway Committee had no alternative but to grant the charter. Now, certain gentlemen did appear before the Railway Committee, but they were residents of that particular district and the extraordinary position was taken by those gentlemen, and I certainly cannot reconcile it with the facts of the case, that competition in that particular district would be inimical to the best interests of the district and would demoralize the Kaslo and Slocan road. Now, it must be obvious that this fact would be patent to any hon. gentleman in this chamber, that the building of a competitive road into that district must necessarily enure to the benefit of every man who has an interest in that district outside of any interest he may have in the Kaslo and Slocan road. It is too late in the day to say that two roads running into a district of that character, one of the richest mining districts in British Columbia, in fact the richest mining district in the whole of British Columbia, a district made up of many groups of mines, a district on which a couple of smelters should be depending for their material—I say it would be idle to maintain that competition in that district would not be a very decided advantage to every interest in the district. If anything is patent, that fact is. Now, I might point out to hon. gentlemen that the object of the Canadian Pacific Railway extending their line into that district of the country known as the Slocan district is to secure a sufficient quantity of ores so that they may be able to operate their smelter at Trail, which has cost, I think, $600,000, and which they have recently acquired. If there is anything in that district which is badly needed, and which must be carried out to a successful result for the purpose of developing that country, for the purpose of establishing the richness of its mines and the wealth of its resources, it is the development of the smelting industry, and because the Canadian Pacific Railway seek to obtain an entrance into many groups of mines, the richest in British Columbia, so that they may be able to secure trade to operate their smelter at Trail, it is considered by some gentlemen who have an interest in that district that it is very wrong to permit them to do so. I am sympathetic at times where vested interests are to be unfairly interfered with; but public interest must be taken into consideration in this matter, and though some private gentlemen may find themselves interfered with in their calculations and in their expectations as to the development of certain properties, they must not stand in the way of public interests. The whole difficulty which I see in dealing with this matter along the views expressed by the hon. gentlemen from Marquette and Halifax would be that we would establish a system of monopoly exercisable by parties coming to parliament pointing out that they had certain interests in a district which would be seriously interfered with by a competing industry, and in this way they would paralyze all public enterprise and the development of great resources. Now, it is unnecessary for me to say anything in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company except this: that I have been a resident in that western country since the inception of that road. I witnessed the development of the whole of that western country through the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway and my observation has led me to familiarize myself more or less with the building of competing lines and other lines in that country, and I cannot recall any instance, and I challenge the hon. gentlemen from Marquette and Halifax to point out any instance, in which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in the development of its railway system throughout the whole of that western country, has ever absorbed a weaker road against its will, has ever done an injustice to a rival corporation, or has acted in any way not in harmony with the dignity of a great corporation, or failed to treat other corporations with the greatest amount of generosity. I say, in view, of that fact, we cannot for a moment assume that the predictions or forebodings of evil which have been uttered by the hon. gentlemen from Marquette and Halifax must necessarily be realized—that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is going into that country for the purpose of absorbing a railway 30 or 40 miles in length. I wish to point out to hon. gentlemen that this projected road is about ten miles in length. I would point out that the Kaslo and Slocan road has an outlet on Kootenay Lake, which has direct connection with the United States. It is not sought by this legislation to grant power to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to project this road to a greater distance than ten miles from Three Forks. That will leave them navigation on the Kootenay Lake, which I say is an outlet for the Kaslo and Slocan road, affording them water communication direct to the United States for the export of their ores to the United States smelters. That competition is not destroyed. They have the monopoly, if you chose to term it, of that water communication. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company in no way comes into competition with them in regard to that branch of transportation. I would state this fact—I had not intended to allude to it, but I may as well while speaking on the bill—that this road has been shipping the ores from the mines in that district to a United States smelter. They have been shipping those ores to Kaslo and from Kaslo by the Kootenay Lake to the United States smelters.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if there are any other smelters to take the ore?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There are two in that country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Are they running?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED.—The Trail smelter has until lately been working, but owing to the duties placed on the class of ores found in that district, they have to be sent into the United States for smelting purposes. But this should not continue and if you permit the present system to obtain for all time to come, we have a right to assume that the present condition of things will continue. But I am pointing out the desirability of giving competition so that such a quantity of ore may be secured by opening up this road from a very rich district of country as to permit the smelters being opened up on the Canada side, not necessarily opened up, because they are opened up, but to be run at an advantage. I will further point out to this House that the bonds of this company are held by United States corporations.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It makes no difference about that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It may make a difference. The bonds of this company are held in Minneapolis and, according to reports already read by the hon. gentleman from Marquette, it is quite evident that this road is not in such a condition as to be considered a wealthy railway corporation, because the expenditure considerably exceeds the revenue.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I read it exactly the reverse. There is a net profit of $66,000.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is the net revenue from the road, but my hon. friend overlooked the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Bedford (Mr. Baker) that the interest on bonds, and I presume other claims, exceed $70,000 a year, so my hon. friend from Marquette will observe there is necessarily a deficit.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Our statistics are more full.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Our own statistics do not point out what the indebtedness of the road is, and what the uncontrollable expenditure in the way of interest on bonded charges would amount to.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Oh, yes, it is all here.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then the hon. gentleman did not read it. I will further point out the fact that the bonded indebtedness of that road is of so large a character that it will absorb the profits of the road. There is not a margin on the working of the road for those interested in it. It cannot be said that by resisting this legislation now we would place those parties in any better position because practically the property is absorbed by the bondholders. Under the circumstances, I submit with great confidence to the House that this Senate will not endorse the views of the opponents of this bill, namely, that they will not grant competition for the development of an important section of the country where competition must necessarily be had, and where it is desirable that such competition may be had for the purpose of assisting one of the most greatly required and most important industries that can be established in that country, namely, the smelting interest.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—After listening to the speeches of the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) and the chairman of the Railway Committee (Mr. Baker) I am constrained to think that there is much necessity for a little information as to the relative positions of these two railways. The hon. gentleman from Calgary has certainly in many very important particulars misstated, or rather did not properly state the facts of the case. Before this vote is taken it is well that we should thoroughly understand that it is not an attempt to establish competition but to gobble up a small railway.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is a very serious charge to bring against a company.

Will the hon. gentleman state the grounds on which he makes such a charge?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The Kaslo and Slocan Railway is essentially a provincial railway and the Nakusp and Slocan is also a local railway. The proper place for this legislation is in the British Columbia legislature. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company know very well that they could not go to that legislature and get this extension of ten miles from Grand Forks to Whitewater Creek. The Nakusp and Slocan Railway, thirty-seven miles long, was chartered, subsidized and built by the British Columbia government. It cost the province between six and seven hundred thousand dollars. It has been turned over to the Canadian Pacific Railway who pay to the government 40 per cent of the gross receipts for operating that road. We do not know how it pays the company. We imagine it pays them very well, for they have a very favourable contract indeed. Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have built from Three Forks, the original terminus of this road, a short extension to Slocan City. On the other hand the Kaslo and Slocan Railway Company was built by the British Columbia Company of which Mr. Alexander Ewen was president. That gentleman, previously to the construction of the Kaslo and Slocan, built a wagon road at his own expense for the purpose of developing the Slocan mines. Mr. Alexander Ewen organized a company. They issued bonds to the extent of $600,000 and built this railway. They received from the provincial government, it is true, a small land subsidy. Now, the position is this to-day: this House is asked to extend the Nakusp and Slocan Railway ten miles alongside of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway, because, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman from Calgary has said, this road is parallel and parallel within a very few feet for its entire distance of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway. It runs through a narrow gulch and cannot do anything else. At no distance is it the width of this House from the Kaslo and Slocan Railway. Now we are asked to extend the Nakusp and Slocan Railway ten miles down in order that a railway built by the province of British Columbia—built entirely by that province and handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway shall ruin practically a small railway built entirely by private money and private enterprise. I think that is unfair. There is really no argument whatever in it. It is a mere excuse to say that the people there want competition. There have been no demands for this railway. There have been, on the other hand, documents, I believe, submitted to the Railway Committee—at all events, I heard them quoted there—from mine owners at Whitewater Creek that the present service by the Kaslo and Slocan was all they wanted—that they wanted no other railway. It appears strange that, without any demand whatever, without any person asking for this railway, with simply the demand of the Canadian Pacific Railway, this House should vote to extend this road and thereby, as I have said, ruin a private enterprise. There is not the slightest doubt in the world that the Kaslo and Slocan Railway will be practically ruined if this railway is permitted to extend along this road into the only country from which the Kaslo and Slocan Railway derives any freight whatever. That is the position, in so far as these two roads are concerned. I do not know that we have anything to say against the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I was very sorry to hear the chairman of the Railway Committee sneer at this small railway, the Kaslo and Slocan. I do not think he was wise in doing so. What would be the effect, assuming that my argument is correct, of the extension of this road for ten miles upon private enterprise, in building railways in the future in British Columbia? This Kaslo and Slocan Railway is the only independent railway that we have in that province. What its destiny may be in the future I do not know. It is just possible that the great Canadian Pacific Railway Company may, if not through this legislation through some future legislation or through purchase, obtain the Kaslo and Slocan. It may be its future destiny, but I do not think we should assist, by any unfair legislation of this kind, the Canadian Pacific Railway in obtaining or forcing possession of that road. What would be the effect upon private enterprise in British Columbia? Will it not be ruinous to it? Who in the future will invest $200,000 in the construction of a local railway if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company can come to this House and get legislation to parallel their road and to practically defeat their enterprise and ruin their business? It would be fatal to any enterprise of that kind. The Nakusp and Slocan Railway, as I said before, was built by the provincial government. I think it is a strong point. The operation of that railway is being paid for to-day by the province of B itish Columbia. British Columbia guaranteed the principal and the interest of the bonds of that railway. They receive forty per cent of the gross receipts from the Canadian Pacific Railway and that amounts to about $15,000 or $16,000 less than what they pay out as interest on the bonds. As has been pointed out, every representative from British Columbia now in Ottawa —with probably one exception—in both Houses, is opposed to the granting of this charter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It was not opposed at the third reading in the Commons by the British Columbia members apparently. I have the Hansard before me, and it was not opposed.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Messrs. Bostock and Morrison appeared before the Railway Committee and opposed the bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Page 3975 of Hansard shows that the bill went through without opposition.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The gentlemen who represent that district, Messrs. Bostock and Morrison, both appeared before the Senate committee and strongly opposed the passage of the bill. The hon. gentleman from Victoria City and myself are opposed to the bill. Whether our views are to be accepted or not, I think they should carry some weight in this House. Public opinion in British Columbia is not in favour of this bill. No person wants it excepting the Canadian Pacific Railway. It has been stated by several members, and I am a little astonished to hear the arguments used, that the bonds of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway are held in the United States. Well, what if they are? Where are the bonds of the Canadian Pacific Railway held? They are not all held in Canada or in London, but I am informed, as a matter of fact, that the bonds of the Kaslo and Slocan are not held in the United States. At all events, a newspaper published in that district, denies the statement made by Mr. Clarke in the Railway Committee of the House of Commons to that effect. The extract reads:

It is a matter of public fact that the Great Northern has nothing whatever to do with the Kaslo and Slocan. The road is principally owned and is under the control of men in British Columbia. The bonds are held in England.

If the bonds are held in the United States it makes no difference. My hon. friend made a rather peculiar statement. He said this railway did not parallel the Kaslo and Slocan. The map shows that it does. It is not the base of a triangle. It is parallel for the entire ten miles.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The map I have shows differently.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—All the ores of the country, whether taken out by the Kaslo and Slocan or the other road, have gone to the United States. But when hon. gentlemen dwell on this fact, that this road runs in a south-easterly direction and touches Kootenay Lake and carries ore into the United States, they forget that all ores, coming out of the Kaslo and Slocan go to the United States and have been going there for years and will go until some arrangements are made so that smelting can be carried on profitably in Canada. It has been remarked frequently that no one appeared in the committee to oppose the granting of the charter, and that is regarded as something favourable to the bill. I do not know that bondholders usually send representatives to legislatures to fight legislation, but I do know that those who have spoken and those who are speaking on this matter are acting in the interests of the stock holders and other interests which will suffer if this bill is allowed to pass. I second this motion with pleasure. I have no antipathy to the Canadian Pacific Railway but this bill is not in the public interest.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I move the adjournment of the debate.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to :

Call the attention of the government to the following conflicting statements made, the one to the religious authorities in Rome, by Mr. Charles Russell in the name and on behalf of the Catholic members of the present administration, on the 26th of November, 1897 ; the other to the Canadian public at large by one of the members of the present administration, and in its name, on the 2nd day of May, 1898 :—

Extract from a Letter addressed by Mr. Charles Russell to His Eminence Cardinal Rampolla, and dated,— Rome, 26th Nov., 1897.

The object of my visit is to call the attention of Your Eminence to the subject upon which I have so often negotiated, to wit, that such a condemnation (the condemnation of the Laurier-Greenway agreement) would have the most disastrous effects for the peace of Canada and the cause of Catholic education in this country, while at the same time it would sow discord among the Catholics themselves.

We do not solicit His Holiness to sanction as perfect the concessions obtained, but that, in his wisdom, he will be pleased to regard them as a beginning of justice. . . The condemnation of the concessions made would, at the present hour, render (I am begged to insist upon this point) any future concessions impossible.

Extract from the Senate Debates, 2nd May, 1897, page 709, 2nd column.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman must be aware that the present government have settled the school question with Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They adopted the same channels to settle the question as the late government did. The late government sent delegates to Manitoba and had a conference and failed to come to any agreement. The present government had a conference with representatives of the government of Manitoba and they came to an agreement, which was confirmed by the Manitoba legislature, and that is the end of it, so far as the public are concerned.

And inquired :—

1. Is the agreement spoken of by the Honourable the Secretary of State an agreement that really is the end of the Manitoba school question, as asserted by the government, or may it be considered as a beginning of justice, as put forward to the Catholic religious authorities by a man who is in the employment of the Canadian government, and who, arriving in Rome, writes that he is there once again at the urgent request of the Catholic members of the government and of the parliament of Canada ?

2. If the Manitoba School question has been definitely and irrevocably settled, when did that final settlement take place ?

3. If the Manitoba school question is not yet finally settled, and if what has been done up to date is to be considered merely as a beginning of justice, when will the remnant portion of justice, to which they are entitled, be bestowed to the Catholic minority of Manitoba ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman proposes to take an answer which I have given him on several occasions, and which answer I say is strictly correct, and to compare that answer with an extract from a document that he has put on this paper. That document I never heard of, as I explained the other day, until the hon. gentleman referred to it on a former occasion and I do not know that any such document exists. I should like the hon. gentleman to send me over the document if he has it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have not it here.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think the hon. gentleman has a right to catechise me on a document not before the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is on the minutes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is an extract on the minutes from a paper I never heard of, the authority of which I have a right to question. The hon. gentleman produces a document written by some one in the province of Manitoba to one of the ecclesiastics of the church to which I belong, which, I may say, if the document is genuine, has been purloined from Charles Russell or Cardinal Rampolla. It has been improperly obtained, and it has been obtained in such a way that no gentleman would use it in a matter of this kind.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman affirm that ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I affirm what I say, that no gentleman would use a private letter of that kind unless he was prepared to produce it, and he has no right to catechize a minister of the Crown as to its contents.

Hon Mr. LANDRY—How can the hon. gentleman say it is a private letter ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have my opinion about it. I am sure Charles Russell never gave a copy, and Cardinal Rampolla never gave a copy of it, if such a letter exists ; but I never heard of the letter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How can the hon. gentleman say it is a private letter ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a private letter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How does the hon. gentleman know?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is my opinion. If Charles Russell was representing certain gentlemen, he was representing them in a delicate diplomatic mission, which was not one in which the general public had any interest. That is quite patent and perfectly clear. But the hon. gentleman will insist on dragging this question before the House on every possible occasion, and he must know that he is doing irreparable harm to those whom he probably would like to serve. It was my good fortune, some thirty-five years ago, before the hon. gentleman became a Senator, to have settled this important question in one of the large provinces of the Dominion. I had then to deal with bigots and cranks and all sorts of people, but as time wore along the settlement then made has improved from time to time, as agitation, such as the hon. gentleman seeks to develop, was allowed to abate by the good sense of the people. A great majority of the people looked at it in a tolerant spirit, and I had the satisfaction of knowing that those who were the most bitter opponents of the system came at last to approve of it. History repeats itself, and I am sorry the hon. gentleman will not be governed by the experience of the past and leave the subject alone. He is only doing irreparable harm for those whom he professes to speak. The answers I gave, as far as the government is concerned, are accurate, and I have endeavoured on every occasion to give the hon. gentleman the fullest information to which he was entitled. I know nothing of Mr. Russell's mission to Rome, and I never had any communications with Mr. Russell at any time. I do not know the gentleman, and therefore it is highly improper for the hon. gentleman to use an extract of a document, which he says is a letter, but which he cannot produce here, and I have a right to doubt its authenticity.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has no right to catechise me.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does Bourinot say so?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If he has a right to do as he is doing, I have a right to do what I am doing. We are here on an equal footing as far as discussion goes. The question is this—

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has no right to question me on a document which is not before the House, and the authenticity of which I doubt.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Put the document aside for a moment; you do not know what I am about to ask you.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has a right to ask only what is on the paper, and it is for me to say whether I am bound by the rules which govern, and the rules of parliament, to answer the hon. gentleman's questions.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I ask the hon. Secretary of State to put that document aside for a moment, which he will not accept now, but which he will be obliged to accept in the near future. He can tell me at all events if the agreement arrived at and spoken of by the hon. Secretary of State is really an agreement which is the end of the Manitoba school question, or if it is a beginning of justice. At all events I should have an answer on that point.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have already answered the hon. gentleman that so far as the two governments are concerned it has been practically settled.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is not a mere beginning of justice; it is entire justice?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not going to enter into a sentimental part.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is not a sentimental part; it has been asserted that it is a beginning of justice. I am asking whether it is merely a beginning of justice, or whether it is a settled question. Is there any irregularity in that question? Could I ask if it is an entirely settled question?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not going to be catechised on a matter of that kind and I do not propose to answer my hon. friend any more.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will put that question on the order paper for to-morrow; perhaps in the meantime the hon. minister might find out if it is an entirely settled question or if it is only a beginning of justice. I will put it in that form, suppressing that letter which so much frightens the hon. gentleman, so that not being frightened by the sight of it, he may have sufficient self-control to answer my question. I will do all I can to comply with the wishes of the hon. gentleman, but I ask him one thing, if he doubts the letter let him say so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have already told the hon. gentleman I doubt its authenticity because the hon. gentleman does not produce it; I have never heard of the letter except from the hon. gentleman's mention of it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman said a moment ago it was a private letter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot tell anything about the letter. I said, and I say again, that if there was such a copy obtained either at Rome or London, it was purloined or stolen from the party, and I say it is an improper document to be made use of in parliament.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am very glad the hon. gentleman has gone so far. I wanted to bring him to that point and we will hear a little more of that in a few days.

LAKE BENNETT AND KLONDIKE RAILWAY COMPANYS' BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day having been called,

Third reading Bill (31) "An Act to incorporate the Lake Bennett and Klondike Railway and Tramway Company," as amended.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED said: Hon. gentlemen, I am not going to ask that this bill be now read a third time but that it be amended. The hon. gentlemen who were in the Railway Committee yesterday will doubtless remember that an amendment was granted to the company by which they are enabled to construct a wagon road sixteen feet wide to run at either side of the Miles Cañon and White Horse Rapids. Since that amendment was made, a telegram has been received asking the member in charge of the bill in the other House to have a further amendment made and to have it read "from Marsh Lake to Hootalinqua River." I might say the company has the right to build a railway from Marsh Lake to Hootalinqua River; but in the meantime they desire to build a wagon road. I might further say that no other charter covers this particular territory, and it can in no way interfere with any other interests; and I think it will be apparent to hon gentlemen that it is in the public interest that a wagon road at any rate should be built between those two bodies of water. I therefore move this amendment—after the words "White Horse Rapids" add the words "and from Marsh Lake to Hootalinqua River."

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is obliged to give notice; either that or he must have the 70th rule suspended.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then I give that as a notice.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Will this be the last surprise?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Unless some of my hon. friend's fellow-citizens telegraph for another change.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yesterday you were opposing what the residents of British Columbia wanted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I was not aware of that.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Now you want to give them what they want.

The third reading of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

THE NAKUSP AND SLOCAN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being called for resuming the adjourned debate on the third reading of Bill (52) "An Act respecting the Nakusp and Slocan Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) said: This is a bill of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company authorizing them to build a short line, as the House knows, to parallel another railway in the same part of the country. I oppose this bill from a sense of justice and fair play and because I want to protect the weak as against the strong. I have no interest in the matter more than that. Yesterday when my hon. friend, the chairman of the Railway Committee, passed such a high eulogy on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, I agreed with every word he said. I have been a friend of that company all these years. I admired its progress and the development of the country through its operation, and that is one reason why I am surprised that a strong company like this, with all its influence and strength, should try to parallel this little railway and crush it out. A company like the Canadian Pacific Railway, with all its capital and influence, ought to be more magnanimous and let this little railway company live. Its motto ought to be to live and let live, and I regret exceedingly that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should see fit to interfere with the ground now occupied by this private railway. I am also sorry to oppose this bill on account of my hon. friend who has charge of it. I should like, if I could, to let the bill pass without saying a word, but my sense of justice and fair play will not allow me to be silent. The hon. gentlemen of the Railway Committee know very well the bearing of this matter, but there are gentlemen in this House who are not on the committee and to them I would say, briefly, that this is a small railway of thirty miles, more or less, in the province of British Columbia. It is serving a few mines in that locality. It connects two small towns in British Columbia and brings a certain amount of trade to that country. It is operated to the full satisfaction of those people who are interested in that part of the country. No one is complaining that the section is not properly served with this railway. They have not asked for any competition and it has not been usual for this parliament to chase people with accommodation. People have, as a rule, asked for what they wanted in the way of accommodation and competition, but here we find the parliament of Canada chasing those people and saying to them "you must have this railway; we insist upon you having competition and insist upon crushing out your little railway." I am sure this Senate is imbued as I am, with sentiments of fair play and justice. I do not attribute to myself any higher sense of fair play and justice than this House possesses. It has been one of the functions of the Senate, and it is looked to in the country, as holding the scales of justice evenly between the weaker and the stronger provinces, and between the stronger party and the weaker party. What influence can be brought to bear on this House if they vote to crush out this small road and support a large and wealthy corporation? The Canadian Pacific Railway will not be one cent worse off if this bill is not passed. They can do without it. They have an idea that they require it. I do not know the extent of the mines in that section, but I believe this present private railway, in which people put their own money, serves all the purposes of the mines, and the miners are perfectly satisfied with the accommodation given to them by this road. It was chartered by the province of British Columbia and has never asked for any favours from the Dominion of Canada. They work their own schemes and their own road, and now the parliament of the Dominion comes in and interferes with a local charter. I have no doubt the effect of passing this bill will be to close up that road. If there is only enough trade now for one road, and if it is struggling along to pay working expenses and the interest on its debentures, what will it be when the trade is divided? We certainly know the weaker party must go to the wall, and the stronger party prevail. I ask every hon. member of the House to look at this case as if it were his own individual case, and if he put his money and his time into any private enterprise how would he like to have it crushed out by an act of parliament, his money all wasted and his industry destroyed? It is a case similar to that, and it will be a cruel case. Every hon. gentleman who votes for this bill will give a vote to do an injustice to a private undertaking. I do hope the House will consider the interests of those private people and not do this grave injustice. It will be a grievous wrong, and, as I said before, the functions of this House are to do justice and right between man and man. I leave the matter with the House. I do not suppose any words I could utter would influence any one to change his vote. Members have their own ideas, and there is a good deal of lobbying done and members often give promises without considering the bearings of the case as they should.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I try to look at this as an individual case. I live in the part of the country where we have one railway, and I would be willing and pleased to pay any reasonable amount of money to obtain competition. As I view this question, it will give competition to the miners. My hon. friend need not groan though he may not be able to see it in the same way. What is the history of all these railways?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who asked for the railway?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman says it is the only independent railway in the province of British Columbia. How many independent railways have we in this country? What is the history of the private railways or the independent railways in this country? Where are they to-day? They were glad to get the Grand Trunk Railway, to take them up in order to keep them running. I know that to be the fact, and I could mention a great many other railways in the same position. There is the Hamilton and Lake Erie, the Port Dover and Woodstock, the Welland, the Credit Valley Railway and several other railways all over the country whose history is just the same. The people get accommodation by the Grand Trunk Railway taking over these railways. What will this be worth to those miners? They will have one railway. If these speculators go in there and engage in mining, and build a railway do they not want to squeeze the miner so as to get the products of his mine away from the smelters? This is the way I look at this matter.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Did the miners ask for it?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I may be wrong, but no reason has been shown to me why I should vote against this measure, looking at the history of railways in this country. My hon. friend says we should not grant this charter. Why, we are granting things here in many cases that we should not do. We are granting charters for railways and other proposed public works in this country. We have a bill now going through where the people have two years to commence and four years to finish a public work. But you will not give them time. Then there is another independent railway, the Kingston and Pembroke. I believe it has a bill before parliament. What does it want? We will wait and see. I am not going to judge the case beforehand, but it is another independent railway which is before us for legislation. I hope all parties will get justice in this matter; but I cannot myself, knowing the effect this will have, vote against this bill. I quite understand the effect it will have on the interests of the people of the country, and I know what it is to have competition in railways. It is the first time that I have seen the Canadian Pacific Railway come before this House and want to give competition in railways. I am very glad to see it, and I hope they will continue the good work. If they will do that, the people of this country will have more accommodation and get their freight away to the seaboard at a cheaper rate. Knowing all these facts, as I do, I cannot vote against this bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have been watching the discussion on this bill in this House and having examined for myself the maps of the country and considered interests which it is likely to affect, I have been at a great loss to ascertain what public interests would be affected adversely by granting this charter, and though I have listened with the closest attention to the observations of the gentlemen who spoke against the charter, I have failed to find that they have shown how any public interest can be injured by the passage of the bill. They seem to rest the case wholly on what they claim to be an injury which it will inflict upon another railway corporation. I do not dispute that; it may be a fair and legitimate matter for consideration in this House, but it should certainly not be a paramount consideration. My hon. friend from Vancouver, speaking last evening, made a statement that certainly created a very strong impression on my mind. He said that all the British Columbia members in both branches of parliament were opposed to this charter. I would certainly be inclined, if that were so, to show a deal of deference to their united opinion although I would not necessarily forego my own opinion even on that account. I find, however, that my hon. friend has been incorrect in that statement.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I made an exception.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My information is that there will have to be several exceptions.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—My statement was that all those members who were present in the city of Ottawa, with one exception, favoured the six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend says all the members present in Ottawa, with one exception, favoured the six months' hoist. I will read a telegram which was placed in my hand a few moments ago, dated to-day, from one of the members who is not in Ottawa, I refer to Mr. McInnes, the M.P., for Nanaimo. The telegram reads :—

I am heartily in favour of the Nakusp and Slocan Railway Bill as it passed the House of Commons, and since my return find no opposition to the proposed extension. On the contrary, it meets with the greatest favour and the persistent opposition to it in Ottawa is unintelligible to the public here.

This is from Mr. McInnes, one of the members from British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Mr. McInnes is in British Columbia and not here.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understood my hon. friend to say a few moments ago that all the members in Ottawa were in favour of it except one.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Mr. McInnes is one who is a representative of British Columbia, in addition to the one in Ottawa, and I am told there are others. I am told on excellent authority that there are other members from British Columbia besides the the one my hon. friend excepts.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The point is not material, but I stated distinctly that all the members at present in Ottawa, with the exception of one, were unanimous in opposition to this bill. I do not know what Col. Prior's opinion on the subject is. He is in British Columbia and Mr. McInnes is in British Columbia and not here. His views were not ascertained before he left. I personally named every member, I named the two members in this House and the members in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am very sorry I did not follow the hon. gentleman as closely as I thought I did. The impression made on my mind was that there was almost an entire unanimity of the British Columbia members, whether here or in British Columbia at present, as to this charter.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—So there is.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think that is doubtful. The hon. gentleman does not know where Col. Prior stands. He distinctly excepts one representative of British Columbia at present in Ottawa, and this telegram states where another stands; so that as British Columbia has only six representatives in the Commons, it is pretty plain three of them are in favour of the bill, by the hon. gentleman's own statement. The objection which has been urged against this bill most strongly is that it parallels an existing road. It is true, I believe, from what I can learn, that there is some paralleling, but not in the sense that that bald statement would convey to hon. gentlemen when they first hear it. Although it parallels another road, yet it is opening an outlet in an opposite direction from the other road. The existing road gives an outlet to the Kootenay Lake, and this bill proposes to give an outlet from that section over an existing road, the Canadian Pacific Railway, on the Columbia River to Arrowhead Lake and when honourable gentleman bear that in mind, they will find that the paralleling does not present such a strong objection as if it was paralleling another road from the place where the trade had its inception, until it reached a common outlet. It is furnishing an additional outlet to this country, and that being so, as it is a very mountainous country, there may be only one route through a certain valley, paralleling is necessary, but its object is almost entirely different, and it furnishes competition not only in the transport of the ores of this country, but will facilitate competition in smelting as well. It has a most important bearing on cheapening transportation to the smelter and in smelting, enabling the owners of mines in that part of the country to choose either system they like and to reach one smelter or the other. I think, therefore, this objection on the ground of paralleling has not much force. A great deal of sympathy is expressed with the private corporation. We are all inclined to sympathize with the weak as against the strong, but we must not carry that feeling too far. Suppose the case were reversed, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company owned the existing road and a private company wished to compete with it, I am sure no member of this House would refuse that competition when no subsidy or aid is asked for. The principle is not changed because the situation of the parties may be reversed with regard to it. Another point that was made and pressed very hard by my hon. friend, from Shell River, was that the effect of this would be to kill out competition and give the Canadian Pacific Railway a monopoly of the traffic of that section. My hon. friend seemed to forget for a moment that there is no competition now; that one company has the transportation and that it is only in case of this company being killed out and falling into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that the competition would cease. If that happened nothing worse would occur than exists just now, because at present there is no competition, and there would be none then, and nothing would be lost so far as the country is concerned. This Slocan district is a rich mining country, perhaps the richest in Canada, the country lying between the Kootenay Lake and the waters of the Columbia River, and I know there is an extraordinary development going on there, and though none of these roads may at present be making fortunes, there is going to be in the near future a trade for all, and in view of the fact that there is going to be such a trade, that the richest silver mines in Canada—perhaps the richest in the world—are in that section, I think that the House would be doing a very foolish thing indeed if they threw out a bill which has reached it after having passed every stage in the House of Commons and passed through every stage up to the third reading in this House.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—When this bill came before the House I was at a loss to know how I should vote. After the hon. gentleman from Shell River had submitted his motion for a six months' hoist I gave my close attention to the debate, and I must say that I did not hear arguments on either side that would place me in a position to give a more intelligent vote on this occasion. One of the objections raised by the hon. gentleman from Victoria was that this private company had a local charter, that it was a poor company, and that this parliament ought not to interfere with it. I do not consider that we have here to do more for the province of British Columbia which granted this charter than the people of British Columbia have done for Canada. What did they do? They granted a charter by which the ores of those mines are taken to the United States to be smelted. Who have the benefit of the work? The United States.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There is no other smelter in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—If they had the interest of the country at heart I say they would have established, on this side of the line, smelting works to do that work in Canada. They did not do so. While I admit, as I said before, that the arguments on the other side are not much better, I am of opinion that if competition is allowed, as it will be if this bill is passed, the weaker company, which will be unable to compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway, may decide to erect a smelter on this side of the line, and do the smelting at the mines. In voting against the amendment and in favour of the bill I consider that I shall be working in the interests of Canada. I shall therefore vote for the bill.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It appears to me, hon. gentlemen, that the argument advanced in favour of this bill is not such as would commend itself to the good sense of the House. It appears that a small company have already organized and built a railway into that locality at, no doubt, very great personal sacrifices to themselves. Where was the Canadian Pacific Railway when that railway was wanted there? There was no talk then of the Canadian Pacific Railway extending their branches into that section of the country; but now, when this small company has established a road which is serving the public to their satisfaction—because we have no petition asking for the passing of this bill from the people of that section of the country, the Canadian Pacific Railway proposes to build a competing line. I believe myself in competition in railways as in everything else, but I do not look upon this bill as calculated to give any competition. I believe it is intended, and will have the effect of wiping out and ruining this small company; and in that respect we ought to guard carefully the weak against the strong. The argument, as advanced by the hon. member from Marshfield (Mr Ferguson) is not a very good one. He put it in this way, he reversed the case; supposing that the large company had their railway in there, and a small, weak company started in opposition, would we hesitate for a moment in granting a charter? I say no, because the very fact that a small company was starting a railway in competition with a large and rich one shows that there was a necessity for the competition. But I believe that the passing of this bill will have the direct effect of granting a monopoly to this large railway company, and enable them to freeze out the smaller company which is not desirable in this country. There is no man in Canada that appreciates the services which the Canadian Pacific Railway has rendered to Canada more than myself. I believe the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have done a great deal more for Canada than any other incorporated company, but I believe they have also done and are still doing a great deal for themselves, and I do not think they need any more assistance from us as a legislature. It is our duty to protect the weak as against the strong I intend to vote for the motion of the hon. gentleman from Shell River for the six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Before this debate closes I should like to reply to one or two arguments which have been advanced in opposition to the amendment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend from Marquette by what right he speaks twice on one motion.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I always understood that the mover of an amendment has the right to make such corrections as have arisen in the course of the debate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend has already spoken upon his six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If the hon. gentleman is going to crush me out, on a point of order, in favour of a rich company when I am standing up for a weak one, I think he is taking a very unusual course.

Several MEMBERS—Go on! go on!

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—We listened with a great deal of patience—those who did listen at all, for there were very few members in this House that did listen almost all yesterday afternoon to the hon. member from Shell River; and I think the hon. member for Calgary was quite right in saying it is taxing the patience of the House a little too much after spending the whole afternoon yesterday to begin the same job over again. He will not persuade one man in this House to change his mind.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—The debate on this question has convinced me that it is my duty to support the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member from Shell River. This is a contest between an immense and powerful corporation and a very small company that established a road into that country when it was required, and where there is, at present, no complaint made that the small road is charging unreasonable rates for the work it is doing for the people of that section. I have read in the papers printed in that locality that the charges made by this road are fair and reasonable, and that it affords a great deal of assistance to the people who are engaged there in mining enterprises. In looking at the evidence given in the committee the other day, and the plan which was submitted there respecting this road, I came to the conclusion that the road which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company propose to build there is not one which gives fair competition between the Kaslo and Slocan road and the Canadian Pacific Railway. It will draw away a large portion of the ore which is taken out from these mines in a different direction from that in which the Kaslo and Slocan road runs, and the people who have put their money into that road will, as it appears to me, be ruined, or their enterprise will be crushed out by the building of this additional branch by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Under those circumstances, I feel that it is my duty to favour the small corporation and that being the case, I shall vote for the amendment of the hon. member from Shell River.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The hon. senator from King's (Mr. Prowse) has expressed the views which I hold so clearly that I shall not take up the time of this House in repeating them, but I will make an observation or two on some statements which have been made by those who are advocating the passage of this bill. While my hon. friend who supports this bill spoke a great deal of public interests and private interests, and held that private interests should be subjected to those of a public character, he failed to show how in any way possible the public interest is benefited by the construction of the road which is about to be built under this bill. I cannot see how the public interests are to be advanced by it at all. I can easily see that it would be a great thing for the Canadian Pacific Railway to extend a short branch into a mining district and to get the traffic from that district, but I do not consider that that makes it such a public matter that we should wipe out the interest of a small provincial corporation, which I think is entitled to a great deal of protection from this House against the assault which is being made upon it. I am one of the best friends of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and have always supported it; but I think in this instance it is making a mistake, and consequently I feel it is my duty not to aid it in competing with and ruining this small corporation. This bill would enable it to do what I think it would be a very great injustice to that small road which, in view of the circumstances under which it was constructed, merits a great deal of consideration in this House. The company showed a great deal of enterprise in investing their capital in order to meet the demands of the miners in that country, and so far as we know it has fully satisfied all the demands for that mining section. There is no necessity for any other railway. My hon. friend opposite did speak about the proposed opening of a new outlet. That is a mistake. The existing road comes to the very point from which the Canadian Pacific Railway branch would diverge, so it does not furnish any new outlet. The Canadian Pacific Railway branch would diverge at Slocan and the other comes in at the same place. There is the outlet north-westward from the mines. One of the arguments which has been presented is that our desire to promote Canadian interests and have works in Canada should encourage us in the passing of this bill. As a matter of fact, all the ores which have come from that rich country, going even by the Canadian Pacific railway, have been taken to the United States to be smelted. There is no smelter with which the Canadian Pacific Railway is connected.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Not in operation, not for that particular class of silver and lead ores; they have for other ores. But I contend there is no place in Canada where the smelting can be done, and consequently it is immaterial, as far as the interests of this country are concerned, by which road it is taken. I believe there is a smelter situated on the Kootenay Lake in Canadian territory, which is not in operation at present on account of the adverse influence of United States legislation. That could, I presume, be put in operation again and satisfy all the requirements of this region for smelting lead and silver ore. Now, with respect to competition, I take the view that my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Prowse) takes, that it would furnish no competition at all. I do not believe that any competition would exist, for no sooner would this ten miles of road be made than it would kill the other road, because the small road could not possibly continue its existence in competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway with all its resources. The Canadian Pacific Railway would put freight rates so low that nobody would send anything by the existing road. They would do that till such time as the other road was killed, and then the miners would have to pay the penalty. That is the invariable process which has taken place where any privilege of this kind is given. I think, therefore, that instead of regarding it as a means of competition, it is the reverse, it would have the effect of preventing any competition. A very large measure of competition can be provided by people travelling on the existing road and coming to Slocan, and there joining and coming south by the Canadian Pacific Railway if they like. There is an outlet that way. We should, therefore, pay a great deal of attention to the appeal—for I regard it as an appeal—for a Canadian road which has been made at the private expense of Canadians and is doing a very good work, all that is required for the country. The fact that this new branch has not been asked for by anybody should have some weight with us. The people in that country have no fault to find with the existing line and do not want competition, so far as we know. I think, therefore, under all these circumstances, that it is my duty to support the amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—May I ask the hon. gentleman whether the road that is now in existence does serve the same mining interest that would be served if the ten miles were built? Does not the proposed ten miles extension from the Canadian Pacific Railway lead to other mining industries that are not now served by the present line?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I contend that they do not. It was shown distinctly to us in committee, when the plan was presented, that the two roads must run strictly parallel and within the width of the walls of this chamber.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—And where it ends it does not go into any mine. It will not be many hundred feet away from the existing road at the proposed terminus of it; and that is one objection I intended to refer to, namely, the parallelism of the road which was almost sneered at and spoken of as a thing not worth mentioning. The road is obliged, according to the formation of the country, to be very near the other one on account of the narrow cleft of rock, and there is no possibility of the road being many yards away. It is strictly a parallel road a great length of the way, and does not lead into any region which is not fully served by the existing road.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that were correct, then the inference to be drawn from the remarks of the hon. gentleman is that the terminus of that road to the south is exactly in the same place. If my recollection serves me right, it diverges to the south-east of the existing road and therefore leads into a mining district that is not served, and if that be the case, it must be in the interest of miners to have this road built. We know the result of having but one road in the Rossland district leading to the smelter at Trail. The charges were so great that those who were interested in some of the Rossland mines, the War Eagle, for instance, refused to send their ores down to Trail, from the fact that the charges of the smelter at that place and the railway freights were so great that they would absorb nearly the whole product of the ores sent there. I should like to ask another question: Is there any possibility of getting to the western smelters by those who desire to send their ores over the present road, without utilizing the waterways of the Slocan or Kootenay Lake and then utilizing the Canadian Pacific Railway down to the Columbia thence down to Trail? There is no other way of getting there. At present the ores, wherever taken from and sent to market by the present road, go to the United States. My hon. friend said, as I understood him, that there was no other smelter in that section of country, in Canada, to treat the silver lead ores. My information is to the contrary. There is a smelter, but it is not in operation, owing to the tariff which exists in the United States, because if they smelt the ores in Canada the products of those smelters cannot be sent into the United States on account of the high duties which are charged on matte and on the refined article. Ergo, they have now to send their ores to the United States as they are admitted at a comparatively low rate of duty. Whether we should direct our legislation in such a manner as to assist the United States tariff makers in securing the products of all our own mines is a question for this House and parliament to consider. The hon. gentleman opposite will excuse me if I volunteer a suggestion—he has often condemned us for not suggesting better measures when we criticise those of the government—if the present government would put on a duty at all equal to that imposed by the United States on our products, then we would have the market for that large quantity of lead brought from the United States into Canada. That is the only means that I see of meeting the policy of our neighbours. I cannot understand my hon. friend's reasoning when he says that the construction of this road will be the means of killing out or absorbing the other road. By what means? By so lowering the rate that the other road could not live. Well, that would be in the interests of the miners, and if he and I had ores to send to the smelter, that is what we should like to see. I shall vote for this bill on the broad principle of supporting any charter for the construction of a road in Canada which will tend to develop its mineral resources or the prosperity of the country, so long as they do not ask us to give them any assistance. The sooner we adopt that plan the sooner we will legislate in the interests of the whole country and not of any particular individual or section.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I hold that the proposed construction does not meet any of the difficulties alluded to. By the present road all the ores can be taken by the route suggested. My objection to the destruction of the old road is that the Canadian Pacific Railway would keep up a low rate only until the other would give up, and then resort to monopoly charges.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There would be low rates for the time the competition would last.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—This is a very important question, and I desire to reply to two or three of the arguments which have been used by those who support the bill. The chairman of the Railway Committee yesterday commenced his remarks by saying it was just a question whether the country owed a debt to the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway owed a debt to Canada. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the country does not owe a debt to those who are working in the interior of the country and supplying a revenue to the Canadian Pacific Railway—the pioneers who lay the foundation of our Canadian civilization, who go in advance of railway communication and open up the resources of Canada under great difficulties and who send down here the products of their industry, leading to the distribution of the enormous revenues of the Canadian Pacific Railway; is there no debt due to them? I say it is due to those men who have come down here and asked this House to give them justice not to turn a deaf ear to their arguments and their objections. Are we going to say that this country owes nothing to those men working in the interior and supporting the Canadian Pacific Railway, 4,500 miles of which is west of the lakes and is supported entirely by the handful of population that lies between there and the coast of British Columbia? Of the $24,300,000 of revenue earned by the Canadian Pacific Railway last year a very large proportion was contributed by the labour and industry of that class whose interests I am here to defend. That $24,300,000 is in the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and it is distributed far and wide throughout Canada as they dispose. If there were no labourers in the Northwest, there would be no Canadian Pacific Railway; if there were no Canadian Pacific Railway, there would be no labourers in the Northwest to distribute the results of their labours through the country. The country has given to the Canadian Pacific Railway bonding privileges, and bonuses of every kind and has received in this particular district $4,000,000 of a bonus and 20,000 acres of land from the province of British Columbia in order to afford competition to those who own the mines there. Are we going to kill that competition? Are we going to say to those people you are not to have any benefit from your enterprise; we will place you in the hands of a new master? Are we always going to be on the side of those who have the power to levy the revenue, and never on the side of those who produce the earning power which creates the revenue? That is what we say by passing this bill. I should like to reply to the argument of the hon. gentleman of Calgary (Mr. Loughheed) who made a point that the bondholders were not petitioning against the bill. The bondholders are safe. Their interest is paid regularly; it is a first charge upon the road, and whatever becomes of the road, the bondholders are mortgagees and it is only when the road is sacrificed for the non-payment of interest that their interest is jeopardized. But those who have paid their money to start this independent road—those people who belong to Victoria and Vancouver and Kaslo and other places in British Columbia who initiated this railway—are the people who are going to lose. Are we going to wipe out their capital and place them under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway which has invaded the territory of this little railway with an earning power of only $117,000? Are we going to sanction that? Is that what the fathers of confederation, some of whom are still left, the seniors of the country, sitting round this chamber, are going to say to the people of that western country? I think not. I think when you come to consider it in its true aspect you will not take that position. I know the sympathy we all have with the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is an honest sympathy, a sympathy I have myself, in the ability Canada displayed in constructing this railway. But in constructing this railway we did not intend to create a power greater than this parliament. Our sympathies are with those who wish to see competition established in some way in order to assist those who are engaged in the very hard and laborious life of the farm or the mine. This private road is thirty-two miles long. Its terminus on the water communication is Kaslo on the east. This short line has an outlet provided by nature, of water communication, which gives them the competition of the American railways, and which they have so far utilized. The mining district is on the western end of the thirty-one miles. The Canadian Pacific Railway comes in at Sandon, which is the western terminus of this railway also and wish to build ten miles of an extension in the same narrow valley to take from this railway its main support, a trade for which it was built. What for? Not to compete, hon. gentlemen, but to close out competition from the south by the natural water route they at present possess. When the Crow's Nest Railway is extended to this water communication, Kootenay Lake, these miners will have three routes to choose from, the Sandon connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, going north; the Crow's Nest, crossing the foot of Kootenay Lake, to the south; or the water connection with the Great Northern. To build ten miles only, they are going to attack the existing thirty-one miles and weaken the support of that little road. Their gross revenue is $117,000, the revenue of the Canadian Pacific Railway is $24,300,000, and this rich company wants, by the construction of this ten miles, to force the Kaslo and Slocan Company, by a sale or otherwise, to abandon this southern competition. The miners, the citizens and the owners of the railway come down here and petition against the legislation that will force the company into that position. They are going to divide that $117,000 income which this private road enjoys. Is this House going to say to the people who have come down here with their petitions to ask our protection, that we are going to allow the Canadian Pacific Railway to take a portion of that $117,000 from them? Are we going to have it spread broadcast over the country that the people have no protection from monopolists and powerful corporations which have the right to make charges without control of any kind or description? Are we going to say they shall be subject to a further monopoly in that part of the country? I should like to reply to my hon. friend from Delanaudière (Mr. Bellerose) who is always desirous of giving an honest vote so far as he can. He is imbued, to a certain extent, with the idea that it is not patriotic for us to let any portion of our trade go to the United States. It is a strong point and appeals to a great number of people, but those who are living on the Kaslo and Slocan Road and are on water communication, the Kootenay Lake and River which nature has provided for them, have an outlet by which they may get down to the only smelter established there. They are not asking to build a railway for the same reason that the city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba were desirous of building a road down to the boundary. All they are asking for is to be allowed to utilize that water communication which nature has supplied them in order to develop the mines, and the business of the towns built by this railway. But you are going to say to those people, we are going to close up the line you have built in order to get this water communication? Do you think that is a sound policy? We had monopoly in Manitoba, and we had to fight it. The Attorney General of Manitoba, Mr. Martin, fought monopoly on behalf of his province. Unfortunately for the public, Mr. Martin has become a solicitor for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I have no doubt as an honest politician he found that he could not occupy the position of solicitor of that company, and serve the public interest at the same time, and so he retired from politics. I understand that Mr. McInnes, a telegram from whom was produced here to-day as evidence of the popular feeling in British Columbia, is going with Mr. Martin into political life in British Columbia. These gentlemen are working together on the same lines. No doubt Mr. McInnes, as an honest man, felt that he could not sit as a member of parliament and at the same time do his duty to the public and to the great corporation whose cudgels he evidently prefers to take up, as evidenced by that telegram read here to-day from him. Now we do not want to have another fight with monopoly in the west. We do not want British Columbia to come under monopoly. We want to govern this country on equitable terms and we want to feel that this parliament is open to everybody to get fair play, and that this central parliament is the centre of a bond of union of a great nation which is springing into life, and which will be a great nation and an ornament to the people who have built it, and will extend its influence and power upon lines of justice. If we are going to be held down under the heel of monopoly in any shape or form whatever by the action of this parliament, I say we are taking a wrong turn. This is one of those questions which it is necessary for us to consider carefully before deciding which course to pursue. The public interests and private interests are the only points I wish to touch upon. The hon. gentleman from King's said he did not see that any great public interests were affected. I do not think any public interests are affected. I do not see how public interests come in. It is merely the private interests of the people of the town of Kaslo, and the private interests of those who constructed that thirty-one miles, and if this ten miles of railway is to be constructed, their private interests will be wiped out. The hon. gentleman from Monck (Mr. McCallum) tried to convince us that we are refusing competition. The object of the application of the Canadian Pacific Railway for this legislation is to kill competition with the water communication to the south, not to give competition to the miners. As the hon. gentleman from Sarnia (Mr. Vidal) has told us, by reducing the rates the Canadian Pacific Railway will kill out a weaker concern, and then the new concern will adopt the old rates. It is those private interests which are in question. There are no public interests concerned, and therefore I hope the House will carefully consider this very important question. The question is; which way are we going to turn? Are we going to be the mouthpiece of those who seek for legislation in this matter, or are we going to be the mouthpiece of the people who wish to be protected from a powerful monopoly.

The House divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division:

SECOND READING.

Bill (72) "An Act further to amend the Adulteration Act."—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (N) "An Act to amend the Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is a very grave departure from the practice and the laws which have regulated the giving of evidence. I think we should have some explanation in order to be better able to judge of its merits before we go to committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will just read a clause which is an amendment to section 5, of the Canada Evidence Act of 1893. This provision is due to a difference of opinion between the judges in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice and the judges of the Queen's Bench Division of the province of Ontario. The question arose as to whether the evidence that was given before coroners and other similar proceedings by the party incriminated could be used upon the trial. One division of the High Court took one view and the other division took another, and different view, and this is for the purpose of settling that difference. The clause, as it stands and as we propose to make it, provides that the parties may be compelled to give testimony in preliminary proceedings, but that if they object on the ground that it will incriminate them, the evidence which they so give cannot be used upon the trial against them. It removes a subject of controversy and settles the law in one particular way, so that hereafter there will be no difference of opinion upon a subject of very great importance. Hon. gentlemen will see what the precise provisions are when I come to read the section as we propose to make it. The section reads :

5. No witness shall be excused from answering any question upon the ground that the answer to such a question may tend to criminate him, or may tend to establish his liability to a civil proceeding at the instance of the Crown or of any person ; provided, however, that if with respect to any question the witness objects to answer upon the ground that his answer may tend to criminate him or may tend to establish his liability to a civil proceeding at the instance of the Crown or of any person, and if but for this section the witness would therefore have been excused from answering such question, then, although the witness shall be compelled to answer yet the answer so given shall not be used or receivable in evidence against him in any criminal trial or other criminal proceeding against him thereafter taking place other than a prosecution for perjury in giving such evidence.

The provision in England in regard to the law of bankruptcy contains a similar provision to this. A party being examined as to the use made of his property or estate may be compelled to give evidence, but if he says that the evidence he may give will tend to criminate him, it does not release him from the obligation of testifying as was the practice under the old criminal law of England, but it does entitle him not to have the evidence which he so gives used against him in a criminal proceeding, I think the proposition is reasonable. Hon. gentlemen will understand that this has been a subject of controversy, and it is a matter about which the law ought to be clear and settled, one way or the other, and the proposal here is in accordance with the view of the vast majority of the profession as to what the law ought to be on the subject.

Hon. Mr. DE BOUCHERVILLE—If a witness refuses to answer, how do you compel him ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Precisely the same way as you compel a witness in any other case now. He may be punished for contempt of court.

Hon. Mr. DE BOUCHERVILLE—That is the only way ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, that is the only way.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the difference between the amending law and the law as it at present stands ? I have looked at the two sections, and while the phraseology is more elaborate in the amending section, I fail to see any substantial difference between the two sections. In both cases immunity is granted to the witness in the event of his answering the question, but so far as I can observe from the amending bill, no greater immunity is afforded him under the amended law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—One-half of the judges have held that the law, as it stands, is this way, and others say it is not, and it is to make that point perfectly clear that we have this legislation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But they may equally differ as to the amending section, and I want to know wherein the amending bill makes any substantial difference in the law as it at present stands. I am aware of the judgment the hon. minister has referred to, yet at the same time I cannot appreciate any substantial difference between the two sections.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Except that it is expressly declared he shall not be excused from giving testimony on the case, and that if he does give testimony in the case, does not state that it will incriminate himself, it may be used in a subsequent case. If he does so state, it cannot be used, and that is the point upon which the judges in the case heretofore have differed.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

HARBOUR OF ST. JOHN, N.B., BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. DEVER moved the second reading of Bill (101) "An Act respecting the Harbour of St. John, in the province of New Brunswick." He said: This is a bill from the common council of the city of St. John asking for an extension of the by-laws which govern St. John Harbour to St. John Harbour north at Indiantown.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It extends the limits of the harbour?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Yes. It is drawn up, I am informed, with great care by the recorder of St. John city, a gentleman of good legal standing, and a representative in the legislature, and it has stood the test there. I think the government and the local authorities had something to say about it, from the fact that it came under the Minister of Marine's department. It gives satisfaction and I do not want any amendments or changes in the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned.

TRADE MARK AND DESIGN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved that Bill (61) "An Act in further amendment of the Trade Mark and Design Act," be placed on the Orders of the Day, for a second reading on Tuesday, the 17th instant.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman should give some reason for this motion. This bill was dealt with only a few days ago.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I do not know that this is the proper stage to make my explanation. This bill to amend the Trade Mark and Design Act was up for a second reading on the 10th May, and the consideration of the bill was then postponed sine die. The principal objection taken at that time to the bill, as far as the discussion went, was to its last clause. It was thought by the House that associations or unions of workingmen would have authority, under this bill, after registering their trade mark, to put that trade mark upon goods or articles manufactured by other than union men—that where union men were employed in shops, they might claim the privilege and exercise the right under this bill of placing their trade mark upon the goods. I have had an interview with the gentleman who had charge of this bill in the House of Commons and learned that it was not contemplated by the Trades and Labour Council of the Dominion, who seek this legislation, that any such thing should be done, or any such privilege exercised. It was expected by this House that if this bill passed in its present shape the Trades and Labour Council would have the right to affix their particular trade mark to articles manufactured in shops where they were employed, whether with or without the consent of the proprietors. I understand that that was the principal objection to the bill and the reason why the motion to adjourn the second reading was carried. I understand that it was not contemplated that any thing of the kind should be incorporated in the bill, and the promoters of the bill are quite willing that it should be amended in conformity with the views of this House in that regard. I desire to replace it on the order paper with the view of moving an amendment to the latter clause of the bill something in this form:

> That such trade mark shall not be used to designate any article whatever unless by the consent of the owner of such article.

I think such an amendment as that would meet all the objections which were raised to this bill when it was discussed the other day.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Supposing 100 labouring men came to a manufacturer and asked to have their trade mark put on the goods what could he do? How could he defend himself from the labouring men?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—If 100 men went to him and asked for liberty to use their trade mark and the proprietor refused, they could not do anything.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They could strike.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—They can strike now. I have had long experience with trade unions, and I rather favour them. I have worked harmoniously with them for many years and I have never found them arbitrary, or unjust in their claims. The unions of the country are not asking any exceptional or unfair privilege in this bill that I have moved to reinstate on the order paper. I would be quite willing to accept any reasonable or fair amendment to meet the views of the House in that regard, that is, to this extent, that no member of an organization can put his trade mark on any goods without the consent of the owner of these goods. I presume when the bill is placed on the order paper it can be debated at the proper time and the proper amendment can be drawn up.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I should like to inquire of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down if there is any law to prevent the proprietor of a manufacturing establishment using any mark he pleases, whether it is in accordance with the wish of the trade unions or not at the present time. There is no necessity for a law of this kind. If it is to be optional with the manufacturer to grant the request of the trade union there is no necessity for a law in the matter at all. If the proprietor is willing to use any mark to please the trade unions, he can do it without any law whatever.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I am not against trade unions; on the contrary, I believe it is one of our duties to help those institutions, because they are the institutions of the poor. But I am in favour of the unions so long as they stand within the limits in which they should confine themselves. But it is well known that those unions go a great deal beyond that. Every day you hear of strikes and you hear of those trade unions persecuting men who do not belong to unions in order to prevent them from working, and filling their places with union men. This shows that parliament ought not to encourage those institutions too much, and that in granting to them powers or favours we ought not to give them favours which may induce them to go too far. I believe this is a favour which would lead them to go beyond proper limits. I am quite opposed to any favours of this kind. I believe that those union men who work in a manufactory have no right to have a mark of their own on the goods that they manufacture. They have no moral right to it; consequently why give them such a right? The hon. gentleman on my left (Mr. Templeman) says that the proprietor will be protected because he will have power to grant or to refuse the request of the union men. But hon. gentlemen know very well that if such a privilege as this is granted by law, they will work very hard in order to get it an established rule, but as mentioned a moment ago by the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Mr. Macdonald, B.C.) they will even have recourse to strikes to force the employers to allow them to do so. Of that there can be no doubt. Is not that a bad state of affairs? Should this parliament open such a door to the union men? I say no. If parliament does so it does just the reverse of that which they have been established for. Therefore I am now, and always will be, against granting such favours. Give them such rights as will increase their standing in society and help them to earn money for the sustenance of their families. I shall always be ready help in carrying out any scheme which has this for its object, but I am not in favour of granting such favours as those now asked for. They may have their own mark. We have enough societies who have marks to know each other, and what have they used them for? Not always for what was best, but often for what was not for the good of the country. That they might form a strong organization and with that strength they can act in a way that is not always for the good of the country.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I cannot say that I altogether agree with my hon. friend from De Lanaudière. For my own part, I have a very favourable feeling for trades unions generally, and I believe that labouring men and employees have a right to organize, and that in this age of the world it is necessary for them to organize in order to hold their own against capital; but, at the same time, I think that this bill has received sufficient consideration already from this House. It was three times distinctly brought forward, and the discussion of it laid over until there would be time for further consideration. On each occasion it received some discussion and consideration. It appears to me that the bill has been prepared by those who have not had much experience in legislation, and probably without getting professional aid in the preparation of this proposed amendment to the law. My hon. friend from Vancouver suggests, as my hon. friend from Halifax did when it was up before, that this trade mark should only be placed on goods by the consent of the manufacturer. When I heard that suggestion I saw some practical difficulties, that I think were insuperable, to the bill, even after that consent was given. Suppose the manufacturer gives his consent, half his employees are union hands and half are not. The articles produced by the trade union men have this mark and the others have not, though coming from the same shop. It is very plain that the parties who put this bill before Parliament did not give it very full consideration—did not themselves see the difficulties that would be in the way. It is not very clear from the bill what they are really wanting to get. I cannot imagine that it was the intention to get a law by which of two packages of goods coming from the same manufactory one would have a particular brand on it which the other could not have. That difficulty would still remain after my hon. friend's amendment. Possibly if we knew distinctly what the promoters of the bill wanted, we might be able to so far agree with them as to give them what would fairly meet their wishes, but I am satisfied that this would not affect it, and that it would lead to greater difficulties than they anticipate.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Does the hon. gentleman believe it is necessary to make a law to give those trade unions labourers a right to place a mark on the goods which they produce, with the consent of the manufacturer?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think it.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—There is nothing to prevent them doing so now, with the consent of the proprietor.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is to allow them to register their mark.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—But if permission is given?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They cannot register.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I think it is trifling with the House to take up this question again. We have decided it once already.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—When this bill first came into the House it struck me very forcibly that it was a bill which might affect very seriously the trade and commerce of the country, and was therefore one which should be introduced by the government. The Secretary of State adopted it, but did not seem to like it very much even when he presented it to the House, and, for my part, I find it very difficult to understand the principle of the bill, or how that it could be properly carried out. I have always been under the impression that a trade mark meant some distinguishing mark by which the manufacturer of particular goods might have his goods distinguished from those of other manufacturers; and if his firm had attained a certain reputation, this trade mark would stamp it and be a sort of warrant that the goods were of the class they were represented to be. That is what I understood was the principle of the trade mark. It seems rather an inconsistent thing to have two trade marks, one of the manufacturer and one of the men employed in the manufactory. At all events, it seems to me that the bill was presented to the House in such a shape that it was impossible to adopt it as it was. It required a good deal of explanation, and I supposed that the Secretary of State or the Minister of Justice would be prepared to make suggestions to improve it. For my own part, I should have been very glad indeed to have allowed the bill, as suggested by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, to be sent to the committee, but it is rather an unusual thing to bring it up in this way after the House has disposed of it. It is very clear to my mind that the government, in a question of this nature, should take the responsibility and say what they would advise in the matter.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—This measure has been very well got rid of. We need not get rid of it again. It was introduced into this House without any sponsor, and taken hold of by the hon. Secretary of State, and the way he handled it—the delicate way in which he touched it, showed that it had a malodorous element in it. He stated several times that it was not his bill—that he merely took hold of it because nobody else would. I listened very carefully and did not hear any one mention one solitary advantage that this bill would be to the workingmen. The use of a trade mark, as stated by the hon. gentleman from Toronto, is not for the man who makes the goods, but for the proprietor. When you see a trade mark on goods, it is something you have been told about before, and you buy it, but if a trade mark indicates that it is made by Tom, Dick and Harry, in one house, and Jones, Smith and Robinson in another, what possible use is it to the general public? There has not been one word said to show what possible benefit this bill would be to the trade unions. I do not think it can be denied, in regard to these trade unions, that the principle is that because certain men choose to pay a certain sum into the union, they are to have a pull over the other men, who say "we will keep this money and pay nothing to your society; we will keep it for the benefit of our wives and children." I have often heard complaints from the working classes about the tyranny practised over them by the trade unions. They say "in the first place we have to pay a large sum to them, and we cannot do it without denying ourselves the feed and fuel which our family require," and the industrious man is put in shackles and compelled to work a great number of hours as the majority of them do. I think that this House should not pass this measure, despite the fact of any unpopularity it may cause, because we are told this measure passed by only a majority of one in the trade union. It has been forced on them by some demagogue, in all probability, connected with the association, who for a little popularity endeavours to force it on them. It seems to me that it is a bad bill, and it is the function of the Senate to reject it. They endeavour to force this malodorous thing down our throats, and I hope the House will not allow it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot help but remark the treatment given to this bill as compared with the treatment of the bill introduced by the hon. gentleman from Calgary some days ago when that bill was before this House. The hon. leader of the opposition moved that the debate upon it be adjourned. The effect of his motion was precisely the same as the effect of the motion made in reference to this bill the other day. That motion was carried by a small majority, and the bill went off the order paper. Did any hon. gentleman rise in his place and say that the House had fully considered the subject, and it was an improper thing to bring the matter up again? Was that a proper line of argument to adopt toward the bill?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The debate was adjourned.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But the effect was to put it off the order paper altogether.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—That was the effect, but that was not the intention.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman says no and I say yes, and he has but to look at the minutes of proceedings of the House to see that my statement is correct. That is the rule which has been followed before, and that order was not before the House and was not on the order paper, and required a distinct motion to put it on the order paper again. What was done in that case? Was the six months' hoist such as to put it beyond the power of the House to consider it made? No, it was not. The motion was for the purpose of adjourning the consideration of this bill indefinitely.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Was that the object?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The motion to adjourn the consideration of the bill sine die was carried. Does that put the matter out of the consideration of this House? Why was it put in that form and not in the form that it be considered three months or six months hence? It was because the House indicated by that motion, if it meant anything, that the matter was still under consideration, that the members were still unprepared to move the six months' hoist to the bill, but left it in such a condition that it might be taken up and considered at some future day. It meant that there was an object in putting it in that form, and if we are to assume that it was a fair and straightforward vote, then the object was to give the House an opportunity at any moment before the end of the session to bring up this matter again. What has my hon. friend done by this motion? He is within the rules of the House. This matter having been adjourned without fixing a day for its future consideration, it is quite proper to ask this House to permit this bill to be put on the order paper for consideration on Tuesday next. Every step in that proceeding was perfectly legitimate and naturally sprung out of the action taken by the House when this bill was last before us. My hon. friend from Toronto says that the government ought to assume the responsibility of this bill. I say the government ought not. This is a bill for marking the products of a trades union. They come before this House just as parties seeking incorporation for a railway, just as parties may come before the House seeking for a trade mark with which to mark their goods or merchandise. They come before us in the same way, in their private capacity, for the purpose of obtaining a recognition so that a trade mark may be used by them to mark the products of their industry, and may not be used by any other person. It seems to me that that is a legitimate request. What is the old law with regard to a trade mark? It is a law relating to a proprietory interest in those goods so marked. A party who owned a particular article he had been in the habit of producing, that had secured distinction on the market, that was upon the market received with favour, applied to parliament for the purpose of enabling him to mark the products of his manufacturing establishment with a particular mark in order that he might, to the fullest extent, profit by the skill and success which had attended his production. That was in relation to capital. Formerly labour was not recognized. Capital alone was recognized, and the proprietory interest of the capitalists was recognized in the old law with regard to trade marks. Is that the condition of this at this moment? Society has undergone a change, and trade has become organized. The men who are engaged in ordinary labour ask for the recognition of their rights in the same way as you have hitherto recognized capital, and in England they have had it. In England the labourer marks the product of his industry with the consent of the proprietor, just as they ask to be allowed to do here. We are not asking to go beyond the settled statutory law of England at this time, and it seems to me an extraordinary proceeding that these men should be denied this privilege because some real or fancied abuse might spring out of the power which they possess under this law. Let me say to hon. gentlemen that all power is liable to be abused by the party who possesses it. Public opinion and the law generally exercise a wholesome restraint and put an end to abuse if parties are so disposed to abuse power, and my opinion is that if trades unions or organizations of labour, feeling their power, are disposed to exercise that power to the full extent to the detriment of other parties, public opinion and, if necessary, legislation will exercise a wholesome restraint over that. Men in the exercise of power of self government, in almost every sphere, new at the business, are liable some times to go wrong and to go too far, but in order that they may go at all, it is necessary that they should be trusted with some power. The old lady's advice to her son, never to go into the water till he knew how to swim, is very like the suggestion of some hon. gentlemen in the discussion of this matter. I think the bill was a moderate bill. Some hon. gentlemen say there ought to have been amendments. I think the bill was fairly clear as it stood, but if amendments are required, what is the course you adopt in case of every other bill? What is the course you have adopted where hon. gentlemen say there may be something in a bill to which they object without objecting to the whole principle of the bill. They let the bill be read a second time. Let this bill go to committee, let it be amended there and changed and improved and made more clear where it is obscure, as you would do in the case of other bills. That is the usual practice. Why was that not done here? Why were not these men given that same fair play that you give to every body else? I remember not long ago—it will be perhaps unparliamentary to say when—a bill was before this House when hon. gentlemen suggested changes, in order that the suggestions and the objections to the measure might be considered in the committee. Why was not this referred to committee? Why did it not get a second reading in order that these amendments might be made which hon.

gentlemen thought necessary? Why is it? It is not said that the bill is vicious in principle, because if that were the objection the six months' hoist should be moved.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We can move it now if the hon. gentleman wants it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That would be the proper course, but if the hon. gentlemen are merely objecting to details, if they say the bill is obscure where it ought to be clear, then the proper course was to have read the bill a second time and sent it to the committee. The hon. gentlemen will see if they look at the English legislation on this subject the trade unions in what they have asked by this bill had not gone further than they have gone in England and further than the parliament of England has protected them in going. It does seem to me, that being the case, that my hon. friend is pursuing the proper course in asking to have this bill again put on the orders of the day for consideration at a date which he mentions, any member of the House can then, if he is opposed to the principle of the bill, move a six months' hoist. If hon. gentlemen object to the details and require them to be made more clear, then let the bill be read a second time and sent to the committee for consideration and revision and amendment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I desire to say that I am prepared to support the motion of the hon. gentleman from Victoria who has moved to restore this motion to the order paper, so that the bill may be fully discussed. I am of opinion that the bill should be placed on the order paper for the second reading. I must, however, differ entirely from the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Justice as to the analogy between this bill and the one recently before us, so far as the motion for the adjournment was concerned.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The effect was the same.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is not an hon. gentleman in the House who does not know that when the motion for adjournment was made in regard to the Hamilton Smith Bill, that it was intended that the debate on the second reading should be continued. It was only through inadvertence that a day was omitted to be fixed for the second reading of the bill, but I think the opinion of the House in regard to the bill now under consideration was practically that it should receive the hoist. I desire to say that my hon. friends who lead this House are entirely responsible for the defeat which this bill received on its second reading. The hon. Secretary of State undertook to introduce this bill to the House, and to then relieve the government from responsibility in regard to it. He was particularly anxious to place himself in the position of introducing the bill and of having the government accept the credit of the bill in the event of any credit being attached to it, but in the event of its not meeting with public favour he also placed himself in the position of being able to appeal to the Debates and divest the government of all responsibility.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend, I am sure, does not mean to put me in the wrong. The bill coming down as an amendment to the Act I supposed it was a government measure. Government bills often come to the Senate without my being aware of it. It was a departmental matter, and when I found I was wrong I explained to the House that I was in error, that I had never heard of the bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Of course, I accept the hon. gentleman's explanation, but it seemed to me to be rather inconsistent with freedom of responsibility upon this question that the representatives of trades unions should have an interview with the hon. Minister of Justice on this bill, and that it practically should have received his approval, that that approval should have been practically conveyed to the House in the statement made by the hon. Secretary of State, and that then my hon. friend should have stated to this House that the government was in no way responsible. The bill is practically a government measure. It is a public bill; it is such a bill as is invariably introduced by the government. It is a departure, and a very radical departure, from the policy embodied in the Act respecting Trade Marks and Industrial Designs, and it is therefore, a question as to whether the government is prepared to assume the responsibility for a serious departure of this nature. Hon. gentlemen who will look at that Act will at once perceive the policy of it to be that all manufacturers, as individuals, or corporate bodies manufacturing a particular article should have the right to say to the world: "This is our trade mark; this "is our design, we manufacture this parti- "cular article." Now the policy involved in the bill goes far beyond that. It involves this consideration: that a body of men may be enabled to say to the world, except the product of a manufacturer bears a design indicating that a particular class of labour is engaged in the manufacture of that product, then the public should not buy that article. Now it would be almost as logical to say that the product of a manufacturer should bear a design, indicating whether Conservatives or Liberals were engagad in that particular work, or white or coloured labour, as the case may be. However, I do not purpose discussing that phase of it now, because I am desirous, if this bill should come before the House again, that whoever is responsible for the introduction of it should state to the House the reason why there should be this departure from the Act which has long been upon the statute-book, the salutory principles of which have been recognized, but, as I say, now intended to be very seriously departed from. I therefore, with very great pleasure, so that every consideration shall be given to this bill, shall vote for the motion of my hon. friend from Victoria for the restoration of the bill to the order paper.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am responsible for this motion having come up again today in wording my resolution for having it postponed sine die as I did. I should have moved the three months' hoist. However, I wish to explain that the intention was that the question should not come up till next year, as I stated when I moved the resolution that there was no public opinion behind the bill, that the only public opinion we were aware of was a fight in the city of Toronto between the aldermen, which resulted in the passage of a by-law by a majority of one that the imprint of the trades unions should be put upon publications for which the city paid. The principle of this legislation is wrong in my opinion and I am strongly opposed to it. The origin of this legislation was in California. It was instituted there among the Trades Labour Unions in opposition to Chinese labour. They wished to designate the manufacture of cigars and that class of goods upon which Chinese labour was engaged in the manufacture of those articles. Now the same influence came from California and resulted in a bill being brought before the Congress of the United States in order to have the same principle of legislation extended over the whole of the United States. That was brought up some four or five years ago and was rejected as a bad principle; the legislation was refused. This legislation may have been put upon the statute-book in England, but the circumstances are different. There, labour works under free trade and it has to regulate its action to meet the world's competition; that prevents labour unions from taking any aggressive steps that will undermine their own means of livelihood, and they make co-operative industry the basis of their success, rather than attempting to institute a boycott on the customers of non-union labour or foreign competition. Now what is this principle of legislation? It is not a fight between the people of the country and the Chinese, but it is a fight between the trades unions and the non-union men. It is one class of our population against another class of our population. Is it fair for us, without any further evidence, without any expression of public opinion of any kind or description, that we should give that power by legislation to the trades union organization in order that they may oppress both the employers and the non-unionists themselves by means of the power which we put into their hands? They would be able to tell their families and friends that when they go to the stores they should not purchase that pair of boots, or that article, unless it has the trades union mark upon it. The effect of this legislation would be able to upset all the trade and the commerce of the country and convert manufacturing labour into a large monopoly in the absence of any other competition. Every man and every storekeeper would be frightened out of his life.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It would lead to boycotting.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, every store would be in danger of being boycotted—would have to choose whether they should keep in stock only goods produced by union labour or not. Is it, therefore, right for us to institute such a principle in this country without public opinion to justify it? It will spread to every town and city in the whole country. Of course, as far as the restoration of this motion to the paper is concerned, I have no desire to oppose the motion which has been made. We will only have the debate over again on Tuesday. It was my intention, when I moved that the debate be postponed sine die, that this matter should not be brought up until next year, so that the public might have time to give the subject consideration from a public standpoint. That is the use for which this Senate was constituted.

Hon. Mr BELLEROSE—It was voted as that the other day.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, and the majority was quite sufficient, although it was in a small House, and if the House had been larger I believe the majority would have been much greater.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—No doubt this bill will require a great deal of amendment, which can be done when it comes to the committee stage; but there is another point which seems to me important. The hon. Minister of Justice has proved that his bill is certainly a private bill—at least the reasons he gave convinced me that it was. But I should like to ask the opinion of the Speaker, if this is a private bill whether it can be passed now if it can be introduced as a public bill?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It seems to me in this debate that there is a misunderstanding with reference to the matter, and I think if the question were thoroughly understood the House would be in favour of a trade mark. I believe it is one great safeguard to trade. A trade mark such as "Coleman's Mustard," "Coleman's Ginger," "Coleman's Starch," etc., would be, in my opinion, a very good thing, because if you find that an article which bears a certain trade mark is not satisfactory, it is a protection to the public, and the next time we can refuse to take that article.

Several hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Hon. gentlemen need not laugh at that. I have had a little more experience in this matter than most members of this House, and as a commercial man I say I am in favour of putting trade marks on all packages of goods, and then the party who manufactures the most satisfactory article will get the trade. If these people who have ambition to put their trade mark on certain goods find that they cannot establish a reputation for those goods the trade mark would not amount to anything; on the contrary it would be a means of enabling people to shun the goods. Therefore, I cannot conceive why we should be against this measure. We know there are canned goods on every shelf in the stores of the country, and when a man goes to get canned goods he has to take the recommendation of the grocer, whereas if the trade mark was on he could select those he had found to be satisfactory in the past and shun those that he had found unfatisfactory.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Why not have two trade marks?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Yes; I don't care whether we have two or three trade marks; I can refuse things with one, two or three trade marks on. I think, on the contrary, that we ought to protect the good article, and we ought to be in favour of this measure. Of course we must guard it and see that there is no design to take advantage of the public or to take advantage of manufacturers, but I cannot see how they can be taken advantage of in the present case. For instance take a pair of boots and the trade mark is not on the boots.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Take anything.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Take a shirt.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—No one is objecting to that.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They have no right to mark their goods.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I say they have a right; and therefore, on the grounds which I have mentioned, I shall vote for giving these people the opportunity of putting a trade mark on the goods they produce. It does not follow that I am going to purchase those goods.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not going to prolong this discussion further than to point out that the hon. Minister of Justice has not read this bill, or if he has, he misunderstands it. There is no provision in this Act for the incorporation of any society.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand the hon. gentleman to have said, and those listening around me also understood him to have said, that it was for the incorporation of certain labouring men for the purpose of enabling them to have trades marks to designate the goods they manufacture. Now, there is no provision in the bill for such a purpose. If the hon. gentleman did not intend that, why, of course, I am not going to discuss it. If such were the case, and we were passing a bill to enable the working man to manufacture certain articles to put upon the market, and thereby put a trades mark on them, there would be no necessity for the measure, because the Act on the statute-book already provides for that. This bill—and I draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact—is not for the purpose of designating the quality or character of the article, or to prove to the public that it is the invention of certain persons, but is for the purpose of enabling men who belong to a trade union to put their mark upon an article to show that it was manufactured by them, and not as a voucher for the quality of the article.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—What is the difference?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—All the difference in the world. If the hon. gentleman invents an article and wants to make a fortune out of it, as I hope he would, then he could put his mark upon it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That would be his patent?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The patent is to enable him to manufacture exclusively, and he would put his trade mark on it under the provisions of the law now on the statute-book. The manufacturer of an article, no matter how he acquired the right to manufacture, can have a trade mark, provided it does not infringe any other trade mark, that would indicate the character of the article and the person by whom it was manufactured, provided he had the patent. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Dever) we will suppose, is placing on the market a certain article which he believes, and the public might believe, to be superior to any other article of the kind. He puts his trade mark upon it, which he has acquired under the statute, and I, employed by him to manufacture it for him, belonging to a trades union, could say to my hon. friend: "This cannot go into the market unless I put my mark upon it."

Hon. Mr. DEVER—What is the difference?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is this difference. The hon. gentleman who sits in front of him might manufacture the same article and the trades union might say, "you must only buy that article which has upon the face of it the trade mark of that particular union, and you must not buy the article that does not carry that trade mark."

Hon. Mr. DEVER—To whom does it say that?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—To the public and to the members of the trades union.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—And the public must submit!

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to convince the hon. gentleman that he is wrong in the view he has taken of the provisions of the bill.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The hon. gentleman cannot do it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I shall not waste any further time in the attempt. We will take the case of the Eddy Company, who are large manufacturers of a particular class of pail. That is the output of the firm, not the output of the workingmen. Mr. Eddy puts his trade mark on his pail. We know it is one of the best articles of the kind on the market, and we buy it. The men working for him say that, in addition to that, the pail must have a certain mark to indicate that it is made by certain persons belonging to a trades union. Another manufacturer alongside of him says no, I will not permit that. Then the trades union pass a resolution declaring that the members — I will not say the public—of the trades union, must not purchase any pail that does not have upon it the mark showing that it was manufactured by the members of that organization. That is what is intended. I am of exactly the opinion of the hon. gentleman from Marquette, that it is vicious in principle. If there is any working man who has an article superior to another, or who manufactures an article better than any other, let him put his trade mark upon it, but I say it is not a question of interest to the public, to the purchaser or consumer, who manufactures that article for him and for that reason I shall vote against the principle of the bill, on that ground apart from anything else.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The way I understand this matter is this; the bill was up the other day. It was not disposed of by a six months hoist, but simply laid over.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That was not the intention.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—When the hon. member from Victoria moved the adjournment of the debate on the bill introduced by the hon. gentleman from Calgary, the debate was adjourned, and there was a question if that bill could come up again. This bill is in very much the same position. The first step is to decide whether it should be put on the orders again. Then we can discuss the merits of the bill. We are now discussing the merits of the bill instead of discussing whether it should be restored to the order paper. If we place it on the order paper, we can deal with the merits next Tuesday. I shall certainly vote to have the Bill restored to the order paper.

The SPEAKER—The question raised is whether this is a public bill or a private bill. It seems to me that the bill, being an amendment to the Trade Mark and Design Act, which is a public Act, must necessarily be a public bill.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I move an amendment to the motion before the House that instead of this bill being placed on the order paper for a second reading next Tuesday it be read the second time six months hence.

Several Hon. MEMBERS—That is not in order.

THE LATE DALTON McCARTHY.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I beg the indulgence of the House while I make one or two observations upon an incident which has recently transpired by which the parliament of Canada has lost one of its most distinguished members, and the legal profession has been deprived of one of its greatest ornaments. I refer to the death of the late Mr. Dalton McCarthy, whose position in public and professional life was such as to justify, in my opinion, a brief reference thereto in this chamber. For three parliaments I was a colleague of Mr. McCarthy in the House of Commons, and in the earlier period of that association, when he was in active sympathy with the party to which he gave support, I was frequently brought into the closest professional and political relations with him. From the very outset I was impressed with the clearness and the completeness of his grasp of every subject which was presented for his consideration. How concisely, how clearly, how convincingly he presented his views is known to every one who ever heard him speak, for he expressed them as he entertained them, with sincerity and with earnestness and even when his arguments failed to carry conviction to the mind of his hearers, his perfect sincerity commanded their respect. In his profession Mr. McCarthy was at the very head. It is no disparagement to his confrères to say that he was conspicuous amongst the foremost of them all. He was conspicuous for his commanding ability; he was conspicuous for his great attainments; he was conspicuous for his indomitable zeal; he was conspicuous for his dauntless courage, and last, and best of all, he was conspicuous for the fidelity, which he showed to his clients and to whatever cause he espoused. But he has gone! He was borne down in the forefront of the battle of life in the maturity of his manhood and in the fulness of all his splendid powers. The fall of such a man is a loss that amounts to a calamity, for it is a loss not only to the public and the parliamentary life of the country, but it is a loss to the profession to which he belonged and a loss also to the citizenship of Canada. In the face of such a loss, in the presence of death, those of us who differed most widely from the views which Mr. McCarthy was constrained to adopt in the latter years of his life, views which he urged with such forceful pertinacity that they were largely instrumental in shaping the policy of the administration upon an important public question; at such a time and in such a presence, even those who suffered from the adoption of that policy, and who have been deprived of rights, which they considered most sacred, and which are most sacred, may fittingly allow the past to be covered with the broad mantle of charity and to unite in placing upon his bier a tribute of respect for the memory of the man. In that spirit, hon. gentlemen, I offer to the memory of the late Dalton McCarthy respectful homage, and I believe that I am voicing the sentiments of this chamber; I am voicing the sentiments of the country at large, in the expression of regret that his career, a career so full of achievement in the past, and a career that until the announcement of his death was so hopefully full of achievement for the future, has been brought to such an untimely end by an accident that is tragic in its incidents. I say, that I believe the country at large, independently of party and of political opinion, will lament the death of a man who was great in his profession and who, in the private walks of life, was a good citizen. He fought his fight manfully and in doing so, antagonized an important element in our population. But in the presence of death resentments may be silenced. He has gone to his last rest, and may he rest in peace.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suppose that it was my duty to have brought this matter under the attention of the House, but I understood, upon inquiry, that it had not been the practice, except in one instance (that of Sir John Macdonald) to discuss in this House the loss of members of the House of Commons, and that is my sole reason for not having referred to the matter before. I cordially subscribe to all that the hon. gentleman from Missisquoi (Mr. Baker) has said with regard to the great talents in his profession, and the great ability which the late Mr. McCarthy brought to the consideration of public questions. It did so happen that on almost every question which he brought under the attention of the House of Commons and which, in a large degree, arrested the public attention, that the opinions which I entertained upon those questions were different from those which he expressed, but I am sure that no one who sat in the House of Commons was capable of expressing with more clearness and precision, and enforcing with greater ability, the views which he entertained than the late member for North Simcoe. Mr. McCarthy had acquired distinction before he entered parliament at all in his profession, a profession which he loved, a profession to which he devoted himself with great ardour and perseverance and with extraordinary ability. To-day there is no one at the bar in the province of Ontario—and there are many men of eminence and great distinction at the Ontario bar—who occupied a higher place, or who enjoyed in a higher degree the confidence of those who required professional advice than Mr. McCarthy. There is no one who ever questioned the high integrity, the strict probity which on all occasions he brought to the consideration or to the discharge of his professional duties. In parliamentary life, of late years, Mr. McCarthy separated himself in a high degree from both the parties of the state; he threw off—if I may so express myself—what he regarded as the trammels of party, and whether his views be thought to be well or ill-founded, there can, in my opinion, be no doubt whatever that he sincerely subscribed to them and that he earnestly devoted himself to the maintenance of what he thought was just and right. In my opinion, if he had lived to longer continue in the service of the state, and had devoted his abilities to that service, he was likely to have attained a greater measure than he had in the past, the confidence of all classes of the community. Men's views broaden with experience. Men who devote themselves assiduously to the pursuit of one profession and give only the residue of their time to the consideration of public questions, some times become narrowed; but I have no doubt whatever, from my intercourse with Mr. McCarthy, that his views would have broadened the more he studied public questions, and the asperity which during a portion of his career he excited, would have, at no distance time, worn away, and he would have given to the service of the country, and not to any party, those great abilities which he possessed. I have, therefore, no hesitation is saying that I believe the country has sustained a very great loss in the death of Mr. McCarthy; and what he has hitherto done would have been but a very slight indication of what he would have been able to accomplish if he had withdrawn his abilities from his profession and devoted his attention to the service of the state. I am sure of this, that the bar has sustained a great loss in the death of Mr. McCarthy and that in parliament, if he had lived, he would have been of essential service.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I hope the House will bear with me for a few moments, as I have been for so many long years on terms of intimate friendship with Mr. McCarthy, and the members of his family, if I add a few words to what has been so eloquently said by the hon. senator from Missisquoi. I am aware, as has been stated by the hon. Minister of Justice, that it has not been usual in this House to take notice of the death of a member of the other House, and with the exception of one notable case, it has not, I believe, ever been done, yet it did seem to me (and I had a feeling of disappointment that no allusion was made to it by the leader of the government yesterday) that in the case of one who in the full vigour of life and with every prospect of a long and distinguished career and one too who was so well known to all of us, being so suddenly snatched away from amongst us, that perhaps it might form an exceptional case and be a very proper one of which some notice should be taken in this House. My hon. friend on my left has paid a most eloquent tribute to Mr. McCarthy's memory, and I feel very grateful myself, as a personal friend, for the manner in which the hon. Minister of Justice has also alluded to him and his career. The blank which Mr. McCarthy has left both in public and professional life I am sure we all feel is one which will not easily be filled. But the point I wish to call the attention of the House more to than anything else is what I consider one of the noblest traits in Mr. McCarthy's character; that is, whatever he did, he did from a strong conviction of right, and he had the courage to carry out those convictions and was never swayed by wrong or improper motives. His political life has been always clean, pure and upright, and we must all feel, I think, that to lose such a man from our public life and from the parliament of this country, is a very great misfortune. To his family his loss is irreparable and to those who had the advantage of Mr. McCarthy's friendship, and have known him for many long years his sudden death came as a very great shock. No man was more kind and generous, no man filled the duties of social life as a husband and father more thoroughly than did Mr. McCarthy. I am quite satisfied that not only in public life, but amongst all those who knew him, it will be many long years before the memory of Dalton McCarthy will have passed away.

LAKE BENNETT AND KLONDIKE RAILWAY AND TRAMWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being called—

Bill (31) "An Act to incorporate the Lake Bennett and Klondike Railway and Tramway Company, as amended."—(Hon. Mr. MacInnes.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved in amendment:

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be further amended as follows: In the amendment, after the words "White Horse Rapids," insert "and from Marsh Lake to the Hootalinqua River."

He said: I explained to some extent yesterday the desirability of this amendment being made, and also its object. I pointed out that it simply proposed, by the amendment, to give the company power to construct a road from Marsh Lake to the Hootalinqua River through a section of country not covered by any other charter, and being part of the public domain. I cannot see wherein any opposition can be raised to the amendment, as it in no way encroaches upon any other rights. The carrying out of it will be in the public interest and it is desired by the company.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION

INQUIRIES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to Call the attention of the government to the following statement given to the Canadian public at large by one of the members of the present administration, and in its name, on the 2nd day of May, 1898:—

EXTRACT from the Senate Debates, 2nd May, 1898, page 709, 2nd column—

"Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman must be aware that the present government have settled the School question with Manitoba.

"Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

"Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They adopted the same channels to settle the question as the late government did. The late government sent delegates to Manitoba and had a conference and failed to come to any agreement. The present government had a conference with representatives of the government of Manitoba and they came to an agreement, which was confirmed by the Manitoba legislature, and that is the end of it, so far as the public are concerned."

And inquired:

1. Is the agreement spoken of by the Honourable the Secretary of State an agreement that really is the end of the Manitoba school question, asserted by the government, or may it be considered as a beginning of justice?

2. If the Manitoba school question has been definitely and irrevocably settled, when did that final settlement take place?

3. If the Manitoba school question is not yet finally settled, and if what has been done up to date is to be considered merely as a beginning of justice, when will the remnant portion of justice, to which they are entitled, be bestowed to the Catholic minority of Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In answer to the first question, I know of no other agreement than the one I have fully explained, which was made by the province of Manitoba, and the settlement took place when they passed the statute approving of the concessions that were contained in that settlement. The third question, of course, is answered by my previous answer.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. minister is mistaken as to what I am asking in the first question. I am not asking if there is another agreement, but whether that agreement is the end of the Manitoba School Question, or only the beginning of justice.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That I am quite unable to say further than I have said. I cannot tell what will take place in the future. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Whether, since the commencement of the present session the government, or any one of the members of the present administration in the name or for the government, has received from the government of Manitoba, or from the Catholic minority of that province, or from the episcopate or any member thereof, any communication whatsoever, in the form of a demand, of a claim, of a protest, or otherwise, on the subject of the Manitoba school question ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My answer, so far as the government is concerned, is no ; and as far as I can gather from any of my colleagues, the answer is also no. I have asked the premier and other members who are likely to know.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to Direct the attention of the government to the publication made in L'Electeur of 8th May, 1896, of certain words professed to be uttered by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, at La Salle Jacques Cartier, in the city of Quebec, on the 7th May, 1896, which read as follows :—

(Translation from the French.)

"Do not misunderstand me as to my intentions, I repeat here, that I wish the minority in Manitoba to obtain entire justice. It is a principle written in letters of gold in the programme of my party that the rights of the minority must be respected. . .

"If the people of Canada bring me into power, as I have a conviction they will, I will settle this question to the satisfaction of all parties interested. I shall have with me in my government Sir Oliver Mowat, who has always been in Ontario, at the peril of his own popularity, the champion of the Catholic minority and of Separate schools. I will put him at the head of a commission where all the interests at stake shall be represented, and I affirm to you that I will succeed in satitfying those who are suffering at this moment. Is not Sir Oliver Mowat's name alone a guarantee of the success of this plan ?

"And then, finally, if conciliation does not succeed, I shall have to exercise that constitutional recourse which the law furnishes, a recourse which I shall exercise completely and entirely."

And asked :

1. Is this version published by L'Electeur a correct version, at least giving the substance of the declarations which were made by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the aforesaid occasion ?
2. If the version is not a faithful one, wherein does it sin against the truth, and which of the declarations reproduced in the account given by the L'Electeur does the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier repudiate because they do not express his view on the questions to which they relate ?
3. Did the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier really promise that Sir Oliver Mowat would be placed at the head of a commission where all the interests at stake in the school question should be represented ?
4. Did the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier really promise complete satisfaction for those who were at the moment suffering ?
5. Did the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier really promise to settle the school question to the satisfaction of all the parties interested, and to exercise, if necessary, in its fulness, the constitutional recourse which the law furnishes ?
6. If the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not make such promises, what are, in substance, at least, the promises which he then made and which could give reason for the interpretation given by L'Electeur of the 8th May, 1896 ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will say to my hon. friend I do not know that the prime minister made any of these statements to which he refers here, and which he quotes or professes to quote from L'Electeur. Now, my hon. friend has not questioned me with regard to any matter pending in parliament, or any question that is likely to be brought before parliament at this session. My hon. friend is putting a question with regard to what the prime minister said when a private member of the House of Commons, leading the Liberal party, at a meeting held May 7, 1896, in the province of Quebec. I dare say that the prime minister could not to-day say whether he spoke of all those matters in precisely the way in which he was reported. I understand that he did not. Now, my hon. friend will see that if he were to put questions of this sort with regard to what a minister said out of parliament before he was a minister, and in reference to matters which may have been at that time pending in parliament, and which are not pending now, he might put questions with regard to everything that a public man said during the whole period of his life up to the moment when the question was put ; my hon. friend could continue to frame questions of this sort, not only during the whole period that the session continues, but if he were to prepare himself beforehand he could fill up the orders of the day with a series of questions that would take up the whole day when those questions were reached to adequately answer. This is not a matter pending in parliament, but a matter which was dealt with two sessions ago by the government, or by some members of the government in conjunction with the government of Manitoba, and secured from the latter a settlement that was at the time accepted as a compromise, which may or may not be a finality—that may be determined by experience, for I do not suppose that the government will insist, or that any member of the government, or that any member of the opposition will insist with regard to this school question that a different rule shall be adopted to that which is applied to all other questions. Experience has shown that the doctrine of finality is sometimes a dangerous one. Men are imperfect; all the difficulties that surround a question may not present themselves at the moment, and experience may show that further consideration may be necessary. Now it may well be that further consideration will be given by the legislature where primarily the duty rests, so that this parliament may never be called upon, under any circumstances, to consider the question again. While I am ready to answer all questions relating to the practical business of parliament, so far as it is in my power to do so, I do not feel that it is necessary to answer all questions that my hon. friend can put with regard to a subject that has ceased to be a question of practical politics, for the time being, and is simply an academic question, and I trust that my hon. friend will see that in making this statement I mean certainly no discourtesy to him. But I do not think it necessary to submit this series of questions to the prime minister and obtain from him an accurate statement, to the best of his knowledge and recollection, of what he did say on that particular occasion. I do not see the bearing of that question on anything that is before this House, and, however gratifying that might be to my hon. friend, I do not think that this House will insist upon me taking up time to undertake to answer in minute detail the questions of this sort which he has put.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Do I understand that the hon. gentleman did or did not ask the prime minister? I did not catch his answer fully. Did the hon. minister say he would not trouble himself to inquire?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I did not say that. The hon. gentleman had this question up before, and my recollection is that on that occasion the words of the prime minister were "I have no recollection of what was said on the occasion referred to."

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken in what he has just related, because the first time I put the question on the order paper, I dropped it before getting any answer, because I did not want to put before the House a controvertible fact in assuming that the words I quoted had been really pronounced. I withdrew the question and framed it in this way, but I had no answer to the question as first framed. The answer was refused. The hon. minister gave no answer or, if he gave one, we did not hear it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If it is any satisfaction to my hon. friend, he may let the question stand on the paper. I will bring the question as it stands under the notice of the prime minister.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am satisfied.

The notice was allowed to stand.

ABSENCE OF THE MEMBERS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to inquire of the government:

1. In the course of the year 1897, did the prime minister, or any member of the present administration, make a voyage or several voyages to Europe, to the United States or elsewhere?
2. What are the names of the members of the administration who thus absented themselves from the country?
3. How long did the absence of each of these members of the administration last, specifying as to the prime minister the dates of his departure from and of his return to the country?
4. What was the mission or object of the voyage of each of the members of the administration who so absented themselves?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My answer to the first question is:

1. Yes.

2. The premier, Sir Louis Davies, Mr. Blair, Mr. Fielding, Mr. Dobell and Sir Richard Cartwright.

3. The prime minister from the 3rd June to the 27th August, and later, in the month of November, one week in Washington.

4. The premier left on June 3rd to attend the Jubilee celebration in London. He was absent one week in Washington discussing the Behring Sea regulations with the Washington authorities. Sir Louis Davies went to England to discuss with the law officers the question whether the Belgian and German treaties applied to Canada; also to assist in the preparation of the argument of the fishery case before the Privy Council, between the Dominion and the provinces.

Sir Louis Davies attended at Washington to discuss the question of Behring Sea regulations.

Sir Richard Cartwright visited Washington with Sir Louis Davies to discuss general questions affecting Canada in reference to relations with the United States.

Mr. Blair visited England, and his visit was of a private nature, and was not taken at the expense of the country.

Mr. Fielding visited England in connection with the recent loan.

Mr. Dobell visited England in connection with the fast line.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Did the hon. gentleman mention Mr. Fitzpatrick?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; he is not a member of the government.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am not asking as to members of the government; I am asking as to members of the administration.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He is not a member of the administration.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He is not a member of the administration?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Fitzpatrick is the solicitor general. He is not a member of the cabinet.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am not asking that. I am asking as to the members of the administration.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes; he is a member of the administration.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then I have not the proper answer.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think he has been in England, too.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would rather have the motion stand, so that I can get the correct answer.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will ascertain the fact. I have answered the rest.

TORONTO AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being called:

Third Reading Bill (77) "An Act to incorporate the Toronto and Hudson Bay Railway Company," as amended.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved:

That the bill be not now read a third time, but that it be further amended by inserting the following words after the word "company," in the nineteenth line of the 10th section, "the James Bay Railway Company."

The motion was agreed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the third reading I desire to move some further amendments, to which the parties interested in this bill have agreed. Mr. Grier, who appeared for the city of Toronto, and also Col. Tisdale, who appeared on behalf of the company now in existence, consented to these changes. The amendments which I propose to make are in accordance with the suggestions made by the law clerk during the discussion of this question in committee. As pointed out to the parties interested by the law clerk of the Senate, if the bill was allowed to pass as reported, it would give no powers whatever to the company intended to be incorporated by this Act, and they mutually agreed that no action could be taken by the city of Toronto, and those interested in the Act before the Senate till the time which the present company in existence was allowed for the commencement and construction of the road should have expired, or an arrangement entered into by the incorporators of this company and those of the companies now in existence. The 18th clause reads: "This Act and the operations thereof shall be suspended for the period of two years," etc. The suggestions which were made by the law clerk, and have been accepted by both parties interested, make the 18th clause practically read as follows:

The operations of sections 4, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, shall be suspended for the period of two years.

That is the period during which the corporators of the companies now in existence shall have to commence their lines, and in case they should fail then this company would come into operation. It will be observed by those who have taken an interest in it, that the tenth clause is not rendered inoperative under the amendment which I propose to make, and that the tenth clause simply gives to the present corporators the power and right to enter into negotiations with certain existing companies, and in the forty-fifth line the words "thereof" would be left out, and the words "of the said sections" inserted in lieu thereof. In the third subsection of the eighteenth clause the words "notwithstanding anything contained in this section the corporate existence of this company shall subsist for the purpose of negotiation with the James Bay Railway Company, and the Nipissing and James Bay Railway Company, and for the purpose of becoming parties," are struck out and the following inserted in lieu thereof:

The company may become parties to and entitled to enforce any agreement which may be made between the James Bay Railway Company and the Nipissing and James Bay Railway Company, or between either of the said parties, etc.

The different companies are enumerated in order to avoid the possibility of mistake. Consequently it reads:

Any agreement which may be come to between the James Bay Railway Company and the Nipissing and James Bay Railway Company or between either of the said railway companies or with the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or either of them.

The House will observe that these amendments simply suspend the powers of the company to go on with works of any kind, but a corporate existence is given to the company which will enable it to enter into negotiations and effect an arrangement for an amalgamation of the companies mentioned therein for the purpose of the construction of the road. I think hon. gentlemen will see that they render the bill plainer, and as both these parties have agreed to them, I move that the amendments be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would the hon. gentlemen be kind enough to say which sections are mentioned in the beginning of the amendment that he has just read?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It reads thus: "The operation of sections, 4 11, 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16 of this Act," which in fact are all the clauses less those incorporating the company and the 10th clause which gives them power to enter into the negotiations.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am very glad that the hon. gentleman proposes to move this amendment, because without the amendments which are now proposed, the bill would not have effected the objects of the promoters. I would, however, respectfully suggest to the hon. gentleman that he should first move, and I have no doubt that the unanimous consent of the House could be obtained for that purpose, that the 71st rule be suspended.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— I move that rule 71 be suspended, so far as relates to this bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (D) "An Act for the relief of James Pearson."—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (105) "An Act respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway Company," as amended.—(Hon. Mr. Bellerose.)

Bill (69) "An Act respecting the Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company."—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

SAFETY OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AND PASSENGERS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (4) "An Act further to secure the safety of railway employes and passengers." He said:—This bill, as it comes to us, is what remains of a measure which was introduced some years ago, for the first time, in the House of Commons, and it passed that House in its present truncated form, so to speak, this session. The portions of the original measure which were peculiarly objectionable to the railway companies have been stricken out, and, as I understand, there is now nothing in the bill to which the railway companies seriously object; and the provisions which remain in the bill are calculated to be of value in the direction of saving the lives and limbs of railway employes and passengers. The first clause provides that two years after it is made to appear to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, that a satisfactory device for connecting air-brakes is in existence, all cars shall be provided with an automatic device in the hose coupling of such air-brakes or in the train pipe, so arranged that after the cars are coupled, the connection between such brake and the air pump on the locomotive cannot be broken or the couplings disarranged, accidentally or otherwise, without the knowledge of the engineer. The only portion of the Act which goes into operation immediately is that all box-freight cars built for use on Canadian railways hereafter shall be of a uniform standard height of draw-bar from the top of the rail, and shall be provided for the security of railway employes with outside and end ladders on opposite corners of each car, projecting below the frame of the car and with one step or rung of the ladder below such frame. Such standard height and such ladders to be subject to the approval of the Minister of Railways and Canals. The bill, as originally introduced, provided that this clause should apply to cars already built, and that they should be so altered as to comply with the provisions of the bill. That portion of the clause has been omitted. The remainder of the bill simply imposes a penalty for the violation of the Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does this bill go into operation immediately it becomes law?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, the second clause provides that the box cars shall be built in future as described in the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Strictly speaking this, being a public bill, should go to a Committee of the Whole House, but inasmuch as the subject of the bill is one which could be more satisfactorily discussed in the Railway Committee, I think it would be better to send the bill to the Railway Committee in the first instance, and I therefore move that it be referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours.

The motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT HARBOURS, PIERS AND BREAKWATERS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (135) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting Government Harbours, Piers and Breakwaters." He said: In the maritime provinces it is found there are many wharfs where the receipts are very small, perhaps ten, twenty or fifty dollars, and this bill provides that where the annual receipts are less than $100 the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may lease it to the municipality for a term not exceeding three years.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I would call the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to the fact that in Prince Edward Island there are no municipalities and there are many wharfs from which the receipts are very small indeed. I should think the bill would be more applicable to that province than to any other.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Are there no municipal divisions?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—None except in cities and towns.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are some county organizations are there not?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will call the attention of the department to the matter, and it can be amended in committee if necessary.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (136) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Protection of Navigable Waters."—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

Bill (104) "An Act respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company."—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (120) "An Act respecting the North American Telegraph Company."—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (119) "An Act to incorporate the Dawson City and Victoria Telegraph Company."—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

ALIEN LABOUR LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS introduced Bill (O) "An Act to amend Chap. 11 of the Statutes of 1897, intituled 'An Act to restrict the importation and employment of aliens.'"

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Explain.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no provision in the Act as it stands for proof of what the law is in another country, and it is necessary to provide some simple, ready and inexpensive means of proof. I propose by the bill to provide that the copy of an Act of a foreign country, in the print of the press of the government, will be sufficient evidence of what the law is in that country, without going to the trouble of getting a copy under the seal of the country, or without the necessity of calling in a foreign expert to prove what the law is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would not a copy of the Statutes of the foreign country be sufficient?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is precisely what the bill provides. It may be a copy of the individual Act, or a volume of their statutes.

The bill was read the first time.

TRANSPORTATION OF STORES AND GOODS TO THE YUKON.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) inquired:

1. Were any of the stores and goods to be forwarded to the Yukon by Boston and Alaska Transportation Company for the Dominion Government purchased in the United States? If so, to what value and of what character?
2. Were any of the stores and goods to be forwarded in the same way and for the same purpose purchased in the Dominion? If so, in what place and to what value?
3. With whom was the contract made for the carrying such stores and goods from the place of purchase to their destination?
4. Are such stores and goods as are purchased in Canada to be shipped from United States ports, and how carried to such ports?
5. Were tenders asked for for the transportation of these stores and goods?
6. Are there not steamers enough, ocean and river, in British Columbia to carry Government stores and goods from ports in that province to the Yukon at as low a rate of freight as by the vessels of any other country?
7. How many tons of stores and goods are to be transported by the Boston and Alaska Transportation Company to the Yukon?
8. How many tons are to be forwarded by vessels of the Dominion to the same place?
9. What is the rate of freight per ton to be paid the aforesaid Boston Company for transporting stores and goods from a United States port to the Yukon?
10. What is the rate per ton freight to be paid to any Dominion Company for the same service?
11. What was the rate per ton asked by any Dominion Company for the service to be performed by the Boston and Alaska Transportation Company?
12. Does the Government deem it patriotic or just to our own people to purchase products in another country which could be had in the Dominion at equal prices, and to employ the vessels of another country in the transportation of its stores and goods, thereby diverting the legitimate trade of the country to its injury, and building up the trade of another and a rival country?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—To the first question the answer is none; except in so far as the government contractors, Messrs. H. N. Bate and Sons and the Hudson Bay Company, may have purchased in the United States. If they did purchase them from the United States or any other foreign country of course, they paid the duties upon them. I do not know that they did so. To the second question the answer is: Outside of the stores purchased from the two contractors above mentioned, which were all food supplies, the whole of the stores forwarded were purchased within the Dominion of Canada. To the third question the answer is: For the goods purchased from Messrs. H. N. Bate and Sons and the Hudson Bay Company, their contracts called for the delivery of the stores to the Boston and Alaska Transportation Company on the Pacific coast, either at Seattle or Vancouver as the case might be. The contract for the carriage of the stores was, therefore, made with the Boston and Alaska Transportation Company in this case from Seattle or Vancouver, respectively, to Fort Selkirk.

With regard to the goods purchased other than from the two firms mentioned above, amounting to about 50 tons, by weight, a contract was made with the Grand Trunk Railway Company for delivery at Seattle. To the fourth question the answer is: Stores and goods, to the extent of about 100 tons by weight were purchased partly in Canada and partly for delivery by the firms abovementioned, place of purchase not known, to be delivered at Seattle to the Boston and Alaska Transportation Company. Stores and goods to the extent of about 150 tons, place of purchase not known, presumably Canada, are to be shipped at Vancouver by the same transportation company.

With regard to the last portion of the question; such goods as were delivered to the department in Eastern Canada were carried to Seattle by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The choice of the other routes is in the hands of the contractors who tendered for delivery on the coast. It is not known definitely by what route these goods have gone, but it is understood that a large proportion have gone by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, probably 200 tons.

To the fifth the answer is Yes. To the six question the answer : is I am not aware that any Canadian firm is in a position to transport stores through from Vancouver to Dawson City or Fort Selkirk. Certainly none tendered at a lower rate than that accepted by the government. To the seventh question the answer is, 250 tons.

To the eighth question the answer is : None, but a weight of 100 tons is accompanying the force proceeding to the Yukon, which is being conveyed entirely in Canadian vessels and by Canadian contractors.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—By the Stikine River, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, by the Stikine River. To the ninth question the answer is : $300 per ton from Vancouver or Seattle to Fort Selkirk. To the tenth question the answer is : there is no Dominion company doing the same service. To the eleventh question the answer is : If Davidge & Co. of Victoria are a Canadian company their rate to Dawson City was $275 per ton, while the rate accepted by the government was $200 per ton to that place. Then to the twelfth question I do not know what answer my hon. friend expects. I may say that the government did not purchase anything in a foreign country. Their contract was with Canadian firms, the Hudson Bay Company and H. N. Bate & Son. That the government, once having entered into a contract with them, could prevent them purchasing a portion of their supplies abroad, I suppose my hon. friend will not maintain, especially if the purchase made any material difference in the price of the goods to the public. Then with regard to the other portion of the question, "does the government deem it patriotic or just to employ the vessels of another country in the transportation of the stores and goods?"—well, the government do when they are unable to secure vessels of their own. I understand that in this case many companies were applied to, and the names of the vessels that could enter into the service were asked for, and no names were given and no satisfactory tenders were made. In fact, at the present time, as I understand it, those parties who are building or fitting out steamers upon the western coast of this country were not yet prepared to enter into this contract or to engage in the transportation. They may be able to do so at a later period, but they were not able to do so at the time the government sought these tenders.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I have to thank the hon. minister for his very clear and concise answer to the questions which I have asked. My first notice of this matter was in a Seattle newspaper rejoicing over the Dominion government casting a slur on the town of Vancouver and Victoria as not being the proper place to buy stores and get supplies and establishing Seattle as the base of supply for the Yukon. When I saw that, I thought I should ask those questions and it is quite clear, from the answers given, that a large portion of those stores have been bought in another country and not in Canada. Bate and Company should have been prevented from doing this in the contract given to them. Now, with regard to there being no vessels to carry supplies to the Yukon, I am informed that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were perfectly competent and had the vessels at their disposal to carry those goods. They have now three river steamers and two splendid ocean steamers. They were perfectly prepared to carry up these stores, but they were not asked for a bid or an offer to do so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They were.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I see also, that the rate of freight allowed is simply enormous.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say the Canadian Pacific Navigation Co.?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I say that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were prepared with their steamers to carry these stores from Vancouver or Victoria to the Yukon—I do not know how far up—probably Fort Selkirk. And mentioning Fort Selkirk, reminds me that we were told, by a gentleman who was formerly in the Mounted Police, Dr. Wills, that Fort Selkirk will be inaccessible in winter—that Dawson City might be swept out and captured and the whole country carried away before you could communicate with Fort Selkirk. Whether a road can be made I do not know. The hon. member from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) will be able to substatiate what I said as to Dr. Wills saying it is inaccessible, and that the troops ought to be stationed near Dawson City to be of any use at all. I deprecate very much, and I am sure this House must, that it should be found necessary to go to a foreign country to procure and carry those supplies to the Yukon Territory. Every rescource in our own country ought to be exhausted, and if it was found that there was no company or person able to undertake this work of transportation of supplies, there would be no objection to giving other people the work.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think that was the rule adopted.

THE DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I should like to ask again the question which has been standing on the order paper for a long time:

1. Whether they will, during the present session, introduce legislation to ratify the agreement made with the Grand Trunk Railway bearing date the 1st February, 1898, and lately laid before parliament?
2. Whether the government will, during the present session, introduce legislation to authorize the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, or confirm an agreement for the purchase of the same?

When I asked this question before, the leader of the House told me that this subject had not been considered by the government I presume that at this stage of the session, the government have decided what legislation they propose to adopt, and I hope the hon. leader of the House will be able to give me a definite answer.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say that I am not able, that the subject has not been considered, and until the subject has been considered, I shall be unable to answer my hon. friend's question.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION

INQUIRIES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to direct the attention of the government to the publication made in L'Electeur of 8th May, 1896, of certain words professed to be uttered by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier at La Salle Jacques Cartier, in the city of Quebec, on the 7th of May, 1896, which read as follows:

(Translated from the French.)

Do not misunderstand me as to my intentions, I repeat here, that I wish the minority in Manitoba to obtain entire justice. It is a principle written in letters of gold in the programme of my party that the rights of the minority must be respected.....

If the people of Canada bring me into power, as I have a conviction they will, I will settle this question to the satisfaction of all parties interested. I shall have with me in my government Sir Oliver Mowat, who has always been in Ontario, at the peril of his own popularity, the champion of the Catholic minority and of separate schools. I will put him at the head of a commission where all the interests at stake shall be represented, and I affirm to you that I will succeed in satisfying those who are suffering at this moment. Is not Sir Oliver Mowat's name alone a guarantee of the success of this plan?

And then, finally, if conciliation does not succeed, I shall have to exercise that constitutional recourse which the law furnishes, a recourse which I shall exercise completely and entirely."

And I beg to ask:

1. Is this version published by L'Electeur a correct version, at least giving the substance of the declarations which were made by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurer on the aforesaid question?
2. If the version is not a faithful one, wherein does it sin against the truth, and which of the declarations reproduced in the account given by L'Electeur does the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier repudiate because they do not express his views on the questions to which they relate?
3. Did the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier really promise that Sir Oliver Mowat would be placed at the head of a commission where all the interests at stake in the School Question should be represented?
4. Did the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier really promise complete satisfaction for those who were at the moment suffering?
5. Did the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier really promise to settle the School Question to the satisfaction of all the parties interested, and to exercise if necessary, in its fulness the constitutional recourse which the law furnishes?
6. If the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not make such promises, what are, in substance at least, the promises which he then made and which could give reason for the interpretation given by L'Electeur of the 8th May, 1896?

I should like to know if the hon. minister has seen the premier and is now in a position to answer my questions?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I might say to my hon. friend that the prime minister is unable to recall what was said on that occasion. He cannot say whether the report made was a correct report, and so, it is not in my power to gratify my hon. friend's curiosity.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know who is the hon. know-nothing member of this cabinet, but I should like to have the third, fourth and fifth questions answered, and I should think it would be easy even for the prime minister to answer them. I ask the government :

3. Did the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier really promise that Sir Oliver Mowat would be placed at the head of a commission where all the interests at stake in the School Question should be represented ?

Surely the hon. prime minister is able to recollect if he made such a promise or not ? The Hon. Minister of Justice ought to be able to answer that question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—With all deference to my hon. friend, I do not think I ought to be able to answer the question, because there is no public question under the consideration of this House that would call upon me answering that question or to which that question has any special relevancy.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister is quite mistaken ; if this Manitoba School Question is not a public question, I do not know where he could find a more public question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So is the fall of Jerusalem.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The constitution has been violated ; the judgment of the Privy Council declares so. The hon. Prime Minister went through all the provinces before the last election, promising to restore the rights of the minority. If those rights have not been restored, it is a public question to see whether the constitution shall be vindicated and whether the rights of the minority shall be restored to them, and as long as that question is not definitely settled in the way of justice it is a public question. The hon. minister has no right to evade the question by saying that there is no such question before the House and country. At all events, the Prime Minister should know if he made such a promise or not. Questions four and five are questions that the government should answer for the same reason. If the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Prime Minister, tried to settle the question by an agreement with Manitoba, and if that agreement does not give to the minority all the rights to which they are entitled, then comes this question five—will he have recourse to the law ?

Hon. MILLS—What law ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. Minister of Justice asks me "what law" ? Has the Minister of Justice not read the constitutional law ? Has he not read the law incorporating Manitoba into the Dominion ? Does he not know that there is a law existing which provides that any question of the kind which cannot be settled in the province and comes here to be settled by way of an appeal must be settled in a certain way ? He might put the question to the Prime Minister if he knows the law and the constitution, I should like the hon. Minister to answer at least these three questions. If he cannot say that the version of the Premier's speech given in L'Electeur is correct or not—if the two years which have elapsed since those promises were made is too long a period to permit the Prime Minister or any member of the Cabinet to know if that promise was made or not, at least Sir Wilfrid Laurier might remember if he made such a promise, whether correctly reported in L'Electeur or not. If he made the promise, why not answer yes ; if he did not make the promise can he not answer no ? Did he make such a promise ? If he made it and cannot keep it, what is the excuse ? Is it for the public good ? Is the hon. Minister unable to answer ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has the floor.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And can keep it as long as he likes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am asking the hon. minister if the Prime Minister made such a promise ? Cannot the hon. minister answer one of the three questions ? I give him a choice ; surely he can answer one if he cannot answer the three. No answer at all ? Are the ministers afraid to answer ? Are they ashamed to answer ? Mute ! Well, I think that is not an enviable position for a minister ! Cannot answer ! Unable to answer on the question that brought them to power—unable ! surely the hon. minister ought to be able ! Let him make an effort ! What is the answer I should get ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not like to disregard the rules of the House. My hon.

friend occupies the floor and calls upon me for an answer. When my hon friend gets through, if I see proper I shall answer.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister rose to make this remark ; why did he not answer then? He got up! Where is the answer? I sat down and gave him the floor: where is the answer? Does he want me to sit down again? I will give him a chance if he wants me to do so.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Allow me—

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Oh, here is a new minister!

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I wish to make a few remarks on the questions the hon. gentleman has put to the government. He has declared that the constitution has been violated—that a judgment of the Privy Council has decided so. There is a decision of the Privy Council declaring that the constitution was not violated. That is the first. The second judgment said that the minority had a grievance. Now, it is claimed by the leader of the government that the grievance has been redressed. The superintendent of the separate schools of Manitoba, Rev. Mr. Cherrier, published a letter over his signature in a newspaper, La Presse of Montreal, last winter, declaring that there were at the time twenty-five Catholic schools working under the system of public schools to the satisfaction of the minority.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—I rise to a question of order. Discussion is useless in this case. There is no necessity to know how many schools in the North-west are good or bad. There are differences of opinion on that subject. There are differences of opinion in the other provinces on the subject of education. If the hon. gentleman thinks that on a simple question to a minister he can raise the whole question, he is entirely out of order. If the minister does not wish to answer, I think it is very presumptuous for a private member to undertake to answer for him.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—On the question of order, I should like to say this: I was here when the same question was raised by the hon. member on the other side last week or the week before. It was declared by the Speaker that other remarks could be made on questions put to a minister. Now, I do not want to address this House irregularly, but I thought when there were absolutely gratuitous, unfounded statements made by the hon. gentleman who supplemented his questions in that way, it was my duty to correct them. Of course, I do not want to express an opinion on the point of of order raised. As I know the tenacity which distinguishes the hon. member from Stadacona, I have no doubt that I will have an opportunity to put before the House the remarks I was about to make.

THE SPEAKER—I hope hon. gentlemen see how desirable it is to have some rule to guide the Senate under circumstances such as have arisen to-day. I am sorry to say that this discussion is not creditable to the Senate, and I hope the Senate will help me to frame some rule to prevent its repetition. I said the other day that, in my opinion, when a minister declared that he had given the only answer he could give, and could not give any more—when he claimed that he had answered the question, it is entirely out of order to comment on the refusal of the minister to give a further reply. I hope the Senate will find some way to put an end to such discussions.

ABSENCE OF MEMBERS OF THE ADMINISTRATION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government—

1. In the course of the year 1897, did the Prime Minister, or any member of the present administration, make a voyage or several voyages to Europe, to the United States or elsewhere?
2. What are the names of the members of the administration who thus absented themselves from the country?
3. How long did the absence of each of these members of the administration last, specifying as to the Prime Minister the dates of his departure from and of his return to the country?
4. What was the mission or object of the voyage of each of the members of the administration who so absented themselves?

May I ask the government if they are now ready to supplement the answer given yesterday, as far as the Solicitor General, the Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick, is concerned?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am advised, in answer to the first and second questions, that he made one trip to Europe last year and was absent about six months. The object of his visit to Europe was to assist in the argument on the Fisheries question before the Judical Committee of the Privy Council, in addition to other cases before the Privy Council.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN moved :

That when the Senate adjourns on Wednesday, 18th instant, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, the 25th instant, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It has not been customary to adopt these resolutions without some expression of opinion from the government, and I think at this stage of the session, when there is a good deal of work before the House, it is more necessary than at an earlier stage that we should have some expression from the government.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I entirely agree with what has been said by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I think at this stage of the session we ought to know from the government whether an adjournment would interfere with the public business. It is quite true that we lose only two days, but it is equally true—I speak for myself—that we are in ignorance as to how long the session will last. General reports say that the government and the opposition in the other House are equally anxious to bring the session to a close, and it is probable that each day will bring us a good deal of work from the other House. I do not think it would be in the interest of the Senate that members should be absent when work is to be done. I have never been one of those who carped at these motions for adjournment when there was nothing to be lost by them, but near the close of the session the matter stands in a different position altogether.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I think this is a matter which rests entirely with the members of the government. The leader of the government might tell us what they are going to send up from the other House, either the Plebiscite bill or any other bills, and then we can see what there is for us to do. If there is business to be done I think we should not adjourn. We must all feel that we have been wasting time during the last two weeks and doing nothing. I don't know of anything that has been done during the last two weeks that has been of benefit to the country.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We have passed fifty bills the last week.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—What kind of bills?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Good bills.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—So far as the Senate is concerned, no harm would result from adopting the motion of the hon. gentleman regarding the postponement. The Bills before us seem to be pretty well disposed of, and if the current reports are correct, I certainly have an impression quite different from that of the hon. gentleman who last spoke; the opinion generally prevalent is that the session would not close until the latter part of June, or possibly the first part of July, and that view is confirmed by the statement which the hon. leader of the House made today, that the government had not yet decided, or even considered whether they should bring down legislation regarding the Drummond County Railway. My object in rising was to say this, that I think the proposed adjournment cannot retard the business, and I know there is a feeling among members from the maritime provinces, that they would like this adjournment long enough to enable them to go home, as some of them have important private business to look after, and if this adjournment could be extended to two weeks, it would enable them to do so.

Several hon. MEMBERS—No, no.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—If we are correct in the impression that the session must last to the end of June, if we take this adjournment it will leave ample time for the Senate to consider the Plebiscite Bill, the Franchise Bill and any other bill which may come up from the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to the hon. gentleman that the Franchise Bill is before the House, that it stands for the third reading, and has been delayed from day to day to meet the wishes, I think, of the leaders of the opposition in that House. The government have been all along prepared to move that third reading, and it is out of deference to some of those who wish further opportunity for consideration that the third reading has not yet been moved. I apprehend that as that is a bill that specially concerns the other House, there will perhaps be no very long discussion upon it here. Then there is the Plebiscite Bill, I understand many hon. gentlemen are very anxious for an opportunity to give it their support.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say the same thing with regard to that. It is not a measure to which, as it is regarded by the government, my hon. friends opposite will be disposed to offer any opposition. I may say to my hon. friends that I propose tomorrow introducing a bill for the government of Yukon territory. My hon. friends know that there is not likely to be anything in that bill of a controversial character. We have the government in the North-west Territories, but this territory is too far away to be left under the control of the government of the North-west Territories, and a simple machinery to serve the present purpose, on the lines of the former legislation on the subject of the North-west Territories, will be submitted in that bill, so that as it is short and simple in its provisions, and, following in the way that has been trodden before by the House of Commons and the Senate, I do not apprehend that that bill will be a cause of any serious delay. Then there was a bill placed in my hands some time ago, but which I have held for reconsideration by some of the parties interested, relating to loan companies, to give them an opportunity of uniting where they desired to unite and become incorporated under an Act of Parliament. That is not in the ordinary sense a government measure. It is simply a measure from which the government do not dissent, which is important, and for which responsi bility may be taken. If hon. gentlemen will further its passage through this House, then of course it will carry. If they think the period too late in the session to press the bill, it will be printed and distributed and will be before the country for consideration till we meet again.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Whichever course on the whole the House may feel disposed to take. My hon. friend has alluded to the Drummond County Railway Act and he says that that matter has not been before parliament and that it is getting late in the session.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I said that it had not been considered by the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Well that is perfectly true—not considered in the sense of coming to a final conclusion. A bill on that subject was before this House, and I think that less than a day was spent over it, and whatever conclusion the House will come to, from the very nature of a measure of that sort—not complicated, not abstruse in its character, easily comprehended, so that a judgment may be readily formed on it—if the government should see proper to bring it forward, it is not likely to occupy a very long period, so that I do not see anything to necessitate the long delay of which my hon. friend has spoken in reaching the end of the session. I hope that the end will be reached at a very early day. In fact, my hon. friends opposite know well that at the present time the country is far more interested in the conflict between our neighbours and the government of Spain than they are in the proceedings in this House, and at the present time, not being able very closely to interest them, there is no great object on either side in remaining here longer than necessary for the actual discharge of the public business in a business-like way. I would say to my hon. friend that I am not prepared to express an opinion with regard to the proposed adjournment, and I will ask my hon. friend to let that motion stand till to-morrow. There will be no difficulty in adjourning over Friday. Friday is the only day of this week we would lose, and as far as my hon. friend beside me (Hon. Mr. Scott) and myself are concerned, we would be fully able to occupy our time in getting business ready for the consideration of this House, but we would lose Monday.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Throw in Monday too.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is anxious to get away early, and if he would like the session to last a little longer for the sake of having the Queen's Birthday spent at home, he would take the view of my hon. friend, who has made this motion, but I am sure the House will agree with my suggestion to let this matter stand till to-morrow, and I shall be able to answer definitely

The motion was allowed to stand.

BONDING PRIVILEGES TO CANADIAN GOODS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to direct the attention of the members of the government to an item in the Citizen in reference to certain concessions purporting to have been made by the United States government for the transportation of goods into the Yukon District. It reads as follows :

"The Customs Department has received a copy of the United States treasury regulations respecting the Port of Wrangel on the Stikine. It permits the transhipment of Canadian goods and passengers at Wrangel, under customs supervision of United States officials, and the temporary landing of passengers, but not of goods, on the Stikine in American territory. The Alaska Bill, which was signed by the President Saturday, grants unconditional bonding privileges to Canadian goods for the Yukon at all ports in Alaska.

I should like to ask whether the information in this paragraph has been received by the government, and if so, considering its great importance to those who are transporting goods and passengers, whether the full text of the regulations to which this refers will be laid before parliament at an early day, and also the information contained in the bill alluded to in this paragraph ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Especially with reference to the unconditional bonding privileges.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. I understand that to mean the same system that prevails in allowing goods to be bonded at any of the Atlantic coast ports to come through Canada or any portion of the Dominion. That is the interpretation I would put on the word unconditional. However, the minister will, I am sure, concur in the view I have taken, that this concession is of a very important character, and the sooner all parties interested become acquainted with the full term of it, the better.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I entirely agree with my hon. friend. I have seen the paragraph n the paper to which he refers, and I intended to have spoken to the Minister of Customs in regard to it, but other business coming before my attention it went out of my mind. I agree that it is very desirable that this information should be given to the public and should be as widely known as possible. I have no doubt whatever of its accuracy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman will inquire and let us know to-morrow ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not wish to be considered importunate, but as the session is drawing to a close I should like to have this return for which I moved about twelve months ago, and the reason why I am a little persistent in asking for these returns, is that they are very voluminous and it is not usual for the Printing Committee to publish the whole of a retrun of that character, it not being considered necessary to publish the information which we desire to have, but they are, as a rule, referred to a special committee to eliminate all that is considered unimportant and to have a synopsis of it. In regard to the motion I made last year, we have no return from the Railways and Canals Department neither has the Senate any return from the Public Works Department.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly my hon. friend is entitled to the returns and I cannot say why they are not brought down.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will you try to find out?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I shall endeavour to.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the hon. gentleman not to forget me also. I asked for a few returns last year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is impossible that the hon. gentleman could be forgotten.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But I am forgotten, because I did not get the returns.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was the return that was forgotten and not the hon. gentleman.

THIRD READING.

Bill (127) "An Act further to amend the Fisheries Act."—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

ADULTERATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (72): "An Act further to amend the Adulteration Act."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to the House that subsection marked "8" is new.

8. If it is so coloured or coated or polished or powdered that damage is concealed, or if it is made to appear neither or of greater value than it really is.

This is intended to cover the adulteration of teas mainly, I understand.

On clause 4.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The changes in subsection 22*a* are the substitution of $500 instead of $50, and then further down the substitution of $50 for $10. The penalties are increased; and then the words "or six months' imprisonment or both," are new; they are not in the law as it formerly stood.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct the attention of the minister to what I think is an omission in paragraph A, who reads "if such adulteration is, within the meaning of this Act, deemed to be injurious to health, for the first offence a penalty not exceeding $500 and costs or six months' imprisonment or both," and then "not less than $50 and costs"; suppose that the fine is $200 and costs, which the tribunal impose upon a person, As I understand this paragraph, there would be no power on the part of the tribunal to inflict imprisonment for any period. I think that ought to be made clear. Even suppose the lowest fine is imposed and that the accused is not able to pay and does not pay, it should be within the discretion of the court to order him to be imprisoned a certain time in proportion to the amount of the fine and there does not appear to me to be any provision to that effect.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no necessity; that stands alone as the minimum punishment. The minimum punishment would be $50 and costs, the maximum punishment would be $500 and costs, or six months' imprisonment, or both. There may be both fine and imprisonment in the maximum offence: but there will be a minimum punishment in which a fine alone will be imposed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But suppose the minimum fine is not paid, there should be some alternative, some punishment for the offender who does not pay the fine?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say that I think that is otherwise provided for; if a party does not pay the fine it comes under the provisions of the Criminal Law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the point taken by the hon. member from Halifax is a good one. In the administration of a criminal law no judge will send a man to jail unless it is specially provided that he shall be so punished, if I understand it. This provides for a maximum fine and imprisonment in the one case, and provides for an absolute fine of $50, but no imprisonment, as a minimum. The magistrate must fine him $50. Then the member from Halifax says that if the offender is subject to a heavy penalty and six months' imprisonment, should he not be subject to a shorter date punishment or both in the minimum punishment? There may be a reason for this, in case the offender has not been wilfully guilty, although the law may have been violated, while the law imposes an absolute minimum penalty of $50, it might not be deemed advisable to send him to jail for a violation of the law that might have been committed by some of his employees.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am sure it is provided for in the statute. My hon. friend will see that this is only an amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would suggest that the Minister allow this clause to stand so that he may inform himself as to whether this point is provided for in the statute.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite so.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On Clause 5.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Section A is exactly the same as in the old Act; the difference is only in the penalties. The word $200 is inserted instead of $50, and $500 is inserted instead of $200, and then the words "or six months' imprisonment, or both" are new.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—That is an extraordinary penalty, because there are a great many of these drugs that are adulterated. I do not know of any one that is absolutely pure. It seems to me that this is a very extraordinary penalty. I do not know who will decide that it is very injurious to health.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It must be done wilfully.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Should it not be left optional and the justice have the privilege of imposing a fine that will come between those figures?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that it is not exceeding $500. It may be as much less as you please until you come down to $50, but it cannot be less than $50.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only question that is suggested to me in making the penalty so large and it being discretionary on the part of the magistrate, is whether he is likely to impose it. I do not object to the principle at all.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend was a long time in the government and he knows what the experience of the Inland Revenue Department has been with regard to the adulteration of foods. I suppose they have found the present punishments are altogether inadequate to serve as a deterrent to those who are engaged in adulteration for profit, and so it has been found necessary, in order to check that adulteration, that the penalty should be increased.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It struck me a number of years ago, and I was impressed with the idea when the late government was in power and it appears to me some of the officers under the present government are pursuing the same policy—it has often struck me that the law as it stood was not enforced properly. It seems to me that the law with respect the adulteration of foods should have been enforced with just about the same rigour that the other portions of the Excise law with respect to liquor and the customs law have been inforced. If the officers of the government were to bestir themselves in seeing that the existing penalties are enforced, there would be no necessity for increasing the penalties to the very high figures at which they are placed in this bill.

Subsection A was adoptrd.

On clause 2.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In the subsection "he shall be discharged from the prosecution, but shall be liable"—that is one important change that is made, and then after the word "defence" the following words are added "and has called the party from whom he purchased the said articles into the case, as provided for by the next following subsection, in which case he shall be liable only to the forfeiture provided by section 21 of this Act." Then the next subsection is wholly new.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is this introduction of the warranty a new feature or does the provision exist in the Act? What I wish to point out to the hon. gentleman is this: Supposing those goods go through the hands of three or four parties, unknown to each other it would be utterly impossible to comply with the provisions of the Act, because the last person selling, apparently, has to make the statement that "the undermentioned articles manufactured by myself, or by persons known to me, and sold by me to so and so, are pure and unadulterated within the meaning of the Adulteration Act." I do not see how you can apply that warranty to a purchaser of goods.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that the department feel they can do so. Take, for instance, a man engaged in manufacturing spice; it can only be sold if it is a pure article at a certain price. He mixes, say tan bark, with it and sells it at a very much lower figure—there ought not to be very much difficulty in reaching him.

Hon. Mr LOUGHEED—Suppose it is an imported article?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then if it be an imported article he could not be punished if he showed that he had not imported it, because it was an adulterated article.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The warranty is not a new feature. I find it in the Act of 1890.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is there provision for exemption in the case of an imported article?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I think not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Most of those articles that are dealt with are imported articles.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite so. You could not well permit the introduction with impunity of adulterated articles from abroad and prohibit them at home.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Certainly not.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is one difficulty that occurs to me which may arise in prac tice, but if this warranty has been in use the department ought to know about it. The form of warranty reads: "I hereby warrant that the undermentioned articles manufactured by myself, or by persons known to me and sold by me to (whoever it is) on the dates opposite thereto, are pure and unadulterated within the meaning of the Adulteration Act." I can understand that a manufacturer of any supplies could safely give that warrant, as far as regards himself, but that will not cure the difficulty, because the dealer who purchases from the manufacturer may adulterate, and he may produce this warranty as a defence; and it seems to me that the practical operation of the thing —if every dealer through whose hands the article passes from the manufacturer down to the purchaser who buys a single can or box of the article, is to give a warranty it is going to cause a great deal of inconvenience, but, on the other hand, if the warranty is only given by the manufacturer, it is not going to be any guarantee to the ultimate purchaser.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me to be practicable in this regard; supposing A B and C handle certain goods. A is the manufacturer; B is a wholesale dealer, and C a retail dealer, who purchases from B. Now, C, as a retail dealer, sells to somebody else. He certainly cannot make this form of warranty; he may not know A, yet he has to say that the articles are manufactured "by myself or persons known to me." Now, while C is dealing with those goods he could certainly not make a form of warranty that the goods are manufactured by him, or that he knows A. A may be an absolute stranger to him.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—One great advantage of the law—and this provision of the law of warranty was introduced in 1890—is that it makes those who deal in the goods cautious to see that they are not purchasing a spurious article with a view to putting it on the market. My hon. friend will see the provision of this clause:

> Provided that if the person accused proves to the court before which the case is tried that he had purchased the article in question as the same in nature, substance and quality as that 3 demanded of him by the purchaser or inspector, and with a written warranty to that effect,—which warranty, in the form in the third schedule to this Act, is produced at the trial of the case,—and that he sold it in the same state as when he purchased it, and that he could not with reasonable diligence have obtained knowledge of its adulteration, he shall be discharged from the prosecution.

Now this provision is a provision of precaution, and I do not well see how you can suppress adulteration at all unless you have some provision of this sort. Cases of this sort may arise that you cannot reach, but the vast majority of cases you are likely to reach, and the Act in these instances will accomplish the desired result.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You should extend the warranty in some way to preserve security. I appreciate the value of this new feature introduced in the bill, but I think it should be made practical, which at present it is not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The amendments made in this law from time to time are amendments which are suggested by the experience of the officers of the department, and they generally draw up these provisions in such a form, before they are submitted to the law department, as to meet the difficulty that they are intended to meet, and I think it will be found in practice that they fairly well accomplish that object.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The explanation does not meet the point raised by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. The point is this: A man buys under warranty. The goods may be pure, but the party who disposes of them adulterates them. That is met, I suppose, by some other clause. The presentation of the warranty to the consumer would be a guarantee of their purity, because he may have adulterated them himself, and if he were brought before a magistrate the production of a warranty would be no proof whatever, Then you would have to put the oath to him that he had not himself adulterated them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Supposing a retail dealer was the party who sold an adulterated article and is tried for the offence, he produces the warranty, then the other party is called in under the concluding provision. He declares that the goods were pure when sold to him. It then becomes obvious that the adulteration has been made by the party who is retaining them, and he is bound to exculpate himself from that logical inference.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is quite true, provided you can reach the party, but in 99 cases out of 100, the articles which are adulterated are purchased in Europe, and to produce the gentleman who there ground the spices would be utterly impossible.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me you are omitting the most important provision that you can introduce into this bill in connection with this feature, namely, the adulteration by the middlemen who deal in the article.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If he gives a warranty that the article is pure and adulterated, and it is adulterated, his warranty is fraudulent.

Hon. Mr. VILLENEUVE—This Adulteration Act is very important, and having been a merchant dealing in spices, I find that now, according to the present law, every box of spices, whether pepper or mustard, has a label on it which describes it as a mixture. In England the label says that this admixture contains nothing injurious. We buy it as such and sell it as such. Then we have goods that are sold pure, such as pepper, mustard and cinnamon, but when it leaves the store of the wholesale merchant, he does not know what the retailer will do, though he has the box on which is marked that it is entirely pure. What does the government inspector do? They enter now and then the stores of the merchants, take a sample of the goods, analyse it, and then they do not go to the merchant that has put up the goods, but to the retailer who has sold the goods, and he is fined for selling adulterated goods. It is for the man who put up the goods to prove that they were sold entirely pure. I think it is one of the best laws that we have, because at one time, when merchants sold spices and other goods of that character, more than half of what were sold were adulterated and we did not know with what. It is true the spices are not sold as they were, or at the time goods were entered that cost two or three cents a pound to be mixed with general goods and went into goods that sell at thirty or thirty-five cents, but under the present law the public is protected, because if you buy anything you can be sure it is pure if you deal with an honest merchant.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—There is where my argument of yesterday comes in. Every man's goods should be marked by the manufacturer. No one has spoken of an article we use extensively in every houuse—cream tartar. That article, as the hon. gentleman who spoke last knows, is extensively adulterated with pulverized alum. Importers who are most anxious to give this article pure to the community import it in the crystallized form at present; then they know it is pure. But when you import it in boxes, and especially when those boxes are not marked with the initials of the manufacturers, in almost all cases that important article is extensively adulterated with alum. While the minister is dealing with this bill, I might say that for a long time, for several years back, I have been drawing the attention of the department to the necessity of having this question very carefully examined. I am afraid that merchandise generally is not inspected in that careful manner that it should be. While we have a department we should look to them for protection. I do not wish to find fault with any official, but I think it requires a very competent man to go from warehouse to warehouse and ascertain accurately whether commodities of great importance, food especially, have been adulterated. The hon. gentleman talks about whiskey; that I contend is not adulterated. I should like to impress on the government the necessity of seeing that competent men are appointed to investigate these matters thoroughly and make the country understand that consumers are protected. In the past a great deal of looseness prevailed. A great deal of show of investigation was made which amounted to nothing. Articles have come into my own house that had the reputation of being inspected, but, if inspected, it was by men who were not competent, or who did not do their duty.

The clause was adopted.

On Clause 8,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend how the term "judge" is introduced? The trial is to be before a magistrate. It is a summary proceeding.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It would be whatever judicial authority would have the right to try it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the word "judge" include that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not think the word "judge" is used as synonymous with the word "magistrate" in any part of the Act. Considerable doubt would be thrown upon the determining power.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would it not necessarily compel all cases of this kind to go before a judge?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no provision for trying these cases except at the sitting of the court.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then, there being a County Court judge and a Superior Court judge, a conflict would take place as to where the jurisdiction would rest for the determining of the counsel fee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The 30th section of the chapter says: "every penalty imposed under this Act may be enforced and dealt with as if imposed under the said Act." That is the Inland Revenue Act. There are several sections under the Inland Revenue Act, beginning at 104, which deal with it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Section 113 of the Inland Revenue Act makes provision as to the tribunal before which the cases are to be tried. They may be tried before a county court judge, or any justice having jurisdiction in the place where the matter arises. There is a clause in the Act which refers you to the penalties in the Inland Revenue Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that the word "judge" is applicable in the case for the reason that the judge is the party who is to try the case. The section to which my hon. friend refers merely states the result of the trial without stating before whom it should take place. You are referred to another statute for the purpose of ascertaining the fact—the statute to which my hon. friend refers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think the point is covered.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Under the clause I read of the Inland Revenue Act provision is made for prosecutions before the various tribunals.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is an omission which I might point out. It only makes provision for a counsel fee to the prosecutor. In the event of the prosecution failing, there is no provision for the accused securing a counsel fee, although he may have succeeded. It seems to me it is a jug-handled clause, and the merchant who succeeds as against a prosecution of this nature should be protected as well as the Crown. In fact, the government should give greater consideration to the merchant who has succeeded in the prosecution than the Crown itself. It seems to me a counsel fee should be payable in both cases.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the judge would have a pretty liberal latitude to say what the costs of defence should be.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, because it says such expense of prosecution shall include reasonable counsel fee. That is the expenses of the prosecution. I doubt if that would cover the counsel fee of the defendant.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will find that costs are not given against the Crown in these cases.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why should they not be?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is far too large a question to raise on this bill and make it different from every other statute in that regard.

Hon. Mr. MACMILLAN—There might be vexatious prosecutions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It may be an important question, but it should be raised generally.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But the extraordinary provision is introduced giving the Crown a counsel fee where to-day it has no counsel fee. If an extraordinary right of that nature is introduced into the Act why should not the right be mutual?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Crown may always employ counsel for the purpose of defending the realm.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But you have provided that the Crown prosecutor may receive a counsel fee in the discretion of the judge.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. The matter may be for a small amount. The judge may say "these facts are easily investigated and no counsel fee is necessary," and in that case no counsel fee should be allowed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The fixing of the amount is in the discretion of the judge, but he must fix some counsel fee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, that is a mere limitation on the discretion.

The clause was adopted.

On section 4.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There was an understanding that this clause should be held over, but I think there is no object in that. If the hon. gentleman makes inquiry and finds it desirable to amend, he can do so on the third reading.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the committee rises I should like to call the attention of the minister to the fees in the Act of 1890, and ask him whether he does not think they are rather extraordinary. For analysis of milk the charge is $8, and for bread and other articles mentioned in the schedule $9. For butter, cheese, malt liquors and a number of other articles $12, and for coffee, tobacco, cocoa, chocolate, opium and other articles and water $14. My hon. friend beside me says he had some mineral water analysed and it cost him $10. Of course these are provisions of the law, and the other section is subject to an Order in Council. The question is whether these fees are not exorbitant.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will find upon inquiry that those articles referred to are difficult of analysis, and they are very important, so it is of consequence that the analysis should take place.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do the fees go to the public analyst or to the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think they would go to the analyst.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is he a salaried officer?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then they would go to the government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think they are salaried officers. I think they are paid by fees.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think so.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I made inquiries about the fees. I found out that the analyses were not very difficult ones, but the lowest charge was $10. I do not think this is excessive.

Hon Mr. TEMPLEMAN, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

GOVERNMENT HARBOURS, PIERS AND BREAKWATERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into committee of the whole on Bill (135) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting government harbours, piers and breakwaters."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This bill gives power to the minister to lease to the municipality any wharfs for which the revenue for the last three years has not averaged over $100. I find there are no municipalities in Prince Edward Island, and therefore it cannot apply to Prince Edward Island, and the wharfs will have to remain as they are, so far as this bill is concerned. The clause reads:

If at any time the average annual receipts from any wharf for the three years previous have not exceeded one hundred dollars, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may lease it to the municipality within which it is situated, for a term not exceeding three years, for an annual sum, payable in advance, not less than such average annual receipts, and on such other terms or conditions as to him seem advisable.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I would suggest to the hon. Secretary of State that it is an easy matter to provide for the disposal of the small wharfs in Prince Edward Island by making provision that they shall be disposed of by tender or by public sale for three years, just the same as they would to a municipality.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think that suggestion is a good one. I know, from my own knowledge of public wharfs in my own province, that a wharfinger has been appointed, and the department do not look after him, and a wharf which, under different management, might be quite productive, scarcely produces any revenue at all. This bill proposes to take the revenue as a basis for handing over the wharf to a municipality or some other body. I think the Department of Marine and Fisheries should lease these wharfs by public tender to any person who will give proper security, and in that way there will be very much more revenue derived from them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suppose it was thought that the municipality would have more interest in looking after the wharf for the public benefit. An individual would get all he could out of it for that term and not keep up repairs, whereas the municipality would have an interest in keeping the wharf in repair. I will call the attention of the minister to the suggestion, however.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see the municipality would have an interest in moderate charges for the use of the wharf, whereas an individual would have an interest in making as large an income as he could from it, and the interest of the individual and the public who were to be served by it, might be diametrically opposite to each other. That never could be the case with a municipality.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The scale of charges is fixed by law; if not, it has been by regulation of the department, and no matter to whom they would be leased they could not charge more than the regulation rates. I do not see that a municipality would have any greater interest in keeping the wharf in repair than an individual would if the lease is to be for no more than three years, and in that case a municipality might take all they could out of it and at the end of the three years hand it back to the department to have it put in repair again.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will call the attention of the minister to the suggestion.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

PROTECTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on Bill (136) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Protection of Navigable Waters."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the difference between this and the present law?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is wholly new. There is no provision such as this.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It only applies to tidal waters in Manitoba or Ontario.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why is it not necessary in our rivers? If it applied to the inland waters it would meet the views of my hon. friend from the Rideau division (Mr. Clemow).

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Act at present provides that no owner or tenant of sawmills or workmen shall throw any sawdust, edgings, bark or rubbish of any description into any navigable water.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—But that law is a dead letter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That does not apply to tidal waters.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is an attempt to extend a similar provision to tidal waters, and the depth here is far beyond what was required in rivers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The law forbidding the throwing of sawdust into rivers has been suspended.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But judgment has been given against those parties who violated the law.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The depth of twelve fathoms appears to us to be very extreme. That is seventy-two feet. No vessel built draws that much water, and it applies to the Straits of Northumberland, and no rubbish can be thrown in the Straits of Northumberland which are less than that depth.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The object is to prevent large steamers emptying their furnaces into harbours and places where the water is not that depth, and where it would in time make the water very much less if they did so.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.), from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 18th May, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THIRD READING.

Bill (101) "An Act respecting the harbour of the city of St. John in the province of New Brunswick."—(Hon. Mr. Dever.)

PACIFIC AND YUKON RAILWAY NAVIGATION AND MINING COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (F) "An Act to incorporate the Pacific and Yukon Railway Navigation and Mining Company," with amendments.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I move that rule 71 of this House be suspended, in order to permit the amendments to be concurred in to-day.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I object.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do I understand that my hon. friend objects?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am very much astonished at any hon. gentleman objecting to the suspension of the rule. We have been told that the people in the Yukon country are likely to starve on account of the Senate having rejected the former bill. I think all the senators, even those who voted against the bill, would be anxious for an opportunity of constructing a road to that country. The government and their supporters told us that the people up there will be starving after the 1st September next, the day on which that road would have been finished if this cruel House had not thrown out the bill. I am astonished that the hon. senior member for Halifax, who has so much of the milk of human kindness in his composition, should endeavour to deprive these poor people of the chance of getting food to that district.

The SPEAKER—Is there any objection to the suspension of the rule?

Hon Mr. POWER—Certainly.

GOVERNMENT OF YUKON DISTRICT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the first reading of Bill (P) "An Act to provide for the government of the district of Yukon." He said: This measure, as I said yesterday, is on the lines of the North-west Territories Act, made as brief as possible, and to provide for the present government of the Yukon district, for the appointment of a commissioner to administer the government, for the appointment of a council to advise and assist him in the preparation of ordinances for the government of the district, and to provide for the administration of justice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is the council to be an appointed one?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, an appointed council.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the first time.

LOAN COMPANIES BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the first reading of Bill (Q) "An Act respecting Loan Companies." He said: This bill is intended to provide under the authority of parliament for the incorporation of loan companies by letters patent. I need not enter into a discussion of the provisions of the bill at this present moment, as it is somewhat lengthy, and it will be printed immediately. At the second reading I will discuss those provisions in detail.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Did I understand the Minister of Justice to say before, in reference to this bill, that he would not urge its passage this session if there was not ample time to discuss the details?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite right, if there be any objection. It has been supported, I think, by nearly all the loan companies, at all events in the province of Ontario. The bill is important and its provisions have been carefully considered. The plan itself is important, because it will suggest plans for the union of corporate companies, on which there does not seem to be very adequate information at the present time; and the bill is not only important in itself but I I think will prove valuable in the preparation of measures relating to the incorporation of companies, other than loan companies, hereafter.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I think the bill is a very desirable one, but there should be ample time given to send the bill in its complete form to the various loan companies.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite so. It will be printed immediately and may be circulated, and my intention at the present time is to send the bill to the Banking and Commerce Committee, instead of considering it in a Committee of the Whole House, and it will be considered in that committee and its provisions discussed and parties interested in the bill may be heard as to their opinion.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—I think this bill has been asked for by the loan companies themselves.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does it apply to the organization of new companies as well as to old ones?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

GOVERNMENT CONCESSIONS TO THE DESCHENES ELECTRIC COMPANY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before the Senate, all papers, correspondence, contracts and arrangements with the government or any member thereof, whereby permission was granted to the Deschênes Electric Company to lay an electric cable for private purposes across the Ottawa River, from Hull to Ottawa, also through and under public property from the foot of the locks at Ottawa River to the canal basin in this city.

He said: My object in moving for this return is to ascertain what representations were made to the government whereby the Deschênes Electric Co., were allowed the privilege of having a cable stretched across the Ottawa River from Hull to this city for the purpose of transmitting their electric current to the city of Ottawa. The Deschênes company is an outside company, having an establishment near Aylmer. They have been desirous of entering the city, but the city authorities have so far refused them admission, because they considered it was interfering considerably with the vested rights of the Ottawa Electric Company, a company established whose works involve an expenditure of $1,000,000. The Deschênes company is an outside corporation and is desirous of coming in and competing with the Ottawa company, contrary to the wish of civic authorities. Therefore, I do not think the government were justified in granting this privilege to an outside company. I question very much whether they had the legal authority to grant any such privilege. However, I shall wait until the papers are brought down and then we can ascertain what induced the government to grant such extraordinary privileges. I hold that the use of public property should not be granted to private individuals or companies, because it belongs solely to the whole people, and should not be interfered with by any one under any circumstances.

There is another most serious objection to the granting of this privilege. Hon. gentlemen know that at the time of the construction of the Rideau Canal by the Imperial authorities, it was a condition that the property ceded at that time was granted by the donors upon the conditions that it should be employed only and exclusively for canal purposes. The heirs of one of the parties have been contesting the right of the government to appropriate a portion of the property thus acquired for other purposes. An action was instituted against the government for damages in consequence of mal-appropriation and non-compliance with the conditions imposed upon them by the donors, which is now before the Supreme Court. A part of this property now granted the Deschênes Company is in a similar position. It will give these, or other parties, the right to institute another action against the government, for non-compliance with the original intention of the donors with respect to that property. It is very unfortunate at this particular time that the government should place themselves in a position which may involve them in additional law suits, whereby they may be compelled to pay heavy damages for infringing on the rights of the people who originally made the grant. A portion of the land between the foot of the locks and the canal basin was the property of the Sparks estate, and may be an additional inducement to continue litigation and additional damages may be obtained for deviation from the terms on which the land was granted over forty years ago. It is extraordinary that the government, at this particular time, should grant this privilege to an outside company. By the action of the government, the city has been thwarted in its intention to prevent this company from coming into the municipality. I do not think the government should interfere, as they have done, to thwart the city authorities, as they are the only parties who should decide this matter between the parties, I shall wait until the papers are brought down—I suppose they are not very voluminous—and if it can be shown that the government have not acted legally or discreetly in this matter, they may see their way to cancel their agreement with the company.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How about competition? You are very fond of competition some times.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Before the government reply to this question, I wish to say a few words. It is not often that I have occasion to differ from my hon. friend on my left (Mr. Clemow) upon any matters which he brings before the House, which are generally of a progressive and intelligent character. But I think when he discusses the foreign policy of the government he should give us a day's notice, because it is an important matter. I do not wonder at all that Englishmen complain that they are called by Canadians foreigners, but certainly I never thought it would come to pass that it would be said that the people of our neighbouring town were to be called foreigners also, which my hon. friend seemed to consider them when they attempt to cut into his electric power privileges. He asks us to discuss this great question upon international grounds, upon foreign policy, and everything else, as to the rights of crossing the canal built by the government some sixty years ago, and as to the rights of the Sparks estate, which were acquired by occupation some sixty years ago, I think and laid the foundation for the Sparks estate to come down on the Canadian government for half a million dollars for the invasion of their territory. Apart however from the question of foreign policy, which is the amusing application he gave to an outside competitive company, we come down to the question of competition, and whenever there is a desire to monopolise electric lighting or railways, or anything else, I am opposed to it. We had this question before us some two years ago when the Hull Electric Railway Company wanted to get a footing in the city of Ottawa, and the representatives of my friends in the electric street railway of the City of Ottawa opposed that, I supported my hon. friend on that occasion but it was not to kill competition. The reason I opposed it on that occasion was that I considered the legislation was imperfect, in so far as the electric company of Hull, if it came into the city of Ottawa, would have to be operated under the laws of Ontario, and in Hull it would be under the laws of Quebec. I considered the legislation imperfect, that the company should have come to the parliament of Canada, and acquire a Dominion charter. I am not prepared to agree with my hon. friend when he says that the Dominion government has no right to allow a cable, or a telegraph wire, or anything else to cross one of the navigable streams of Canada. This is what I call an inversion of the foreign policy that is contrary to the welfare and good of the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the papers being brought down. They will be brought down as soon as possible. I do not think there are many of them. I suppose there is the application and the Order in Council, but my recollection of the charter of the company is that they are authorized to do business in the province of Quebec and also in the township of Nepean and the city of Ottawa. The letters patent were granted by the late government. They proposed to the Minister of Railways and Canals that they would like to be allowed to go as far up the canal as the head of the Deep Cut.

The motion was agreed to.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN moved:

That when the Senate adjourns this day it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, the 25th instant, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

He said: The hon. leader of the House promised us an answer to this question today.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I think it would be more convenient to meet at eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Say next Christmas.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to hon. gentlemen that we are only desirous to meet the wishes of the House, and if it be the general wish of the House that the adjournment should take place till Wednesday at the usual hour, the government, of course, will not oppose the wishes of the House with the understanding that it does not prolong the session. We think we are getting near the end of the session and there are several important bills to come before the Senate from the House of Commons. There is the Franchise Bill and the Plebiscite Bill. The Franchise Bill, I think, will be here this afternoon. That being so, a good deal depends on the desire of the House with respect to the measures that have been introduced here to-day and those which will come up to-day from the House of Commons. If my hon. friends are disposed to discuss these questions very fully, then the adjournment would be a matter of greater difficulty because we would dislike very much that the Senate would not be through with its work at the same time as the House of Commons will be through theirs. We have certain measures now to go from this House to the House of Commons, and there are certain measures to come from the House of Commons before us, and the probability is that the time and the amount of labour required from the House in this regard, apart from the estimates, will not be very different. If we adjourn till Wednesday at three o'clock then it will be important that we should have evening sessions, for a while at all events, till we overtake the business that will be laid before this body. My impression is that the House of Commons expect to get through with their work at a comparatively early period, and I am inclined to think, if the Senate will co-operate with us in carrying through the measures of the government, that we may be able to complete the work of legislation this month. But of course the government are in the hands of the two Houses. My colleague and myself are desirous of meeting the wishes of this body, and we hope they will be ready, if the general desire is for an adjournment till Wednesday, to actively co-operate in promoting legislation still under consideration, so as to conclude our business here without any material delay in consequence of the adjournment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I might say, so far as the Senate is concerned, that it has shown in the past no indisposition to assist the government in the passage of all measures brought before it, except in one instance in which the measure was not deemed to be in the public interest. We are just as anxious to facilitate the business of the Senate as the government possibly could be. However, without desiring to be of too scolding a nature, I might say that I think the government might, with a little more exertion on their own part, have presented the important measures which are now before the Lower House and also before this House, to parliament at an earlier period of the session. We have now been nearly four months in session. We knew that the Plebiscite Bill and the Franchise Bill were to be laid before us, and we also had the promise, a long time ago, of the two bills which the hon. gentleman has spoken of to-day. Both of them are of a very important character. I think neither of them will occupy any lengthened period further than is necessary to thoroughly understand them. I have no anticipation whatever, considering the importance of the Companies Act, that that will pass this session. It is a very grave and important question, and one with the provisions of which every one interested in companies of that kind would desire to make himself familiar. The bill which has just been laid before the House for the government of the Yukon territory has, in many respects, departed from the provisions of the charter originally adopted for the government of the North-west Territories. Probably the government have good reasons for these departures. From a cursory glance at the bill, it seems to me to give most extraordinary powers. I will not discuss them now, but merely instance that to show the important character of the work which we have to consider. In reading the newspapers this morning, I find the government, in the Lower House, have proposed some four or five additional measures, some of them of no very great importance. Others may necessitate a good deal of discussion. I think it is generally accepted that the Plebiscite Bill is a measure which, under the circumstances, will have to be presented to the people, and I do not think it will create much discussion. Whether its provisions meet the approval of those interested—those who are opposed to it, and those who are in favour of it—is a question which can only be decided when we discuss it. The Franchise Bill is vastly more important. How far it is in the power of the Senate to alter, change or amend, or in any way to interfere with that measure, is a question for future consideration; and under the circumstances, considering the necessity for discussing this question fully, I do not see that the adjournment would interfere to any very great extent with the consideration of those measures. We only lose two days, and if we go to work with a will on Wednesday, and, as has been intimated by the hon. minister, hold night sittings, which I think we ought to do at this period of the session, we can get through business without delaying prorogation to any great extent. But what is to come forward in the way of railway subsidies, or bills for confirming the new arrangement which has been entered into with the Grand Trunk Railway and the Drummond County Railway, of course I cannot say. If those bills come down, they will require some little consideration before they are passed, more particularly under the present circumstances, and the evidence which has been adduced in the committee of the House of Commons which has been investigating the subject. I think, speaking for those members of the House with whom I have any connection, I can say that they have every desire to facilitate the work presented to them, and that no obstructive tactics will be resorted to in order to frustrate or to delay any matter that they may have to submit to us.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—As this is a question of adjournment I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if the government still adheres to the policy of hanging up all legislation relating to the Yukon railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am unable to answer the hon. gentleman.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVIGATION LAWS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON rose to inquire:

If it is the intention of the government to relax the navigation laws so as to permit of the owner of a steamboat ten or twelve tons capacity to be commanded by himself though he has not put in the full time as master or mate required by law?

He said: The object of my question is with reference to the navigation of some of our small lakes by small boats. The law requires that a capable engineer with a certificate should be employed. This engineer has to be pretty highly paid. Now, if the man is the owner of the steamboat, and has to pay an engineer and captain as well, his boat running on a route some ten or fifteen or twenty miles only on some of the inland waters or lakes, it is a great stoppage to enterprise. I have an application from some one who wants to run a steamboat from Wabigon, fifteen miles across to portage for the mining districts. It is a small boat, and the summer's receipts are exceedingly small.

He has to pay high wages to his engineer, while he himself has had considerable experience in saling a boat. He is only three months short of the time which the law requires. The law requires that he shall be one year a master or a mate, and one year at sea in some shape or form. Because of the shortness of that three months which I have mentioned, he is debarred from acting on a little steamboat.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Let him employ a man for three months.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is all very well to say that, but when you come to pay $40 a month for a captain and $40 a month for an engineer it comes to quite a bit

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What is the size of the boat?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is a small boat of ten tons, he carries freight and passengers. I understand that the government have had a great many applications of this description before them, and I do not think there is the slighest necessity for debarring this man, who has had nine-tenths of the experience required by law.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If I might be allowed to interrupt for a moment I do not think it is necessary to relax the navigation laws for the purpose set out by the hon. gentleman in his question. The hon. gentleman asks if the owner of a steamboat of ten or twelve tons will be permitted to be commander himself. Well, there is nothing in the navigation laws that says the owner of a vessel shall not command himself, and I think the owners of small vessels have plenty of self-control.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—If he carries passengers he is liable to a penalty under the law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He will have to carry them on his back. I would call my hon. friend's attention to the legislation already adopted this session. My hon. friend perhaps was not present—but I think he was—when the bill entitled "An Act further to amend the Act respecting Certificates to Masters and Mates of Ships." That came up from the House of Commons and was discussed in this House and adopted. One of the provisions of that Act is:

> The minister, upon a report of a duly appointed and qualified examiner of masters and mates, may grant a temporary certificate as master to an applicant sufficiently qualified by his knowledge and experience to take charge of a steamboat of not more than ten tons, gross tonnage, and certificated to carry not more than ten passengers, plying within specified limits in the minor inland waters of Canada.

That is precisely what my hon. friend asks shall be done. He will see that it is already provided for by the legislation of this session.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is satisfactory.

QUEEN'S COUNSEL JUDGMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL rose to inquire:

1. Whether a judgment has been rendered by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the appeal in the Queen's Counsel case from Canada? If so, what is the purport of said judgment?
2. What communications, if any, have passed between the Dominion government and the governments of the several provinces in Canada in respect of the subject matter of such judgment?
3. What is the policy of the government in respect of future appointments of Queen's Counsel?

He said: While I know the profession are anxious to ascertain the facts in connection with these appointments, I must say that I scarcely expect my hon. friend to give me a definite answer to the third question, as to their policy, unless they have decided upon the course which they intend to pursue in the future.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend, in reply to his first question, that a judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has been rendered, and in that judgment their lordships have held the doctrine that the Lieutenant Governor, upon the advice of his ministers, may appoint Queen's Counsel to discharge their functions in the courts of the province. I may say to my hon. friend that I think there was a good deal of misapprehension on this side of the Atlantic upon this subject of Queen's Counsel. Of course the notion prevailed that only His Excellency the Governor General represented the Queen, and that the governor of the province was simply an executive officer created by the statute known as the British North America Act, and that the lieutenant governor in no sense was a representative of the sovereign.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That was the opinion that was very strongly held by the late Minister of Justice, Sir John Thompson.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes ; that has always seemed to me to be a mistaken opinion, and it was so held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I think it was a mistaken opinion for this reason, that the executive authority, apart from the special provision of statute, is everywhere, throughout the empire, in Her Majesty, and that everywhere the prerogatives of the Crown are the same—that Her Majesty's powers and prerogatives are the same—in any portion of the empire as they are in the United Kingdom ; and the question always is, upon whose advice these powers are to be exercised ? Now, the provinces, at the confederation, were not created by the British North America Act ; they had existed before, and the preamble of the Act declares that these provinces which before existed have declared or desired to be federated and to unite under a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. If my hon. friend will look carefully at the Act he will see that there is nothing said in the preamble about the creating of governments for the provinces. It is assumed that they already existed, and it is only the creation of a central authority, with power similar in principle, that is contemplated. There were certain changes in the constitution of the provinces required, because the union that existed between Quebec and Ontario or between Upper and Lower Canada was at that time dissolved, and as two edifices—political edifices—were to stand where one stood before, it was necessary by this disruption that certain repairs should be made, and those are included in the British North America Act. Now, my hon. friend will also see that the fact that these provinces existed, their governments existed, there is nothing said specially as to what the form of the executive government in the provinces shall be—all that is assumed as something already existing and to be continued as it had existed before. Then, further than that, with respect to the provinces, where the legislature is to be called together, it is declared it shall be called together in the Queen's name in every instance ; not only is that so with regard to Canada, but it is also so with regard to the provinces. Now, why ? Because under the British constitutional system, each House is an advisory body, it is a council of the Crown. We advise the Crown in matters of legislation—"Her Majesty by and with the advice of the Senate and House of Commons enacts." Who enacts ? Her Majesty. Her Majesty does it upon the advice of these two bodies. Therefore, we are the councillors of the Crown for the purpose of legislation ; and if the Lieutenant Governor of the province was simply an executive officer, and did not represent Her Majesty, there would be no sense in calling the legislature together in Her Majesty's name. They are called in Her Majesty's name because they are to advise Her Majesty ; they are Her Majesty's council ; and if they were not Her Majesty's council, but the council simply of an executive officer, they ought to be called in his name, for they would be his advisers in the work of legislation. Then, my hon. friend will see that where legislative councils exist in provinces, that is, where there is a second chamber, all the members of that chamber are appointed by the Crown, the same as senators are appointed by the Governor General upon the advice of his ministers. They are appointed in the name of Her Majesty. Why in the name of Her Majesty ? Because they are to advise and counsel Her Majesty with regard to the legislative authority that is being exercised through her agent, the Lieutenant Governor. And so my hon. friend will see that the point which was in dispute formerly as to whether the Lieutenant Governor was a simple executive officer created by the statute, or whether he was a representative of the sovereign, practically determines the question as to whether he has the power to appoint in Her Majesty's courts, in the provinces officers to represent Her Majesty. Historically there was at one time a council learned in the law to advise the sovereign, just as there is a council to advise the sovereign in respect to politics. The Privy Council were the advisers on questions of public policy and a section on difficult questions of law. Her Majesty or the sovereign had, at one time, a council to advise on legal questions. For many years that council consisted of the King or Queen's advocate and the law officers of the Crown, and of the judges who were summoned to parliament to act as assessors to the Crown, and it was originally—as Mr. Herne points out—with the idea that the title of Queen's Counsel, or King's Counsel was given to persons who were made members of that body, and not simply because they appeared as representatives of the sovereign in the court; and although that body has long since, as Mr. Herne points out, ceased to be other than an effete body, its honorary distinction still continues, and I suppose there is nothing in the world to hinder the representative of Her Majesty in any part of the world to create such a counsel, and I suppose if the ancient authority of the Crown in this regard was revived, after the counsel was created they could be summoned to assist the Crown by their advice. That power, or practice, of course, has long since ceased; but I mention it to show that the Lieutenant Governor, as the representative of the Crown, has, in the nature of the arrangement, the power to appoint Queen's Counsel. Well, I suppose the same power will belong to the Governor General, although that question was not raised or disposed of by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in this decision. Then my hon. friend asks whether there were any communications between the Dominion government and the governments of the several provinces in Canada with respect to this decision. I am not aware that there have been any communications. I think if there were any they would be in my department, and there we have no communications on that subject. Then, in regard to the third question as to what would be the policy of the government in respect of future appointments of Queen's Counsel, I may say to my hon. friend that the question has not been considered by the government since this decision has taken place. Perhaps after the session is over I shall have an opportunity of discussing the subject with my colleagues, when more practical business is not pressing constantly upon us for consideration. We are to remember that we have a few courts in which members of the profession appear for the purpose of conducting the business of the Crown, and there might be a certain amount of propriety in continuing to exercise this power and for the purpose of conferring these honours upon members of the bar. That is a question that we have not yet considered, and before we come to a conclusion on the subject it might be necessary to confer with the law officers of the different provinces with a view to ascertaining their views on the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am much obliged to my hon. friend for the lucid explanations he has given, but did I understand him to say that the appointees of the different provinces would occupy the position of Queen's Counsel when they appeared in the Supreme Court, or whether the appointments of Queen's Counsel in the different provinces would only give them precedence and standing in their own courts in their respective provinces, and whether the Dominion government does not reserve to itself, at present, the right to appoint Queen's Counsel who would take precedence in the Supreme Court and the Exchequer Courts, being Dominion courts and not provincial ones?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not a question that has been touched in this decision. My hon. friend knows by the Supreme Court Act and by the Exchequer Courts Act the Dominion, having no bar of its own, no provision existing for a Dominion bar and all the persons who practise in the Dominion courts being members of the bar of the different provinces, that, I suppose, will always continue as long as that condition of the law continues to recognize the status that has been conferred by the local governments upon persons practising in these courts.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Practising in the Dominion courts?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. For instance, if a member of the bar in any colony who has the rank of Queen's Counsel conferred upon him, appears before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which is the court of the empire, just as the Supreme Court is the court of Canada, he is recognized in that character which has been impressed upon him by the Crown in his own province, although he has no status or right to appear in a court of law of the United Kingdom properly. These are matters, though, which may be regarded, perhaps, as matters of courtesy, not as matters of right. I am expressing no official opinion on the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will excuse me, but the answers suggest other questions. The hon. gentleman told us that Queen's Counsel appointed in the colonies of the Empire have the right to appear before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the status which they hold in their own colonies. That implies that the provincial governments are analogous to the colonial governments. Well, it is known that under the constitution, provincial governments are established under the Confederation Act, a power given by the Imperial government to Canada, and that the legislature of Canada has organized and established other provincial governments. Does my hon. friend desire to be understood as conveying the impression—take Manitoba, for instance, which was created by the Dominion parliament under the authority given in the Confederation Act—that they stand in the same position to the courts in England that a Queen's Counsel of Cape Colony or any other colony does? Is that what I am to understand?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I think so, the appointment is the appointment of the Queen in every case.

RETURNS TO ADDRESSES.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg to lay on the table a portion of the return, moved for by the hon. leader of the opposition, relating to commissions issued in connection with dismissals. This is from the Department of Railways and Canals. I have made inquiries as to the other departments, and I do not find that any commissions have been issued except, recently, one in the Inland Revenue Department.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Are there any other documents relating to the granting of bonding privileges at the different ports in Alaska to British subjects carrying goods through to Canadian territory? I notice, in running my eye hastly over the return which has been laid on the table to-day, that it does not go as far as was indicated in the paragraph from the Ottawa Citizen which I read to the House yesterday. It refers only to Wrangel, and not to any other ports.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If my recollection serves me right, instructions were issued last January which covered the other points. If the hon. gentleman wishes, I think I can get a copy of them for him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Thank you, I should like to have a copy.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In January there were regulations issued which covered all other points.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Had copies of those regulations been in our possession when we were discussing the Yukon Railway Bill, we could have saved a great deal of time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At that time they had not made any regulations affecting Wrangel. You may remember that we were not able in the debate to say what they would be. In making the regulations, they had reserved Wrangel.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They had agreed to make regulations the same with regard to all. The others were adopted immediately, but they reserved Wrangel, I suppose, for the purpose of finding which was the best point for transhipment with a view to preventing smuggling.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The great difficulty was that at Skagway and Dyea the officials did not carry out the instructions they had received from Washington. They exacted from the miners extortionate charges—as high as nine dollars a day—and they killed the trade.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is to be done away with, is it not under the new regulations?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I beg to call the attention of the government to the fact that they have not yet brought down the return which I moved for last March relating to the sale of school lands in Manitoba. When may I expect to have it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will make inquiry and will be able to answer my hon. friend when we meet again.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 25th May, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

OTTAWA RIFLE RANGE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.) moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a statement of the tenders received by the Department of Militia and Defence for the work of the Rifle Range on the Ottawa River, east of the City of Ottawa, and a statement of the estimated quantities on which tenders were figured out; a statement of the date and amount of each cheque sent in with each tender.

A copy of the tender of J. Lyons, and a copy of the cheque which accompanied the same, showing date of acceptance by the bank.

He said: In this case tenders were called for, I believe, by the Militia Department, and very properly so, and no fault could be found if a friend of the government got the contract, everything being equal; but, if anybody else put in a much lower tender and did not receive the work, that would cause a grievance. I move for these papers in order to ascertain how the matter stands.

The motion was agreed to.

THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LAND GRANT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON inquired of the leader of the Senate:

If notice has been given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to select their land grant before the expiration of the term of twenty years exemption of taxation, under the Statutes incorporating the Company?

He said: I do not intend to detain the House with any long remarks upon this matter. As hon. gentlemen are quite aware, when the contract was made with the present company, a land grant was given and the exemption from taxation was placed at 20 years. The contract was entered into in 1880. Annually as work of construction proceeded land grant bonds were issued and released by the government as lands were earned. Up to 1882 and 1883, a very large proportion of these lands were earned at that time. The construction is sought to be put upon this question that the exemptions run for an indefinite period, and only from the date of the issue of the individual patents. I do not think it is desirable that that position should be assumed by the government or by parliament. It is not a question for the courts to decide. It is for this parliament to declare what was the intention that gave the exemption from taxation for twenty years for the large land grant of twenty-five to thirty millions acres that was made to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It is an injustice to the people who reside in the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories that such enormous blocks of land should be exempt from taxation, because it retards their progress in educational matters and all those matters for which they themselves are heavily taxed, and it is desirable that some understanding should be arrived at as to what action is to be taken in this matter. It is not fair to the municipalities, who are incapable, either by co-operation or as individual municipalities, of taking any steps to bring the matter before the courts. It would be a most costly proceeding and not a proper precedent to establish in such a matter. The people who are settling there require municipal and school organization, and it is unquestionable that the intention of parliament, when they gave that exemption for twenty years, was that the twenty years should date from the issue of the lands to the company, from the time that the company have been in the enjoyment of them as a financial asset. The proper step to be taken in this matter, in order to let the municipalities know that the government have them under their care and are watchful over their interest would be to notify the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that they must select their lands before the termination of the twenty years exemption from taxation. In the United States this has been a question with a great many companies, and the railway companies have sought to evade the responsibility of taxation by taking no steps to select their lands. It grew to be an evil, and the step that was taken by the government of the United States was to give them notice, and if, within the space of twenty-five years or the limit of exemption, they failed to comply with the notice, the land grant was cancelled. I think it is desirable and necessary that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should not be allowed to hold that position of indefiniteness, that the exemption from taxation is to go on for any indefinite period, or that the responsibility should be thrown on the municipalities in the west in order to test the case before the courts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say to my hon. friend that I have quite overlooked this question, but I will inquire of my colleague, the Minister of the Interior, to-morrow as to what action has been taken and will let my hon. friend know precisely how the matter stands. I know that with regard to the claims of the company in respect to some of these lands, there are some matters in controversy; and the papers, which are rather voluminous, are in my department, but I have had no opportunity of looking into them, nor shall I do so until after the session is over. It is quite impossible to do so with the work of the session and the ordinary business of administration to attend to, but as to precisely how the matter stands, I shall endeavour to let my hon. friend know to-morrow.

THE SPEAKER'S HONOURS.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the House will excuse me if, before we proceed to the Orders of the Day, I call attention to a circumstance which has come to our knowledge since the adjournment this day week. Hon. gentlemen have learned, since the adjournment, that it has pleased Her Majesty to confer a title of honour and dignity upon the hon. gentleman who occupies the chair of this House—(cheers)—and although we all are aware of the exceeding modesty of our Speaker, I trust that he will pardon us if we do not allow the occasion to pass without some remarks. I think that, as members of the Senate, we should feel gratified that Her Majesty has conferred a title upon our Speaker. It recognizes the position of the House; and, as to the individual on whom the honour has been conferred, I think there can be no two opinions. The hon. gentleman who now occupies the chair of this House has been a member of the Senate for over 21 years. During the first two years he was also a member of the administration of the day. Then, for a regrettably large number of years, he was a private member of this House. During the past two sessions and the present session he has acted as Speaker of the Senate. I think that no member of this House can recall an occasion, during all those years, when in any of those capacities the hon. gentleman has said a word that has been uncourteous to any member of this House, or has done an act which was unkindly. (Hear, hear.) The hon. gentleman, although his manners are very agreeable, is a thorough going party man. I do not think that the warmest friend of the hon. gentleman has ever suspected him of being anything else than thoroughly loyal to his party; but, while he has been loyal to his party, there has been nothing in his conduct in this House, or as head of the House, to make any gentleman who differed from him in politics realize that that was the case. Socially, and as head of the House, he has treated us all in the same way; and I think that I am speaking the sentiments of every hon. gentleman present when I say that we all rejoice at the honour which has been conferred upon our Speaker and that we all wish he may live many years to enjoy the well-deserved honour which Her Majesty has been good enough to confer upon him. (Applause.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I need scarcely say that there is not a sentiment which has fallen from the hon. gentleman who has referred to the distinctions that have been conferred on our Speaker, that will not be re-echoed by every member of the Senate, with the exception of one. It would be affectation on my part, if I were to say that I agreed with him on that point, and that is where he said it was regrettable that His Honour, the Speaker, after two years' service of his country in the cabinet, was relegated to the opposition. Were I to do that, it would be a condemnation, of myself; but apart from that, which may be taken as badinage, I cordially endorse the remarks which have been made in reference to His Honour, the Speaker. There are few men at the present day who have sat in parliament longer than I have; there are some. I had the honour of his acquaintance when he was a Minister of the Crown, and when in the House of Commons, before he became a Minister of the Crown, and in all that the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Power), has said in reference to his suavity of manner and the courtesy with which he has treated his opponents, the hon. gentleman has not said too much. Personally, I congratulate the Speaker on the distinguished honour which has been conferred upon him. I congratulate the Senate on the fact that, on this Jubilee year of Her Majesty's reign, She has seen fit to bestow honours upon the Speakers of the two Houses of Parliament, and more particularly upon the one who presides in this Chamber. I need not add more. It may be accepted as a recognition of services rendered, or a recognition of the importance of this branch of parliament, in the person of him who presides over its deliberations. He has been all that could be expected of a Speaker, and I re-echo the utterance of my hon. friend in wishing him long life, good health and happiness to enjoy the distinction which has been conferred upon him. (Applause.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am sure that I can endorse all the observations that have been made in commendation of Mr. Speaker by the hon. friend who has spoken before me. I, of course, do not concur with my hon. friend opposite in his exception; I think that was a misfortune, while he thinks it otherwise. But, let me say this, that as long as we are a British possession, as long as we stand in the position which we do to Her Majesty's throne, it will always be a matter of importance that that those honours which people prize and which Her Majesty confers upon those of Her subjects whom she regards as most deserving—I say as long as that is so, we, of course must attach due value to recognitions of this sort. I suppose we may regard the conferring of a degree of knighthood upon one of her Majesty's subjects for services, whether in public life or for other services that are regarded as important to the interest of the state, as deserved honours. For Her Majesty is not supposed to be ill-advised with regard to matters of this kind. We have a desire for distinction. It is a part of the human constitution, and a man who puts no value upon a distinction of any sort is not one who is likely to succeed in making his mark in any position, either in public or private life. We go to our schools, we attend our universities and engage in severe study in our boyhood; we acquire honours, and we attach importance to the degrees that are conferred upon us. Now, honours of this sort in public life, if I may so use the expression, are practically a graduation in the public service, and I am sure I can congratulate Mr. Speaker on the honour that has been conferred upon him. I do not know of any case in all Canada where it would be more cordially assented to that that honour has been deserved than in the case of Mr. Speaker. I had the pleasure, when Mr. Speaker was a member of an administration, to be his colleague, and a more agreeable colleague, a more pleasant companion in the public service, I do not think it would be possible to have, and I think that he would be an ill-natured man indeed, who, on any subject, would have any serious difference—I do not mean difference of opinion, but difference in feeling—with the hon. gentleman upon whom Her Majesty has conferred the degree of knighthood, and who has the honour to preside over this chamber. My hon. friend opposite says that this recognition of the services of Mr. Speaker and the honour which Her Majesty has conferred on him is a recognition of the importance of this chamber. Let me say to hon. gentlemen that I had never doubted its importance. I have never been of the opinion that it would be possible, under the English parliamentary system of government, to get on with one chamber. In my opinion, no matter how intelligent the members who constitute the House of Commons may be, no matter how competent the electorate may be of self-government, there will always some times in the history of a country where the public excitement may lead to abuses, where, in fact, abuses will spring up, and the chamber that has no other body to consult that feels it is absolute master of public affairs, and the majority of which feel that they can do as they like, is a body that some time or other will make mistakes and commit abuses.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And those abuses will threaten the existence of representative institutions. That has been the history of the world, and so I will not say with my hon. friend that in conferring this honour that Her Majesty especially recognized the importance of this House, because this House is important—but I do say that Her Majesty has recognized the important services that the hon. gentleman who now occupies the chair in this House and presides over its deliberations has performed to the State.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And I say again, a more deserved honour has not been conferred on any public man in my time than that which has recently been conferred by Her Majesty upon my hon. friend who occupies the chair. (Applause.)

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Hailing from the same province as the hon. speaker of this House, whom this House is now congratulating on the great honour that Her Majesty the Queen has been pleased to confer upon him, I cannot allow this occasion to pass without adding my voice to those of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken before me. I will not repeat what has been said of the good qualities of that hon. gentleman. They are well known. For my part, after associating as a parliamentarian, for 35 years with that hon. gentleman, either in the other chamber or in this House, I have always found him the same as he has been described by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I therefore could not help congratulating the hon. gentleman on the great and deserved honour done to him in the year of Her Majesty's Jubilee. I also congratulate the Senate on the honour done to them in the present instance. The honour done to their Speaker is reflected on the whole House. No doubt Her Majesty, in doing so, thought that it would be grateful to this House, and would intensify those loyal feelings which we all in Canada have for our most Gracious Queen.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (in French)—I desire to join the hon. members who have preceded me, in offering to the hon. Speaker of the Senate my most cordial and my warmest congratulations on the occasion of the signal and so well merited honour which has been conferred upon him by our Gracious Sovereign. I hope that this hon. House will also permit me to sincerely congratulate it on its share in the honour which has been conferred upon its Speaker.

The SPEAKER—Hon. gentlemen, I have already received from you many proofs of your kindness and courtesy towards me since I have had the honour to preside over your hon. House, and to-day I feel exceedingly grateful for your cordial congratulations on the honour which has been conferred upon me. But, hon. gentlemen, I do not claim that honour entirely for myself. I humbly admit that personally I do not deserve such an honour, and that the honour which has been conferred upon me is certainly intended for the whole Senate. Her Majesty undoubtedly desiring to acknowledge the loyalty and the devotion of this Canadian Senate to her and not being able to give to every one of you the consideration that you all deserve, thought that the most appropriate way of recognizing this loyalty and devotion and to show her regards for the Senate, was by granting to your president the honour of wearing for you on his breast one of Her Majesty's most honourable decorations. Although unworthy of such an honour, I shall endeavour, by my loyalty to my Queen and by my renewed endeavours to merit and deserve your esteem and consideration, to show that I appreciate the honour which has been conferred on me and the obligation on my part to maintain the dignity of my position to the best of my ability. I most sincerely and cordially thank you for the honour you have done me in speaking in such flattering terms of me. I accept it with the greatest pleasure. I have always tried to be as impartial as possible in presiding over a body like this, and I hope I shall continue to deserve your esteem. I feel quite happy that this honour is so well received by the House, and I am pleased to see that you all agree with me that this honour is not for me personally but for the whole Senate.

PACIFIC AND YUKON RAILWAY, NAVIGATION AND MINING COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In the absence of Mr. Lougheed, I desire to move concurrence in the amendments which were made by the Commons to Bill (F) "An Act to incorporate the Pacific and Yukon Railway, Navigation and Mining Company." They are somewhat important in their character, to one or two of them I shall call the attention of the Senate. The first amendment provides an additional subsection, to the following effect: That the construction of the railway authorized by this section shall not be begun until the consent of the Governor in Council has been given thereto, which consent shall be given forthwith on the happening of either of the following events: if the territory at the head of the inlet, known as Lynn Canal, has been legally declared to be within Canada, or if the United States of America will make a provision satisfactory to the Governor in Council for the bonding of goods in transit across the territory at the head of said inlet and now occupied by the United States of America and Canada. There are a number of verbal amendments which are of little consequence, and do not affect the principle of the bill. Another amendment is made that all the directors of the company shall be British subjects. Another important amendment is in reference to the telegraph charges. The bill gives power to the company to construct certain telegraph lines, but, as originally introduced, it made no provision for the regulating of the rates. The general law was made applicable to this, which gives power to the Governor in Council, when the telegraph lines are put in operation, to regulate rates. Then an addition is made giving power to obtain the right of way, the erection of poles, and so on, in the municipalities through which it might pass, or in which it might be constructed.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I would just point out one little error which I think was made in the committee. In the enacting clause they added the word "trading" to the title, but it has not been added in the title of the Bill. The error should be corrected.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I fancy that is a clerical error and with the consent of the House I would move that the word "trading" be added to the title.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is included in the amendments.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—But it is not included in the title of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Before the amendments are adopted, I would like to make a few remarks about that word "trading." I do not know that it is a wise provision to put in a bill of this kind. This is a mining and a railway company, and by adding this word it will become a trading company as well. We know that a great deal of evil has occurred in the United States by mining companies having power to carry on their operations by what is called the truck system, and a great deal of abuse has arisen in consequence of it to the labourers engaged in mining, and it is not a wise provision for us to put in this bill. The operations of this company are sufficiently large without giving them this other privilege. The original bill did not include the word "trading" and it has been suggested at the last moment. I move in amendment to the motion of the hon. leader of the opposition that the amendment which refers to the word "trading" be not concurred in.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that the bill actually provides for it and this is nothing more than making the title correspond to the body of the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand the hon. gentleman from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) he wishes that that part of the amendments made in committee which says "after the word 'navigation' insert 'trading,'" be not concurred in.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It does not affect the powers of the company, because I see they have the power to establish their stores and so on.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I think it has been an oversight in the committee in allowing a clause of that kind to go in, but I do not press the amendment under the circumstances which have been pointed out by the hon. Secretary of State.

The motion that the amendments made in committee be concurred in was agreed to.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

GOVERNMENT OF YUKON DISTRICT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (P) "An Act to provide for the government of the Yukon district." He said: I dare say a few years ago if any one had suggested it would be necessary to provide for a government in that distant portion of Canada, it would have been thought an extremely improbable occurrence. However, the discovery of gold in that region has led to the influx of a very considerable population, and it is necessary to make some provision for the maintenance of law and order, and for the administration of justice in that country. The government, in doing so, have undertaken to introduce a very concise measure, which looks rather to the administration of the law as it at present exists than to the making of new local laws for the better government of the people of that country. So far it is probable that nine out of every ten of those who have gone into that country are aliens, who could not under any circumstances take an active part in the constitution of the government or in the administration of public affairs. As they are within our territory—it may be temporarily—they owe obedience to the law and allegiance to Her Majesty. The government of the country, under these circumstances, must be in the hands mainly of the government here, and in so far as local government exists at all, that local government is one which, in the very nature of things, must be representative only, if representative at all, of a very small section of the population. The settlement of the Yukon country differs in a large degree from the settlements of other portions of the Dominion. Very few, perhaps none, have gone into that country with the expectation of becoming permanently domiciled there. They go there for the purpose of acquiring a fortune at as early a period as possible, and withdrawing from the country as soon as that fortune is acquired, and so it was necessary to keep in view that fact in the constitution of a government for the country. We have endeavoured to provide as simple a system of government as it was possible to provide. We, of course, provide the measure not so much as one of a permanent nature as a tentative measure necessary to meet the exigencies of the case at the present moment and until the government and parliament can acquire further information, and we may be in a better position, at no distant day, to alter or amend it, or to provide a system of government suitable to the circumstances of the country than we are at the present moment. So, what we propose to do is to adopt a certain district, which is marked out in the proclamation as the Yukon district, within which and over the inhabitants of which this measure is to operate. We provide, besides the constitution of the district, for the appointment of a commissioner. As we wish to make the system of government as simple as possible, we do not wish to convey any erroneous impression by the adoption for the chief executive officer of a high sounding title that might have the effect of misleading him with regard to the nature of the duties with which he was intrusted. This commissioner is to administer the government of the territory under instructions from time to time issued by the Governor in Council, or by the Minister of the Interior. We are dealing with this territory in much the same way as the North-west Territory was dealt with at an earlier period. We are constituting there a government. We are making that territorial government to some extent responsible, under the jurisdiction and direction of some minister of the Crown. The minister selected in this bill is the same minister indicated in the bill for the government of the North-west Territory—the Minister of the Interior—and he stands towards the territory in much the same position as the Secretary of State does towards a colony that is just struggling into existence. Then we have a provision for the constitution of the Council. Section 5 provides:

The Governor in Council by warrant under his privy seal may constitute and appoint such and so many persons from time to time not exceeding in the whole six persons, as may be deemed desirable to be a Council to aid the Commissioner in the administration of the territory, and such persons so appointed to the Council shall before entering upon the duties of their offices take and subscribe before the Commissioner such oaths of allegiance and office as the Governor in Council may prescribe.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that is the case you are reading from a different copy of the bill to the one that I have. In my copy clause 5 provides for the administration of the government of the territories by Order in Council and the Commissioner.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have a copy of the Senate bill (P) "An Act to provide for the government of the Yukon."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They are different copies. The one I hold is probably an advance copy.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite likely. It is marked "confidential" if it is.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The members of the council have no property qualification, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. There could not very well be one in that country at the present time.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They could qualify on the gold mines.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman will see that the government must select the persons, being British subjects, whom they regard as being most competent to form a council to assist the commissioner in the discharge of his duties. Section 6 confers on the commissioner and his council the power to make ordinances—a power that, under the British colonial system, was long conferred on persons standing in this relation. They are the council of the Crown, or the representatives for the purpose of discharging certain duties. Those ordinances are subject to disallowance by the Governor General in Council, the same as the ordinances of the government of the North-west Territories, and the same as Her Majesty has over the laws of the various provinces.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Can those commissioners fix the regulations with regard to mines? Would that be part of their duty?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think not—at all events not at the present time. These commissioners will have whatever powers the Governor General in Council may confer on them from time to time. The extent of their authority is a matter yet to be determined, as it was in the case of the government of the North-west Territories at the outset, and there is this limitation, that those powers can never exceed the power possessed by the provinces, but may fall far short of that, and the territories being under the jurisdiction of the Governor General and his advisers, and of the parliament of Canada, we take the power to confer by Order in Council certain authority upon the administrators and the council of the Yukon country. The extent of the powers conferred on them it will be impossible to say.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is it not defined in the bill?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it is not the intention to try and define it. That will depend upon the efficiency of the council it is possible to constitute, and with regard to all questions depending upon mere matters of fact, the parties who are on the ground will be consulted.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It is in a great measure tentative.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a tentative measure really, because we cannot at the present time be supposed to possess that amount of knowledge and that intimacy with the country which would enable us to legislate in the ordinary way, and in fact my hon. friends will remember that exactly the same provisions were in the North-west Territories bill when it was first introduced with regard to the extent of their jurisdiction in the government of the country entrusted to them that there is in this bill. Clause 8 of this bill reads:

Subject to the provisions of this Act, the Governor in Council may make laws for the peace, order and good government of the territory and Her Majesty's subjects and others therein, but no law made by the Governor in Council or the Commissioner in Council shall,

(a.) impose any tax or any duty of customs or excise or any penalty exceeding one hundred dollars, or

(b.) alter or repeal the punishment provided in any Act of the Parliament of Canada in force in the territory for any offence, or

(c.) appropriate any public money, lands or property of Canada without authority of Parliament;

Provided that this section shall not apply to any law extending or applying or declared applicable to the territory by any Act of the Parliament of Canada. K. Act, s. 7, subs. 3.

We do not undertake to claim any dispensing power. We administer the law as we find it, with the power to make those subordinate regulations through the commissioner and council which may be necessary for the maintenance of law and order and for meeting the local requirements of the population.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Will this council appointed to assist the commissioner have anything to do with advising as to or controlling the expenditure of public money granted by the federal parliament?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is quite possible that they may. That will depend on the regulations from time to time made. This is a tentative measure. We do not wish to tie our own hands, or tie the hands of the commissioner and council, in advance of information.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I might say, in connection with this matter, that in the early days of the North-west Territories I had the honour of a seat in the Council before we had our present form of government, when all the public moneys granted by the Federal government to aid in the schools and public works of that country were expended by the lieutenant-governor at his own will and discretion, notwithstanding that there were some five or six appointed members and members elected by the people. Nevertheless, all the money granted by the Federal Parliament was under the control and management of the lieutenant-governor who was acting in the same capacity as the commissioner is intended to act under this bill I suppose. That system was unpopular all over the country. It was termed "one man-power." I think the hon. minister is familiar with that term. The people took exception to the lieutenant-governor having the power to dispose of the money as he had a mind to. Then there was another matter found to be unpopular also. The persons appointed by the government were mostly judges, stipendiary magistrates since made judges. They had the power of making ordinances which they afterwards administered. That was also found objectionable on the part of the people, that those men who made the laws administered them, and they often differed in their interpretation from the other members of the council.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am much obliged to my hon. friend. I am pleased to get his statement as to the administration of the law in the North-west Territories which is valuable to us from one point of view in the preparation of a measure for the government of that country. There is one difference between the condition of things in the North-west Territories and the condition of things in the Yukon country. In the North-west Territories a large portion of those who went there to settle were British subjects, and were entitled, as of right, to take part in the government of the country and in the making of ordinances by which they were to be governed. The condition of things is very different in the Yukon country. As I have said, at least nine out of every ten of the population are foreigners, to whom the duty of legislating and administring could not be entrusted. Then, with regard to the few who are British subjects, they are not permanent residents; they have not gone there for the purposes of being domiciled. They have gone there for the purpose of becoming wealthy as soon as possible, and as soon as they have acquired the amount of wealth that they desire, they will then withdraw from that territory, and any permanent legislation that would take part in establishing would be legislation by which they were not to be governed, and would remain in force in all probability long after they withdrew from the territory. So that the condition of things in the Yukon country is somewhat unique, as it seems to the government at the present time, at all events, while everything is in an unsettled condition and when we are legislating without possessing all the information which it is important that we should possess, that we should retain as far as possible the power of legislation and of jurisdiction under the control of this parliament. Further steps in the way of decentralization may take place when a more complete information is obtained. Then I may say with regard to the administration of justice, we take the power to establish one or more judges who are to be judges of the superior court of record. The jurisdiction will be a general jurisdiction. It will include judicial proceedings in relation to matters of importance, as well as matters of minor consequence, at the present time at all events, and we have taken the power to appoint more than one judge, because we do not know exactly how widely the population may be scattered abroad and what may be the difficulties of reaching the various centres of population that may be established in that territory, and so it may be a matter not only of very great convenience, but of real necessity, that more than one judge should be appointed. At all events, with a limited jurisdiction, including matters from those proceedings which are had before an ordinary Division court with us in Ontario to matters of the greatest moment, with a population which, at the present time, so far as we know, is about 40,000, and which, if it should increase, would be a population very much larger than should be placed under one judge where the jurisdiction is limited, it seemed important we should take the power in the constitution of the court to appoint more than one judge if it was found necessary. These are the principal provisions of the measure, and my hon. friends will have an opportunity of examining it in detail and considering each of its provisions when we go into committee on the bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the bill is read the second time, I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to one or two clauses and to ask an explanation as to their real meaning, and as to the power which is given to the Governor in Council, and also to the council of that territoy. In the 4th clause provision is made for the administration of the government of the territory under instructions from time to time given him by the Governor in Council or the Minister of Interior. To what extent is power conferred upon the Minister of Interior in giving instructions? From the reading of the words it seems to me that the same power is vested in the Minister of the Interior, that is vested in the Governor in Council. It strikes me that that is too much power to place in the hands of any one minister. He may act independent of the council and independent of his colleagues at any time, and he may, under certain circumstances, carry that power altogether too far.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think the provision is the same in the North-west Territories Act and the Keewatin Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It may be in the Keewatin Act, but is it in the North-west Territories Act?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh yes, it is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it is a question whether it should be continued — whether the absolute power which the clause gives to the minister should be continued. It may have been in the old Act, but in that case you could reach the administrator or the governor, as he might be called, in a very short time, but in the present case there should be more care taken in placing power to too great an extent in the hands of a minister, where he could use it contrary or in opposition to the wish and will of the council, if the council had been considered before action was taken. I can well understand that, however objectionable, an order might be made by a minister, it would be a somewhat difficult and delicate task on the part of the government to rescind it; while they might secretly find fault with him, they would scarcely condemn him publicly; otherwise he would have to leave the Cabinet. I call my hon. friend's attention to that point, to see whether he could not so frame the clause as to prevent conferring upon any one minister, independent of the Governor in Council, absolute power, as it seems to me this clause gives him. If my construction of the clause be correct, it is taking extraordinary power from the Governor in Council and conferring it upon the commissioner. Another clause reads:

> Subject to the provisions of this Act, the Governor in Council may make laws for the peace, order and good government of the territory and of Her Majesty's subjects and others therein, but no law made by the Governor in Council or the Commissioner in Council shall,
> (a.) impose any tax or any duty of customs or excise or any penalty exceeding one hundred dollars.

Does this mean that the Governor in Council has the power to impose a tax, or duty of customs, or excise, or a penalty in any case not exceeding a certain sum? It does not seem to me that that was the intention of the clause; but certainly, in reading it, it can bear no other construction, because it says: "To impose any tax not exceeding $100," and "any duty of customs or excise, or any penalty not exceeding $100." The intention of the law might be made clear, if the hon. minister would make it read this way :

The Governor in Council or the commissioner should not have power to impose any tax or any duty of customs or excise.

That I take it for granted was the intention of the government. Then if the hon. minister would make it read "nor to impose any penalty exceeding a certain sum," I think it would effect the purpose intended. I may be wrong in my construction of the English language, but it seems to me that "or" applies to the one disability as well as the other one, and if I am correct in that interpretation, then it would give the Governor in Council, or the Commissioner in that territory, the power to impose a tax or excise or custom duty, provided it did not exceed the $100. These are the two points that struck me in reading the clause very hastily. As a whole, I think the bill is unexceptional, under the circumstances, other than those two points. Every one recognizes the force of the reasoning given by the Minister of Justice for the adoption of a bill of this kind, under the peculiar circumstances and the distance of that country from the capital of the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In reference to the North-west Territories Act, I find that clause four is an exact copy of section two. It reads :

The Lieutenant-Governor shall administer the government under instructions from time to time given him by the Governor in Council, or by the Secretary of State of Canada.

The Minister of the Interior is substituted here as he has had more to do with the administration of that country. Then, referring to clause eight, that clause is a restriction of the powers conferred under section 13 of the original Act, which is much wider.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say to my hon. friend that in practice the distinction between the duties of the Governor in Council and the instruction they give and the instructions given by the minister is pretty well drawn. One deals with very much larger and more permanent questions than the other. As minister, he deals simply with the question of administration of the law as it is. Then with regard to section 8, which my hon. friend referred to, of course the word "law" is objectionable as it stands there. It ought to be the word "ordinance," because the distinction is well settled in English law that an ordinance is a title given to a measure that has the effect of law but which is carried by other than a parliamentary body, and so where there are rules of the government made by a Governor in Council they are always called ordinances and never called laws, and we never call a rule or regulation made for the government of the community by a parliament an ordinance. We always designate it as a "law." I thought that change could be made in committee. Then my hon. friend suggests that clause "A" is ambiguous as it stands; that is that no law made (no ordinance made) by the Governor in Council or the commissioner in Council "shall impose a tax"—that is one negative or exclusive provision —"or any duty of customs"—another—"or excise"—a third—"or any penalty exceeding $100"—that is a fourth. It seems to me that that is clear enough as it stands, but when we go into committee if any additional words are required to make it still more clear I do not in the slightest degree object to adopting them.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—It is very difficult to discuss this bill in detail, because we do not know a good many points about it, such as the number of councillors, or the pay they will get, or where they will be selected from; but I might say that a great deal of the success of the government of that country will depend upon the commissioner that is appointed, and also upon these councillors, because if a commissioner having the power —as I suppose he will have the power—that the lieutenant-governor in the North-west Territories in the early days had, it will be of a very arbitrary character, and if he is a man of that kind, he may administer them in an arbitrary manner. Then, with reference to the council—and I am speaking now of my experience in the North-west—if the members of the council are appointed from the east here, having no particular knowledge of the country and not accustomed to it, they will be very unpopular. Judging from the experience of the past, my opinion is that a portion of this council which is to assist the commissioner in administration should be practical men from that country, and in that way there will be a connection of sympathy and intelligence between the government here, who virtually administer the country through the officers, and the people up there. I know that in the North-west Territories there was great fault found often without much cause, because the people there had no say in the matter, and that the ordinances which these men made the people had to abide by; they felt they were capable of taking part in the making of the laws, and if they had been permitted to take some part they would have been much better satisfied. That can be very easily understood. Men living in the country, who have had large experience in the country, would know how to make mining laws suitable to that particular district, and it would be wise to select good accountable men in the country—and I think they can be found up there—to help in the administration. They would then not feel that they were being governed from abroad. I think the government will find that a very good principle to act upon. Then I would suggest that in place of one minister two or three ministers should be appointed, because no one man possesses all the knowledge or experience necessary, and if you had two or three ministers to co-operate—

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The bill says the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I know what I am speaking about. The Minister of the Interior, as I understand, is to be the head of the Yukon Government here, and if you had a couple of ministers to assist him they would be able, by their combined experience and knowledge, to discharge the duty much better than a single minister. The great point is to have the people satisfied that they are being well governed and have something to say in it themselves—and I presume that no men going to that country will be sent up there for the sole purpose of acting as councillors excepting those who may be judges; I quite understand how important it is to send good men from the east—and if you have five or six councillors it would be better, in that case, to have some men selected from the miners—surely competent men can be found among them—rather than to have them all come from here. I think the bill will likely work very well. That is my opinion anyway. I realize how difficult it is to frame a bill to give the people such powers as probably many of them would like, but still, under the circumstances, there is no doubt this bill will provide the necessary government for the time being and it will be amended, no doubt, as circumstances may indicate or require.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I should like to ask the hon. leader of the House whether this bill is intended to confer on the commissioner in council the power to make mining regulations in the form of ordinances; will this power to make ordinances confer the right to make mining regulations?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not unless the government were to confer that power upon them; and I do not think it is contemplated at the present moment to confer power to make mining regulations. We are getting information from those parties, and that is one of the matters that I apprehend would pertain to the administration of the public domain. My hon. friend of course knows that we have never handed over to the North-west Territories Government, for instance, the administration of public lands or mining regulations. All these are still made here by Order in Council, under the authority of the Dominion Lands Act, and in the same way with regard to the mining regulations in that country, they still will be mining regulations made by the Governor in Council, and it is with special reference to matters of that sort that the power to make ordinances is conferred upon the Governor General in Council and upon the Commissioner in Council in the Yukon. Experience will show what powers can be best conferred upon a body there, and what should be retained under the control of the Governor General and his advisers here. That must in a large degree be settled in future by experience; but there are certain classes of questions that you may, with a fair degree of accuracy, say are always likely to remain here, so that this parliament can hold directly responsible the ministers of the day for the discharge of these duties, rather than confer upon them the power to shift those responsibilities upon some other body.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As I understand it, this Act only gives to that commissioner in council the power that was conferred, under certain circumstances, on the government of the Northwest Territories when they were first organized.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Very much the same.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They never had the power, and they have not to this day the power to formulate mining regulations.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Neither with respect to the lands or mining regulations, for the reason that the land and the mines belong to the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite so.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

LOAN COMPANIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

The Order of the Day being called:

Second reading Bill (Q) "An Act respecting Loan Companies."

Hon. Mr. MILLS said: I suppose hon. gentlemen have not had time to consider this bill, and therefore I would move that the order of the day be discharged and placed on the orders for Monday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I myself have not had time to read the bill, but those interested in it, I understand from my hon. friend on my left (Hon. Mr. Allan), do not take exception to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Very well, then, I move the second reading.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In introducing this Bill I said that I would ask that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce and I now make a motion to that effect.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the bill which it is proposed to refer to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, the hon. minister must bear in mind that if it is to be dealt with as a private bill it cannot go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce for a week, as notice has to be posted up for that length of time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is still a government measure, but there were parties who desired the opportunity of discussing it before the committee, and they could not do so here in a committee of the whole House; and I thought it was better that it should go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. We have dealt with other measures in that way. We dealt so with the Insolvency Act some years ago, and it occurred to me that it was a proper proceeding in connection with a measure of this sort in which a large number of influential corporations are interested.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I should like to ask if the bill is intended to be in the interest of the loan companies or the public, because I notice the gentlemen who are pushing it forward so fast are generally connected with loan companies.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My impression, after a good deal of consideration of the bill, is that it is in the interest of both.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In order to remove any doubt, I move that rule 60 be suspended with regard to this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. leader of the House would spend ten or fifteen minutes in explaining its provisions it would place the House, and particularly the members of the committee, in a better position to discuss it and judge of its merits when it comes before the committee, and it will be, I know, very gratifying to my hon. friend from Truro (McKay) to learn that it is in the interest, not only of the loan companies, but of the public generally. I trust there are provisions in it to protect the lenders as well as those who borrow.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This bill is for the incorporation of new loan companies by charter, and such charter may be granted to any five persons who are applicants. If it should become law it will serve the following purposes. It may be for the incorporation of a new company of shareholders of an existing company which has been incorporated otherwise by an Act of provincial legislature—that is, corporations which may be corporations of the different provinces. The parties interested in them may become applicants for letters patent under the provisions of this bill, should it become law, and may create a new corporation that will absorb or take over, upon the conditions provided for in the bill, such existing local corporation. Another object is for bringing within the provisions of the Act any company which has been incorporated by or under the authority of an Act of the Parliament of Canada. There are certain general rules and regulations—certain provisions contained in this bill that would apply to them that might enlarge their powers, as compared with what they had been before, or might restrict them in certain directions. Then it may be for the amalgamation of two or more companies about which there is no little difficulty at the present time by the creation of a new corporation, which would take over two or more existing corporations and make one corporation, assuming the responsibility of existing corporations. It also provides that certain clauses of the Joint Stock Companies Clauses Act shall be made applicable to these loan companies. There will be principles of uniformity in the constitution of these companies introduced which will be of no little consequence, and which the various loan companies of the country, or the vast majority of them, after careful consideration are disposed to favour, as tending to give to the public greater security against possible financial failure of such corporations than exists at the present moment. There is very little in principle that is new in the provisions of the bill. There is a novel application of recognized principles, and almost every provision of the bill may be found in some existing charter, or some existing statutes. Some of its provisions are taken from some provincial statutes. Some of its provisions are contained in acts of incorporation which have been carried through this House. All those I think have been proved by experience to be wise and prudent provisions. I need not enter into any detailed description of them, but if the bill goes before committee, I shall be able to give the members of the committee and to the House full consideration of them.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read a second time.

ALIEN LABOUR BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (O) "An Act to amend Chapter 11 of the Statutes of 1897 intituled 'An Act to restrict the importation and employment of Aliens.'" He said: This bill is an amendment of the Act for the purpose of furnishing an easy and rational method of proving what the laws of other countries are upon this subject. It is easy to see that, under the law as it now stands, if any one were to object to the enforcement of the Alien Labour law in Canada, on the ground that there was no such law in force, say in the neighbouring republic, there might be very great difficulty in showing what the law of the neighbouring republic was on the subject. They might have to send to the United States for an expert, or to Washington for a properly certified copy of the statutes on the subject. This bill is to make proof easy and inexpensive, and without this provision it would be well high impossible to enforce the law. I might say to the hon. gentleman that the policy of the department has been—because the hon. gentleman will know the bill last year to provide this law was not to be enforced without the consent of the Minister of Justice—the policy has been to treat our legislation on the subject as purely defensive legislation. We do not make the legislation, as they have done in the United States, apply to all countries without regard to what their laws have been toward us. The aim of the legislation has been reciprocal, to deal with the inhabitants of other countries in precisely the same way they deal with us. So if there is a country which has not legislated against the employment of Canadian labour, to that country the measure of last session does not apply. If there be a country that has legislated against Canada, or legislated in a way that operates against us, then we treat them on a footing of reciprocity. We deal with them as they have dealt with us. Regarding, as I do, and as I think most members of both Houses do, legislation of this sort as well nigh barbarous and only to be justified on the ground of self defence, we have adopted the rule that where we are let alone we do not undertake to enforce the law, and along the whole frontier, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, we have not undertaken to enforce this law at any point where our own people across the border have been undisturbed; but where our labouring people have gone to the United States and been employed there, and have been stopped in their work and sent back again, we have undertaken to deal on our side of the border with our neighbours in precisely the same way that they have dealt with us. On the Niagara frontier, and at other points where United States officers have been active in sending Canadians back, we have undertaken to deal with their people in the same way. How far we may be successful in this, of course is a question about which we are hardly in a position, up to this moment, to express an opinion. Whether we have the right to legislate extraterritorially is a question about which perhaps there may be a difference of opinion. At all events we have taken the risk of allowing parties to raise the question before the courts, whether we can declare that a Canadian has committed an offence that is punishable in Canada by going across the border and entering into a contract there for the employment of labour—whether that can be punished in Canada, I say, is the question about which there may be a difference of opinion. I am expressing an opinion on the subject at this moment. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. We shall undertake to enforce the law w herever it is necessary on the lines I have mentioned—the lines called for by reciprocity until we are hindered by judicial decisions.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is this question of the Alien Labour law to be discussed at Washington ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly if questions in controversy between Canada and the United States are made the subject of discussion before any constituted authority for the purpose of settling difficulties between the two countries, the alien labour law will unquestionably be one of the subjects for consideration. It is not a measure that we desire. It is a measure that we have adopted in self defence, and we do not wish to continue it an hour longer than self defence calls for.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is this difficulty in the way : Our representatives will find in negotiations between the United States commissioners and our government on questions of this character, the Secretary of State, who is generally the head of a commission of that kind, may inform the Canadian commissioners that they have no power, as a government, to interfere with a law of that character, and that all that they can possibly do is to recommend to congress the propriety of repealing legislation of that kind They have no authority as an executive or as a government. I know the answer that was made to the commissioners who visited Washington, during the existence of the late administration, when they urged strongly on the United States authorities the barbarous character of their law. They said that they had no power or authority, as a government, to interfere with or even to direct the legislation of Congress. All they could do was to recommend by message the repeal of a measure of the kind, and then it would rest with the people's representatives to say if they would repeal it or not. It would be the act of Congress and not of the government. In dealing with other great questions, the fisheries or the boundary between any portion of Canada and the United States, they stand in a somewhat different position, although any agreement on such subjects, if in the nature of a treaty, would have to go to the Senate to be ratified.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is labouring to some extent under error. Regarding the treaty rights of the United States, the provision of the constitutional law is that the constitution and treaties made in pursuance thereof, and Acts of Congress constitute the supreme law of the land—that is, they are a law superior in their sphere to the laws made by state legislatures.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, but they have to be approved by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But not by Congress. An Act does not stand in the way of a treaty. If an Act of Congress forbids the employment of Canadian labour, and you have subsequent to that Act of Congress a treaty which provides that there shall be no such restrictions, and that treaty is properly ratified by the required majority of the Senate, then it becomes a part of the supreme law, and to that extent repeals the Act of Congress. A treaty in the United States is a part of the law. It is not a compact, as it is with us, that may require legislation to enforce it. It operates as law as effectually as if enacted by Congress. So that, if we were to make with the United States a treaty, then that treaty would supersede legislation of this kind. What my hon. friend has in view in speaking of inability on the part of the United States government to settle such matters, has reference to state legislation. Congress cannot, it is said, pass an Act, nor can the executive of the United States make a treaty, according to their contention, which would encroach upon the authority of a state legislature. They have over and over again undertaken to protect themselves against the demands of various states by declaring their inability. For instance, some years ago the state of South Carolina had a state law that a coloured man, a free man, was not at liberty to come into the state, and if he did, he was committed to jail, and if not taken away within so many days, he could be sold and become the property of the purchaser. A British vessel ran into Charleston, and the coloured cook of the vessel went into the city and was arrested, under the statute. The British authorities complained, but the United States said it was an Act wholly within the jurisdiction of the state of South Carolina, and they could not interfere. Then my hon. friend will recollect the case of the Italians who were being tried in New Orleans a few years ago for some offence, and who were taken out of prison and put to death by a mob. The Italian government complained to the United States government, and the federal government pleaded their want of jurisdiction, but the Italian government made the same answer to them that the United States did to Lord John Russell when he said that the government had no power to stop a vessel sailing out of a British port to prey upon United States commerce. Adams said: "I have nothing to do with what you are able or unable to do. I say your duty to us is so and so, and you have no right to adopt a constitution for your government which will disqualify you or render you unable to discharge your duties." That was the nature of the answers of the Italian government to the United States. They said: "You must indemnify us, because you have no right to frame your your constitution in such a way as to prevent you from doing what is right." If the state of New York had passed an Alien Labour law there might be very great difficulty, but when Congress has legislated in this way, then I apprehend any treaty we may make with them, is we can get them up to the line of agreeing that people may be contracted with and freely employed on opposite sides of the border, will be effective notwithstanding any Act of Congress which may have previously been passed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is quite clear I did not make myself understood by the hon. gentleman. I thought I drew a distinction between an Act of Congress and a treaty entered into between the United States and a foreign country, which, I said, must receive the sanction of a majority of the Senate before it became the law of the land. I drew a distinction between the provisions of a treaty and an Act of Congress which imposes certain penalties on foreigners coming into the country, and the position taken by the Secretary of State at Washington was that that not being a treaty, but within the power of Congress to legislate, they as a government could not interfere further than to make a recommendation to Congress. That is what I intended to say, and I am very sorry I did not make myself sufficiently clear.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The gist of the remarks made by the Minister of Justice, as I understand it, is this: even if the alien labour law was removed from the statute book of the United States it could be put on the statute books of the several states. When the treaty of Washington was negotiated in 1871, in return for the free navigation of our canals it provided that we should have the free navigation of the canals of the United States, but the federal government only granted that in so far as they could use their influence with the states to get them to grant that concession. They did not assume that they had the power, and we never got the privilege in the Erie or Champlain canals.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In that case the United States said they would recommend the state of New York to grant the free use of the canals. The state of New York when we came to make inquiry, said there is nothing in our laws making an impediment, and when we made inquiries we discovered it was because of federal regulations, and when Mr. Fish was pressed he was unwilling to make any amendment in that particular.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The question of the Alien Labour Law is one of the most difficult to settle at Washington. There are questions which affect only Canada and the United States while the Alien Labour Law is a general law affecting all foreign countries. In fact, the Alien Labour Law was not directed against Canadian labour when it was enacted; it was against European labour, and I quite understand the difficulty there would be in the way of asking the United States to repeal an Act which affects the whole world and which affects only incidentally Canada. Nevertheless, both countries could agree not to enforce the Alien Labour law as against each other.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read a second time.

ANCIENT ORDER OF FORESTERS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved second reading of Bill (113): "An Act to incorporate the Subsidiary High Court of the Ancient Order of Foresters in the Dominion of Canada." He said: The object of this bill is to enable the society to establish an insurance fund and a benefit fund for the members of association. It is fully explained in subsection "E," which reads:

(e.) To establish a benefit fund, from which, on satisfactory evidence of the death of a member of the society who has complied with all its lawful requirements, a sum not exceeding three thousand dollars shall be paid to the widow, orphans, dependents, or other beneficiary whom the member has designated, or to the personal representative of the member as laid down in the said lawe;

There is an objection to this form of insurance, as I am aware, and it is doubtful in the minds of some as to whether it would ultimately prove of a sufficiently permanent character to justify their incorporation. The bill which I have in my hand is of a somewhat similar character to that which incorporated the Independent Order of Foresters, but there are furthers restrictions than are contained in the bill to which I have referred. It enforces upon the society the keeping of certain reserve funds in order to meet the demands it may be called upon to pay. So that in fact there are safeguards in this bill that are not contained in the Acts which have been passed incorporating other benefit societies of the character of this Ancient Order of Foresters. I may frankly state that I have moved the second reading and have taken charge of this bill for the simple reason that Acts of a similar character have been given to other societies which have not so many safeguards as this one. Had we to begin de novo, I should be inclined to be opposed to incorporations of this character, for reasons which I might advance, but which are unnecessary, having been discussed so often, not only in the committee of the House of Common and in the Senate, but also in the incorporation of the Foresters some years ago. But these concessions having been made to these benefit societies, I can see no reason why parliament should withhold them from this society, particularly as there are greater safeguards to the insurer in this bill than in any of the others which have been passed.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr MILLS introduced Bill (R) "An Act respecting the Identification of Criminals."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the bill be read a second time on Friday next. He said:

This bill is for the purpose of authorizing certain measurements of criminals with a view to their identification. It is known as the Bertillon system and was introduced in Belgium and known to be a most effective thing.

QUESTIONS OF ORDER.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL having been called to occupy the Speaker's Chair.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an entry be made in the Journals of the Senate of any ruling of the Chair on questions of order, and that the following special ruling given on Monday, the 9th instant, be put upon record, so as it may read as follows, immediately after the word "Debated," in the 44th line of page 386 :—

"And a question of order being raised, the Honourable the Speaker ruled :—

"The SPEAKER—When a minister is asked a question and when he declares to the House that he has answered it, and professes to have answered it fully, I know of no rule by which the Speaker could coerce a minister to answer any more questions, and I believe that all other questions which follow that are entirely out of order."

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—What is the meaning of the motion ?

The SPEAKER—The intention of this motion is very plain to every hon. member The object is to have one of my decisions as Speaker overruled by this House, and I hope I may be permitted to say a few words in defence of my own opinion and to lay my views before the Senate. On the 9th of May the hon. gentleman from Stadacona made an inquiry of one of the ministers of the Crown, and not receiving a reply to suit his purpose, he insisted for a little while on an answer and then a long discussion ensued, and finally a question of order was raised and I was obliged to give my ruling as Speaker. The ruling I gave was the one which is referred to in the motion of to-day and reads :

The SPEAKER—When a minister is asked a question and when he declares to the House that he has answered it, and professes to have answered it fully, I know of no rule by which the Speaker could coerce a minister to answer any more questions, and I believe that all other questions which follow that are entirely out of order.

The hon. gentleman for Stadacona, not being satisfied with the ruling—and of course he had a perfect right to object to it and I am not complaining of that—on the 11th of May called the attention of the House to the fact that the ruling I had given on the 9th of May had not been inserted in the proceedings of the House, and he cited some precedents in addressing the House in support of his contention that the ruling should be recorded in the minutes. I was obliged to give another ruling, contending that it was not necessary that the ruling I had given on the 9th May should be entered in the Minutes. The reason I gave was this :

I am of opinion that the cases cited by the hon. gentlemen have no analogy whatever to the case on which I ruled the other day. All the cases which he has just cited were necessarily entered in the Minutes.

I may say in advance that he had mentioned some cases in which the clerk of the House had recorded the reason of the ruling. In all those cases it was on motions presented to the House for second readings or third readings of bills, or on presenting petitions which were opposed on the question of order, and then the ruling of the Speaker was entered in the Minutes, as I believe it should be. Because every time there is a motion, or a petition, or a proceeding before the House, if it is not proceeded with there must be some entry in the Minutes to show why it did not proceed further, but I was of the opinion that when the ruling on a general discussion of a public question, or of an inquiry or question to a minister, that the ruling that may be given then in the course of discussion could not possibly, as I will try to show, be put in the Minutes. I will continue to read what I said before on the subject :

It was necessary for the clerk to mention in the Minutes for what reason the petition or the bill had not been proceeded with ; but in the case where a point of order is raised in the course of a discussion on a public question, or on any inquiry or question put to a minister of the Crown, I have no knowledge of any instance in which the ruling of the Speaker is entered in the Minutes. The ruling of the Speaker appears in the debates because it is necessary always that the discussions be reported at length. But I do not consider now that any decision given by the Speaker on such rulings should be entered in the Minutes and the reasons given for it. I believe the reporting of the ruling in the debates is all that is required. At all events I am entirely at the hands of the House. If the House decides that ruling on all questions in the House should be entered in the Minutes of course it will be done.

Then the hon. gentleman for Stadacona asked : "Then am I to understand that nothing will be done ?" And I answered :

"I believe it should not be done." The hon. gentleman then said: "I shall take the means to have it done." And now, by his motion to-day, he is trying to take the means to have that ruling printed in the Minutes, which would be overruling the decision I gave on the 11th of May. Of course the ruling I made the other day may be overruled, by the House to-day, but I may point out to the House what the result of it would be. I do not think it has ever been done in this House before, or in the House of Commons, or the Commons in England. If such ruling, given by me, was to be entered in the Minutes, it would have to be drawn up by the Clerk at the table, which it is not his duty at all to do, and surely the House would not impose on me the responsibility of the way it would be drawn, as I could not see it until the day after, when it would be printed in the Minutes. If we were to wait till it was corrected or revised, to be sent to be printed in the Minutes we would not have the Minutes until late the day after, and I do not believe the House would stand that. But, besides that, I think I am safe in saying that the ruling I gave on the 9th inst. and the ruling I gave on the 11th were correct, and approved by gentleman who have had more experience than I, and I believe they will support me on that. I can safely appeal to the hon. gentleman who were my predecessors in the chair, that it has never been pretended that the point of order, or the ruling in the course of a discussion on a public question should be entered in the Minutes. To be sure that I was not alone in that opinion, I took the precaution to see the gentleman who is generally admitted to be an authority in the House of Commons and the Senate and I asked him to give me a statement of what was done in the Commons or what had been done in England, and perhaps the House will allow me to read the opinion of Mr. Bourinot, who examined the two rulings I gave to the House. It is as follows:

When the Speaker's decision on questions of Order are formally entered in the Journals of the Senate or the House of Commons.

My attention has been directed to the following notice of motion in the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate, and I have been asked to state my opinion, whether the change suggested in the proposed motion would be in accordance with the rules and usages that govern the making of the Journals of the two Houses:

"FOR THURSDAY, 19TH MAY, 1898.

"By the Honourable Mr. Landry:—

"May 17—That he will move that an entry be made in the Journals of the Senate of any ruling of the Chair on questions of order, and that the following special ruling given on Monday, the 9th inst., be put upon record, so as it may read as follows, immediately after the word "Debated," in the 44th line of page 386:—

"And a question of order being raised, the Honourable the Speaker ruled:—

"The SPEAKER—When a minister is asked a question, and when he declares to the House that he has answered it, and professes to have answered it fully, I know of no rule by which the Speaker could coerce a minister to answer any more questions, and I believe that all other questions which follow that are entirely out of order."

Before considering the suggestion of entering all decisions of Mr. Speaker in the Journals, I may say that the ruling of the Speaker, as cited, is entirely in accordance with rulings in analogous cases in the English House of Commons. For instance, Mr. Speaker Brandt decided (see Blackmore's "Speakers' Decisions," pp. 272, 280), that "an answer cannot be forced from a member;" that "an hon. member can put a question, but he has no right to insist upon an answer;" that "a minister is entitled to decline on public grounds;" that "when an hon. member has put a question and received such an answer, as a minister acting on his responsibility thinks proper to give, he cannot renew the question." In the Lords, when a series of questions have been deemed objectionable, a noble lord has formally moved that "the question be not put," and the motion has been carried; and, as in the case of all such matters, the words of the question do not appear in the Lord's Journals. Neither do the questions or Mr. Brandt's decisions thereon, as given above, appear in the Commons Journals, but only in the Hansard Debates.

The reason why such entries are not made in the Journals of either House is this: only res gestæ or proceedings-motions or bills or petitions or returns or other formal matters requiring the action of the House—are ever entered. If, when an order is read, or a petition presented, or a bill moved (in which cases an entry is necessarily made by the clerk at the table,) a question of order is raised as to the regularity of procedure, and it is ruled that such order or petition or bill is irregularly before the House, the clerk also enters the decision in the Journals to show why no further action is taken in the matter in question. For instance, in the Senate, during 1887, the order of the day being read for the third reading of a private bill, an hon. senator proposed an amendment, but it was ruled out of order because no notice had been given of the same under the rules (Sen. Jan. 1887, p. 185). In 1889, a member proposed that the House should adjourn over until a certain day (Sen. Jour. 1889, p. 52), but it was ruled out of order because the motion was special and requested a day's previous notice. In the Canadian Commons Journals, during 1891, four decisions were entered because, in each case the ruling prevented further action in a proceeding duly entered on the Journals in accordance with the ordinary usage of the House. (See pp. 312 345, 411, 526 Canadian Commons Journals, 1891).

I find also the following entry in the English Commons' Journal of 1882: "The House, according to order, resumed further proceedings on consideration of the Prevention of Crime (Ireland Bill) as amended in the committee." An amendment was then proposed, and the following entry is made; "And it appearing that the proposed amendment would throw an increased charge on persons liable to the rate, Mr. Speaker declared the proposed amendment out of order."

In all the cases recorded in the English or Canadian Journals—and in some years there are no decisions at all entered—the entry is made to show how no further progress is made in a proceeding. All the Speaker's decisions arising out of debate must be sought in the Hansard or regular reports of debates, and not in the Journals which are simply records of proceedings (see Bourinot and May where the notes for the most part refer to Hansard). If it should be attempted to record questions or debates, and points of order arising thereon, then the fundamental rules governing the making of the Journals would be broken, and grave inconvenience would arise on account of the disputes that would naturally occur from time to time as to the accuracy of the record. The duty of the clerk, responsible for the Journals, is stated in these words by Hatsell, May and all other authorities. (See Bourinot citing Hatsell, &c., 2, ed. p. 216): "He takes notes of the proceedings, of the res gestæ, of the Commons; he is to make true entries, remembrances, and journals of the things done and passed in the House, but it is without warrant that he should make minutes of particular men's speeches." It is clear if decisions on all matters are to be given then the speeches relating thereto would have to be entered, if such decisions are to be made intelligible.

The conclusion to which I come after further study of the whole question—a question on which I have had never a doubt—is that the honourable the Speaker of the Senate decided in accordance with correct usage that the Speaker's ruling cannot be properly entered in the Minutes "in the case where a point of order is raised in the course of a discussion on a public question or on any inquiry or question put to a minister of the Crown." (See Senate Debates, p. 815, 1898.)

JNO. GEO. BOURINOT.

House of Commons,
Ottawa, 21st May, 1898.

I cite this authority, hon. gentlemen, to show that my own opinion was correct. It is now in the hands of the Senate to say if it is of the opinion given by Mr. Bourinot as to the usage which has always been followed, as I think my predecessors in office can agree with me, that it has never been pretended that those rulings on public questions were entered in the Minutes. The hon. gentleman from Stadacona desires that any ruling of the Speaker should be entered in the Minutes. It would be an innovation that would not be a desirable reform in the Senate in my humble opinion. There are some reforms which are certainly more needed than this one, but at all events I leave to hon. gentlemen to decide if the motion is to be carried, and I repeat that, in my humble opinion, instead of improving the rules and usages of this Senate, it would certainly cause great inconveniences.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. member from Grandville, or Mr. Speaker I must call him since he has resumed his seat, does not look at the question as I view it. He thinks I am seeking to overrule his decision. It cannot be overruled by the motion I make. I do not want to question for the moment the correctness of the decision. I am willing to accept it as correct, but I want it to be entered in the Journals of the House. If it is such a good decision, there can be no objection to placing it on record for our future guidance. Mr. Bourinot's opinion has no bearing whatsoever on the question. He might express an opinion as to whether it is advisable to have those decisions put on our Journals or not, but this is a matter which the Senate can decide for itself, without depending on any outside opinion and I don't see what Mr.. Bourinot has to say in the present instance. It is a matter of discretion with us whether the Speaker's decisions should or should not appear in our journals. If we do not want to put such decisions on record we will not—we will do what we consider proper or convenient, irrespective of Mr. Bourinot's opinion. Since the Speaker discusses his own opinion, I must say that the decision he gave and which is the subject of my motion seems to me very strange. I always thought that when I put a question, that question in se is either in order or out of order; and it is not the answer of the minister which determines if my question is in order or not. If the Speaker's view is correct, then it rests with the minister to say whether any question I may put is in order or out of order; he has only to say that he has answered it, even though he has not done so, and his answer will put my question out of order. It would be the decision, not of the Speaker, but of the minister himself; the moment the minister says that he has answered me, my question becomes out of order. That is the way I take the decision. What I want is to have that decision recorded in the Journals, and there is no power to prevent me getting it on the Minutes. Should my motion be lost, such a fact must enter our Journals. Carried or lost, in either case it will be recorded in the Minutes with the decision it recites, and that is what I want.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman assumes that a minister is bound to answer questions. Now he is not. I read the authority the other day, not from Bourinot but from Todd, in which it is pointed out very clearly that questions stand on an entirely different plan from motions. A motion is a matter the House votes on, but a minister is not bound to answer questions as a rule.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, I understand that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And he may decline. The hon. gentleman may bring it up as a motion of want of confidence in the government, or in the individual, or a reflection on the minister because he did not answer the question. That is laid down perfectly clearly in all the authorities, and there are a number of authorities cited in Todd. Todd says:

> Numerous precedents can be cited where ministers of the Crown and other members have declined to give any answer to questions which they considered to be unnecessary, inexpedient, unusual, impertinent or as involving matter of too much gravity to be dealt with by way of reply to a question.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is a matter which the hon. gentleman from Stadacona brought before the House.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. minister is out of order.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What is the point of order?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It has no bearing on the questions. We all agree to the Speaker's ruling. The question before the House is, Shall it be entered on the Minutes? That is the question, and the hon. gentleman is out of order in bringing up another question, of what answer he should give. It is not before the House at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Questions stand on an entirely different plane from motions.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—This is a motion before the House, whether we shall put this ruling on record or not, as I understand it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand the proposal made by the hon. gentleman for Stadacona, it is that we shall alter the rules of the House and that we shall have as a rule of the House that an entry be made in the Journals of the Senate of any ruling of the Chair on questions of order.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Have you any rule of the House that it should not be done now?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman shall allow me, I will try and make the matter clear. The hon. gentleman who has introduced this resolution said that we were a law unto ourselves, that what Bourinot, who is regarded as an authority on parliamentary procedure, said did not concern us, and that this House could make its rules to suit itself. Of course, hon. gentlemen, in one sense that is true, but on the other hand, this House is like other houses of parliament, and it must be guided by precedent and parliamentary principles. There is no House in England or in any English-speaking colony, as far as I know, where any such rule exists as the one which the hon. gentleman proposes should be adopted here. If he was of opinion that it was desirable to alter the rules, I submit that this is not the best way to have it done. The uniform practice of this House in the past, where it was thought desirable that a rule should be altered, has been to refer the question to a select committee to consider and report on the matter, and if the hon. gentleman from Stadacona was able to make out even a prima facie case in favour of adding this rule to the rules which we already have, I think the proper course for him to adopt would be to move that the matter be referred to a committee. However, there is no reason why we should alter our rules. The hon. gentleman has complained that the rules do not appear in the Minutes and that, therefore, we have not the record to refer to. But the references do appear in the Hansard, which is an official record of the debates of the House, and any hon. gentleman could refer to the debates and find the Speaker's ruling there, and as a matter of fact, it is more convenient to refer to the debates than to the Minutes, so that really no one suffers any inconvenience and there is no harm done. The ruling of the Speaker goes on record in the debates and if that were not the case the hon. gentleman would not have been able to bring this matter before the House. He has been able to give us the very language used on the occasion. The language is reported by the official shorthand writers of the Senate and appears in our debates. That is so far as regards the general theory of the matter. His Honour the Speaker has referred to the authorities cited by Bourinot. I have looked into some of the authorities, and found that they bear out Bourinot's opinion. I shall not undertake to cite the authorities which his Honour quoted. I just refer to the 10th edition of May, which is quite as good an authority as Bourinot. At page 196, speaking of the Journals of the House, May says:

> These records are confined to the Votes and Proceedings of the House.
> Without any reference to the debates.

This question arose during a debate and it had really nothing to do with the proceedings of the House, and May goes on to say:

> The earlier volumes of the Journals contain short notes of speeches which the clerk has had made without the authority of the House, but all the later volumes record nothing but the res gesta.

It can be understood that in the days when there were no shorthand writers and no official reports, it was convenient that the clerk should make minutes of the debates, but since the introduction of shorthand reporting, that is never done at all. I have looked at the cases in the Commons Journals in 1891, and I find that they are all of the character indicated by Bourinot. They are cases of amendments to motions before the House being ruled out of order, because no notice was given. There were amendments to bills, and the rule of the House required that notice should be given, and no notice had been given, and those amendments were ruled out of order; and that was necessary, otherwise the Journals would not show what had become of the amendment. The amendment is moved and appears in the Journal. It is the duty of the clerk to take it down and the vote on that amendment must appear, and if it is ruled out on the ground that it is out of order that must appear in order that the Journal may be a record of the proceedings of the House on the bill, or petition, or whatever it may be. Then, in Bourinot's second edition, page 216, the same principle is laid down as is laid down in May. Supposing that the authorities were not as they are, and that the practice was not as it had been, looking at the thing as though there had been no question or practice before hand, I think every hon. gentleman must see how impracticable it would be to do what the hon. gentleman from Stadacona wishes to have done. As it is now, the clerks at the table are engaged with their own duties. They have charge of the bills, they have charge of the motions which are made in the House and they have charge of the petitions, and are busy with those. If the rule suggested by the hon. member were to become a rule of the House, it would be the duty of the clerks to listen to the debates and to be prepared at any moment to take down the exact words used by an hon. gentleman who gave rise to a question of order. That would be necessary in order to make the Speaker's decision intelligible; and then it would be the duty of the clerk to try to take down verbatim the Speaker's decision. I think every hon. gentleman must realize that that would be quite impracticable and exceedingly inconvenient. In fact, we should have another clerk at the table for the express purpose of dealing with questions of order when they arose. It is quite unnecessary, because the shorthand reporters take the exact language used, and it is convenient for reference, and I trust the House will not introduce such a startling innovation as would be caused by the adoption of this rule. The hon. gentleman from Stadacona having, as he says, gained his end, and brought his question before the House and got it on the Minutes, I trust that he will not press the matter any further, and will not ask the House to vote upon the question.

The motion was declared lost on a division.

TRAVELLING EXPENSES OF MEMBERS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. How much did each of the voyages cost which were undertaken in 1897 by various members of the present administration to Europe, to the United States or elsewhere?
2. Are these travelling expenses the expenses incurred by each of the members of the administration individually, or do they comprise the expenses of a private secretary or of any other persons composing the following of each such member of the administration?
3. Who are the members of the administration who were accompanied by their private secretaries?
4. Who are the members of the administration who had in their service other persons than a private secretary, and in what quality were those persons employed?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I sent the hon. gentleman's inquiry to the several members of the government who had left Canada last year, and whose names I gave him on a former occasion, and I will now advise him of the answers I received from them. From Sir Wilfrid Laurier I received a reply that he could not at the moment give the exact figures, but the amount could be had from the Auditor's General's report when it was published. To the second question, the premier replied that he was accompanied by his secretary to Washington and London, and the accounts of the secretary will no doubt appear in the Auditor General's report. Mr. Dobell answered that he went to England on fast line business, and his expenses were $350. Sir Richard Cartwright sent an answer to say that he had his secretary with him to Washington, and the cost was $443.68—the joint cost. Sir Louis Davies was in England for some time and had a secretary with him. He was there attending to the Belgian and German treaties when the matter was argued with the Colonial Office, and also the argument on the fisheries and the questions arising out of the dispute over the Behring Sea, and his expenses were $1,211.81, private secretary's expenses $460.69. Those are the only answers I have got. One or two gentlemen said they were unable to give any answer and the accounts would appear in the Auditor General's report at the proper time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The premier did not give any figures at all ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, he could not recall them.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And Mr. Fitzpatrick ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no memo. from him.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—You forgot him.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I sent him a communication and he gave me no answer.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Well, he forgot.

BEAVER LINE MAIL COMPANY'S CONTRACT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before the Senate, a copy of the contract between the government and the Beaver Line Company for the carriage of the mails across the Atlantic, together with all memorials, letters, correspondence whatsoever connected with the said contract or its execution, or bearing upon the refusal of the company to allow its boats to stop at Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

THE EQUIPMENT OF THE MILITIA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. Did the Minister of Militia, when in England, cable authority to adopt the Oliver equipment ? If such is the case, what is the wording of the cable ?
2. It being reported that the Oliver equipment, as adopted, is materially different from the model sets sent for testing purposes, and further, that such an equipment is not the same as that reported upon by Major General Gascoigne, to what extent, in what particulars and on whose authority and recommendation has such a change been made ?
3. Does the price of $5,000 given for the rights of Deputy Surgeon General Oliver's equipment include a full settlement, or will he, in addition, receive a royalty on each set made ?
4. What is the name of the firm who are to manufacture the equipment ? What is the price per set ? What are the names of the shareholders in the company or companies who are to manufacture the equipment ?
5. When were the ten sets of the Lewis equipment delivered to the militia authorities ? When were they sent by them to the regimental depots of Royal Regiment of Canadian Infantry ? If there was a delay of three months in the distribution of those sets, why was this delay permitted to take place, and was General Gasgoine aware of this fact ?
6. Was any letter sent to the Honourable Minister of Militia by Captain Ernest F. Wurtele ? If so, why such letter or letters have not been produced in the return ordered by this House in connection with the equipment of the militia force ? Will they be produced ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was under the impression that it had been sent from the Militia Department to the Department of Justice, but I find that it has not been. I will make further inquiry on the subject.

The motion was allowed to stand.

TAXATION OF CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LANDS IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON inquired of the leader of the Senate :

If notice has been given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to select their land grant before the expiration of the term of twenty years exemption of taxation, under the statutes incorporating the company ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No such notice has been given. The subject is under consideration of the government and no doubt will be attended to immediately after the House rises.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT introduced Bill (S) "An Act to amend the Companies Act." He said: The object of the bill is to enable joint stock companies that are chartered, either in Great Britain or in other countries outside of Canada, and which are authorized by their charters to carry on the business of mining, on filing a certified copy of their charter with the Secretary of State, to obtain a license to carry on mining operations in the Yukon district. The question was put in the other House, and a suggestion was made to the Minister of the Interior that it would be convenient, as there were already mining companies that had charters in existence, that on their filing certified copies of their charters and satisfying the government that they were properly incorporated they might be allowed to come under the regulations affecting free miners in the Yukon district. It is simply to allow them to take out a free miner's license.

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the bill be read the second time to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Should not the same principle apply to other portions of the Dominion as well as to the Yukon? If a company regularly incorporated in England wishes to take out a miner's license in the North-west Territories, for instance, should it not be allowed to do so?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In British Columbia we would have no control. We can only control the licenses in the territories belonging to the Dominion. It was not considered desirable to widen it to any part of the territories beyond the Yukon. In the regulations issued by the Department of the Interior, the statement appeared that incorporated companies might take out miners' licenses in their own names. This bill is to carry out that purpose, to enable them to take out a free miner's license on paying the regular fee, which will be fixed by the Governor in Council.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The provisions of this bill might be extended to all portions of Canada where the Dominion controls the mining. There is nothing, I understand, in the existing laws to prevent a regularly incorporated company, organized anywhere in the British Empire, coming here and carrying on mining operations, as a company, in the same manner as individuals are doing; but if there is any advantage in this legislation to outside companies who desire to mine in Canada, I would suggest that it might be extended to the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My objection to that is that it would affect the fees of the department. We are receiving a good deal in fees, and if companies could be organized on the other side for ten or fifteen dollars to mine in Canada, it would not be desirable to give them the same rights that are accorded the companies which are organized in Canada. It was rather because the statement in the regulations to which I have referred had been scattered broadcast through the world that this legislation has been introduced, and the government have no desire to widen it.

The motion was agreed to.

SOULANGES CANAL CONTRACT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—On behalf of the hon. member from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed), who is absent, I have been asked to inquire if a certain return with reference to the Soulanges Canal, for which an order of the House was made some time ago, has been brought down—if not, whether the Secretary of State will take steps to bring it down as soon as possible?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Department of Railways and Canals was written to and requested to furnish them. I will make inquiries on the subject.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (97) "An Act to incorporate the North Shore Electric Railway Company."—(Hon. Mr. Owens.)

Bill (81) "An Act respecting the Montreal and Southern Counties Railway Company."—(Hon. Mr. Owens.)

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (128) "An Act further to amend the General Inspection Act." He said: This is practically a bill now of only one clause, and the effect of it is that where an article is inspected it shall be so branded that it becomes perfectly plain that it is of Canada make, and the letters V.R. are inscribed on it. The bill originally embraced a number of clauses making the inspection of certain articles compulsory, but they were all struck out in the House of Commons and of a very long bill this is the only clause that was left. It simply makes the inspection permissive, and wherever the inspection is made, it must be made by a proper officer and the letters "V.R." and "Canada inspection" must be inscribed on the article itself to show its origin.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have not looked at the bill with its amendments, and therefore ask the Secretary of State whether this inspection applies to all articles which are to be inspected.?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Any article that the producer or owner desires to have inspected he may have inspected. It is only permissive. If he desires to have it inspected it must be inspected by an official who has the authority to inspect.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And this evidence of inspection put upon it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, and no one else is permitted to inscribe the letters "V. R." or "Canada inspection."

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (140) "An Act further to amend the Militia Act." He said: It has been ascertained from high authority that in order to secure an officer of high standing for the position of major general in the militia, it is necessary to increase the amount that has been allotted to him, and the clause does so to the extent of giving him allowances not exceeding $2,000 per annum, as may be determined by the Governor in Council. The words of the clause are similar to section 37 of the Militia Act down to the words "per annum," and then those words are added, "and in addition thereto, in lieu of allowances such sum, not exceeding $2,000 per annum, as is determined by the Governor in Council." As it was before, it was $4,000 per annum in full of all pay and allowances. That is the change at the present moment. We have been advised that in order to secure an officer of such standing as head of the militia force, it would be absolutely necessary to give him this allowance.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (121) "An Act respecting the prohibition of the Importation, Manufacture and Sale of Intoxicating Liquors."—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

DELAYED RETURNS,

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the adjournment is put I should like to ask—and I do not like to be considered a scold—when I am to have the balance of the returns relating to dismissals? The Printing Committee have had certain returns under consideration, and they wish to adopt, as I understand it, the principle which has prevailed for some time past in referring voluminous returns of that kind to a special committee, of two or three, in order to eliminate all which might be considered unnecessary in the printing; for instance, in the same returns there are some thirty or forty or fifty commissions—one copy of those may be sufficient. It might be referred to, I understand, as a sample of the whole; but it is impossible even to compile it in small parts until all the returns are brought down. If there are departments in which there were no commissions, or no dismissals took place, all that would be necessary would be to say there are none; but in the Public Works we know there have been several commissions for the investigation of alleged improper conduct of officers and officials, and many dismissals have taken place. I do not wish to be continually calling the hon. gentleman's attention to this, but I should like very much, if we are ever to have them, to have them soon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was under the impression that the return had been completed. It was my deputy who was looking after it. I had spoken from time to time to him about it, and he assured me that we had obtained the returns from the Department of Railways and Canals. I asked him about the others, and he said that there were no commissions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If there were none in the Public Works Department, we might dispense with a return, but we know there have been a number of dismissals.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will have an inquiry made immediately and will be able to advise the hon. gentleman to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Of course the hon. gentleman understands me, that if there were no dismissals in a department, the official can simply put in the returns that there were none, and that can form part of the record.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 27th May, 1898.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

CANADA EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (94) "An Act to authorize the Canada Eastern Railway Company to convey its railway to the Alexander Gibson Manufacturing Company," with amendments.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved concurrence in the amendments. He said:—The first amendment is merely verbal, correcting a date. The citation in the preamble of the Bill refers to the statute of New Brunswick of 1897, and it should be 1898. The other is an amendment to the first clause, and is intended chiefly to protect the rights of parties, who have had dealings with the Alexander Gibson Manufacturing Company in the past. There is nothing objectionable in the amendments.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I understand from the gentleman who has charge of the bill that there is no objection to it, and I move that the 70th rule be suspended, so that we can take the third reading of the bill to-day. I may say, in explanation, that the solicitor of this company is in the city waiting for the bill to pass the House. He has seen the Minister of Railways, who has promised to facilitate its passage in the other House. He is anxious to have the bill put through, as he desires to make some financial arrangements as soon as it becomes law.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. WOOD moved the third reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a third time and passed.

ANGLO-FRENCH TELEGRAPH COMPANY'S PETITION.

REPORT FROM COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) presented the report of the Committee on Standing Orders relative to the petition of the Anglo-French Telegraph Company. He said: This report referred to a very important matter; it is for the laying of an electric cable from Vancouver to Dawson City in the Klondike country. I therefore move that the 50th rule of this House be suspended with regard to this petition.

The motion was agreed to and the report was adopted.

THIRD READING.

Bill (117) An Act to incorporate the Klondike and Dawson City Bank.—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

IDENTIFICATION OF CRIMINALS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (R): "An Act respecting the Identification of Criminals."

He said: This bill is for the identification of criminals by certain measurements according to the Bertillon system. It has been found by those engaged in the supervision of criminals to be the most perfect system yet adopted for the identification of criminals, and we think it is important to introduce the system in Canada, and to see that it is properly applied in the case of all persons who have been convicted of crime. We hope under this system that we will be enabled to trace parties who have been confined in prisons and penitentiaries after they are discharged, and have no difficulty in identifying them notwithstanding any change of name which they may adopt. It has been found to work very satisfactorily in other countries where it has been adopted, and I see no reason why we should be behind other countries in this regard.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

GOVERNMENT OF YUKON DISTRICT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (P) "An Act to provide for the Government of the Yukon District."

In the Committee.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Does this Yukon District include any part of the territory of Athabasca?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No; my hon. friend will see that it lies to the north of British Columbia. The boundary of it does not extend any further south than the northern boundary of British Columbia. It does not embrace any portion of Athabasca. There is no territory left intervening between the Yukon District and British Columbia. It extends westward to the 141st parallel and northward to the Arctic Ocean. The eastern boundary runs in a south-easterly direction until it touches the boundary of Athabasca.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Does it take in the Mackenzie River?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No; it touches the western boundary of the mouth of the Mackenzie River.

On the third clause.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—What salary will the commissioner receive?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We have not fixed the salary—in the bill at all events. There will be an appropriation made in the estimates for the salary.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Will this commissioner be supposed to devote his whole time to his office, or will he engage in any other business?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, we do not expect him to engage in any other business. We expect him to devote himself to the duties of his office. They will be quite sufficient to occupy his time.

The clause was adopted.

On the 4th clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I called attention at the second reading of this bill, to what I considered the extraordinary power given to the Minister of the Interior in this clause. If I read it correctly, he has just as much power as the Governor in Council. It strikes me that he should only exercise that power which is given to him by the Governor in Council. In order to make the clause plain, I suggest that there should be added, after the word "Interior," the following, "acting under them," or "acting under the Governor in Council," as you please. I quite concur in the views and intentions of the one who drafted the bill, as explained by the hon. minister the other day—that is, that the Minister of the Interior should only act as instructed by the Governor in Council, but any one reading this clause will see that it says "the commissioner shall administer the government of the territory under instructions from time to time from the Governor in Council or the Minister of the Interior," giving just as much power to the Minister of the Interior as it gives to the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Strike out those words "or the Minister of the Interior."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You could do that, or you could say "acting under the Governor in Council."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will readily apprehend the difference between the two. The functions of the Governor in Council, under the provisions of this bill, will be determined by the nature of our system of government, and the same way with regard to the functions of the minister. It is a matter which my hon. friend knows has been settled, and although it would be very difficult in a statute to undertake to define the line and say what functions belong to the Minister of Interior and to the Governor in Council, the principle on which the division of authority is made is fairly well understood. There are a great many things the minister can do without going to the Governor in Council at all. He does them under the authority of the patent which he received from the Crown. Take the matter of the administration of the public domain in that country; the Minister of Interior may find it convenient to give instructions to the commissioner with regard to the issuing of licenses with respect to mining and so on. The Governor in Council, having already determined, for instance, the question of royalty and the area that shall be included within the grant made to any party for the purpose of carrying on operations, the minister may give instructions to the commissioner to see that that law is administered. He may require him to do certain things in connection with the administration of the law which he would be permitted to do in the North-west Territories. He would not refer the question to the Governor in Council at all, nor would he seek to obtain instructions from them. My hon. friend knows the line of distinction which exists between the functions that devolve on the Minister of the Interior in the instructions which he gives to the Lieutenant Governor, and the instructions which the Governor in Council may give, and we simply undertake to preserve that freedom which has always existed in this matter. The same provisions will be found in the North-west Territories Act and in the Keewatin Act, and it seems to me that if the Minister of the Interior would be inclined to undertake the discharge of any of those duties which, under the practice, are held to belong to the Governor in Council, his colleagues would see that that was not done. But it would be a very inconvenient thing if he had to refer every little matter to the Governor in Council. I am inclined to think that there are a great many things that, in the course of long years, have been done by the Governor in Council which could be better done departmentally, and I would not like to interfere with the freedom which is found very convenient in the distribution of authority between the minister acting authoritatively and the Governor in Council acting in a somewhat larger and different capacity.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The language is, word for word, the same as in the North-west Territories Act:

> The lieutenant-governor shall administer the government under instructions from time to time given him by the Governor in Council or by the Secretary of State.

The only change is the substitution of the Minister of Interior for the Secretary of State.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My objection to that, is, that the governing of the North west Territories and the governing of the Yukon district are altogether dissimilar in character, and for that reason I do not think the Minister of Interior should have the unlimited power which this clause gives him. If my hon. friend will take the trouble to read the patent obtained from the governor in appointing a Minister of Justice, he will find there is no provision such as he has indicated. All that he is asked to do by that commission is to perform the duties of his office. And in the obligation which he takes, it is simply to perform his duties to the best of his ability, pertaining to that office, and nothing more. The Minister of Interior, under the present law, so far as it affects the North-west Territories or Manitoba, has no power to deal with the Dominion domain or with the regulations other than those powers which are given to him by the statutes and by the Lands Act. He has no authority to divert or change the provisions of the laws, to which I have referred, in the slightest degree. There is power, however, given under certain circumstances to remit or to grant patents that would not otherwise be granted if the law or the regulations were strictly adhered to. In such cases he has to report to the council and get the approval of the Governor in Council, before he can give the patents for the land in question. I am sorry to say that the government are adopting the policy of allowing the head of each department to be almost supreme, and consequently, coming in conflict with each other continually, a fact of which we have had evidence in this House when questions have been asked, and discussions have taken place upon the acts of the different heads of departments; we have found one minister taking one view and another minister taking the other, and we have constant conflicts not only of opinion, but in declaration of what has been done, even by the gentlemen opposite, since the opening of this House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A shake of the head does not alter the fact. What I want to press upon the mind of my honourable friend is this: I do not desire to minimize the power of the minister, but my experience has taught me that it is one of the greatest safeguards to the head of any department, when an extraordinary case arises which requires his attention, that he should not act off his own bat, but that he should have the approval of the thirteen gentlemen with whom he is associated, before he attempts to carry out any individual views he may have, or give instructions to carry them out. What I ask my hon. friend and the House is this: does not this clause give to the Minister of the Interior just as much power and just as much authority in the government of that country as it does to the Governor in Council? If it does not, then my contention amounts to nothing. I know that my hon. friend says this: "the intention of the law is that the minister, in carrying out the details of his office as affects the government of that country, should not be interfered with." I agree with him that that should be the intention of the law, and no doubt is, but the question is, does the law confine him to that, or does not the clause give him full, absolute power and authority under the constitution—if I may so term this bill—as it gives to the Governor in Council? If it does not, my argument amounts to nothing; but in reading the clause, I think it does; and with all due deference, I differ in toto from the Minister of Justice as to the functions of heads of departments, and I predict this, that if the government continue the system which they are carrying out at present, before five years roll along they will have got themselves into a mess that they would rather not have to explain to the country. I would suggest that the clause should make the Minister of Interior act under the instructions of the Governor in Council. If I were the Minister of Interior, I would much rather have it that way than to have to undertake all that by myself. Therefore I move that the words "acting under them" be added after the word "Interior" in the 4th line of the 4th clause.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is certainly labouring under some mistake. In the first place, my hon. friend has read from a statute of the North-west Territories, but it is just precisely the same as this. The Secretary of State performed those duties under that statute. The Minister of the Interior performs them under this. It is just the substitution of one minister for another. In every other respect the clauses are exactly the same. Now, as I said before, the functions of the Governor General in Council, with reference to the instructions which they give, are different from the functions of the Minister of the Interior with reference to the instructions which he gives. The Minister of the Interior has no prerogative rights at all. His powers are powers that are derived from the statute creating the office, defining its functions—derived from some Order in Council where the power of prerogative is conferred upon him by the Crown. Now my hon. friend will see that there are, as I have pointed out, in the discharge of his official duties, certain functions which he has to perform for which he does not require any Order in Council. Some of these functions are statutory. Where they are statutory the Order in Council could not override the statute and could not minimize the authority which the statute confers upon him. That is perfectly clear; and so the only form in which this can stand in order to prevent friction and difficulty is the form in which it is now. This form has had the approval of a good many ministers; it is copied from expressions which have been in use for I suppose a period of twenty years, something over that, and neither Mr. Blake, Sir John A. Macdonald nor Sir John Thompson, all thoroughly competent men, suggested any change in this particular. Now, you do not want, if you had the power, to make it necessary that the Minister of the Interior should go to the Governor in Council for everything it is necessary he should do in the administration of his office. While he is within the law he ought to be at liberty to give the instructions which the law permits him to give, and if he is outside the law his colleagues will not be long in discovering it, and seeing that when he undertakes to discharge duties entrusted to the government at large, his mistakes in that respect will be at once corrected. I think the clause is right as it is. It is in the same form as the law has been, at all events, since 1871—twenty-four years—and it is not in the public interest in this regard that it should be changed, and I hope my hon. friend opposite will not insist upon any amendment.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I would point out that in the case of the Yukon District it is an unorganized district. In this case the minister would be a law unto himself, and he could pass his own laws and do what he would like, whereas in the North-west Territories, which has been referred to, he works within certain Acts of parliament and his work is prescribed, but here he would have a free hand in governing the territory as he likes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend knows, so far as that territory is concerned, it has been nominally under the control of the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—This bill will cut this off from the North-west Territories and there is no law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is wrong in saying there is no law; the laws of Canada and the North-west will extend there as they do at present. If an offence should be committed there, that offence would be tried according to the laws of Canada and the North-west Territories, as they exist at the present moment, and the Yukon government, when created, will take over that country with the law that exists at this moment, and the law which exists at this moment will continue to be the law until there is some legislation here by statute or there by ordinance.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. member would read the subsequent clauses of the bill he would see that the Minister of the Interior has no power such as he says. Section 6 declares:

> The commissioner in council shall have the same powers to make ordinances for the government of the territory as are at the date of this Act possessed by the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories, acting by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Assembly thereof to make ordinances for the government of the North-west Territories, except as such powers may be limited by order of the Governor in Council.

The Minister of the Interior cannot override that in any particular. Then again in clause 7:

> A copy of every such ordinance made by the commissioner in council shall be despatched by mail to the Governor in Council within ten days after the passing thereof, and shall be laid before both Houses of parliament.

It will be seen, therefore, that the power is centered in the commissioner in council. Then the next clause:

> Subject to the provisions of this Act the Governor in Council may make laws for the peace, order, and good government.

Then again, section 9:

> Subject to the provisions of this Act, the laws relating to civil and criminal matters as the same exist in the North-west Territories at the time of the passing of this A t, shall be and remain in force in the said Yukon Territory in so far as the same are applicable there until amended or repealed by the Parliament of Canada or by any law or ordinance of the Governor in Council or the Commissioner in Council made under the provisions of this Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then if the hon. gentleman's contention is right, there is no necessity for this provision.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because he requires to give instructions to all officers who are acting under him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That can be done under order in council as well as on the minister's own responsibility.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. Take the Customs department for instance; there are thousands of letters written to the different officers, and so it is with every department, but that power is conferred on the minister, and confined to instruction, as to administration.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not think that this is analogous to the appointment of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State is the secretary of the government, and he has nothing whatever to do with the territory at all, and is, so to speak, a correspondent in regard to any matters pertaining to it. Now, the Minister of the Interior is the minister who has charge of the whole of that department, the administration of all the lands and the administration of all the mining, and everything else. This clause gives power to the Minister of the Interior to instruct the commissioner what he shall do. Now, if there is one complaint more pronounced than another coming down from the west, it is this: If you want to get a mining license or anything of that kind, go down to Ottawa; there is no use applying for them out west on the lands where they are; all that kind of thing is done down here. Now, if people come down from the mining regions, the Minister of the Interior has the power to instruct in his department what the commissioner shall do in regard to such and such things, the distribution of mining licenses or anything else. I do not think that the position is at all similar to the appointment of the Secretary of State, and it would be far safer if the Secretary of State were put in the place of the Minister of the Interior.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is mistaken. The functions are the same. The Secretary of State held, when he was the officer, towards the government of the territories pretty much the same relation, or a relation analogous to that, which the Colonial Secretary holds to the colonies. In this country these functions have been devolved on the Minister of the Interior some times, and some times on the Secretary of State—it depends altogether on what the party who prepared the Act, had specially in view. The Secretary of State is the organ of communication between all the departments and the government, and he may also be made the organ—and he was when the statutes were consolidated—of communication between the government here and the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories in respect to the discharge of his duties. From 1874 until, I think, 1882, the duties devolved on the Minister of the Interior; then, when the statutes were consolidated, I find that the Secretary of State was named, and subsequently the duty was again imposed upon the Minister of the Interior, specially, I suppose, because in the administration of the public domain, or the payment of the public moneys to the government of the North-west Territories for their local necessities and for other purposes, it was thought desirable by some ministers and some governments that the Secretary of State Department ought not to be made a large spending department, and so the duty was conferred on the Minister of the Interior. Whether it be on one or the other, my hon. friend from Shell River is confining his view to the ordinary functions of the Secretary of State, but in this case that is not the sole thing to be kept in view. There is the question of government as well as the question of official communication, and it was thought desirable to revert to the practice, which had existed in the first instance of making the Minister of the Interior the administrative officer. My hon. friend will see that in this there is no change whatever in the practice. There is no enlargement of the functions of the Minister of the Interior. The same words are used, and if one wants to see the nature of the instructions given by the Minister of the Interior, he must look to see the relations between that minister and the officer responsible for the discharge of the duties.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I have listened carefully to the discussion, and am more convinced than ever of the importance of the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition. The fact is, there is no analogy between the two countries to be governed. One is inhabited by British subjects; while the condition of things is entirely different in the Yukon district where, I understand, from the Minister of Justice himself, probably nine-tenths of the people are aliens. It is important, to my mind, that all instructions that are given that commissioner from Ottawa should be carefully considered, and we know that the Minister of the Interior is a very useful member of the government, but there are many other ministers in the government who have had more experience and who are greater statesmen than he is. And inasmuch as that is a country that is largely populated by foreigners, it is most important that the instructions should be well considered before they are issued, and I quite concur in the amendment suggested, that he should not alone have that power. It would be an easy matter for him to consult with his colleagues and have the matter fully considered. No harm would be done, and it would be in the best interests of the government themselves.

Hon. Mr. POWER—At first I was disposed to concur in the view of the leader of the opposition and the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, but after hearing the discussion, I have come to the conclusion that it would be a mistake to strike out these words, as is proposed by the amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no proposition to strike anything out.

Hon Mr. POWER—Practically the proposal is to strike out the words "Minister of the Interior."

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman says no, but practically it comes to the same thing. If you say he shall not do so and so except by the direction of the Governor in Council, then there must be instructions of the Governor in Council and the neater way would be to strike out the words "Minister of the Interior." However, that is a mere matter of form. I find it is not proposed to make any change in the law at all. This Yukon country comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of the Interior, and under the law as it stands now, the minister has exactly the same power which he is given by the fourth clause of this bill. I turn to chapter 22 of the Revised Statutes, an Act respecting the Department of the Interior, and I find that the third section of that Act reads as follows:

> The Minister of the Interior shall have the control and management of the affairs of the North-west Territories.

The proposal is simply to provide that the commissioner shall administer the government of the territory under instructions from time to time given him by the Governor in Council. You might insert the words "in matters to which the minister's jurisdiction extends." In the general administration of the government, the commissioner is controlled by statute law and by the instructions given by the Governor in Council, but in matters merely of administration the minister is allowed to administer his own department. That is done in the case of every department. Every minister has a right to direct his subordinate officers, and I think it would be an awkward and inconvenient thing to provide that, with respect to this particular piece of territory, the minister should not have the same rights which he has with respect to the other portions of the North-west Territories. The practical inconvenience would be very considerable, and I find that in the 6th section of chap. 22 of the Revised Statutes it is stated that the Minister of the Interior shall annually lay before parliament, within fifteen days after the meeting thereof, a report of the proceedings and transactions and affairs of the department during the year next preceding. If anything the minister has done has escaped the notice of his colleagues, it will come before parliament when his report is submitted; and I take it there is no danger of any one-man power being exercised.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is like locking the stable after the horse is stolen.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I should like to ask my hon. friend whether, under the powers granted by this bill, the Minister of the Interior would have the power to build the Yukon Railway and make no announcement till next session?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no, he would not.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—If I receive an assurance to that effect, it will ease my mind very much.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Does the hon. leader of the opposition withdraw the amendment?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. I will let them take the responsibility.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it would be desirable to have some statement as to the intention of the government with reference to this council. I think there was a great deal of force in the observations of the hon. gentleman from Wolseley the other day to the effect that it was desirable that on this council there should be some person familiar with the wants of the people in the Yukon district, and that some members of the council should be selected in some way from the people living there and identified with the mining population. We know how often it happens that when mere government officials, men who are sent from Ottawa, go into a region of that kind, they do not enter into the feelings of the people of the district.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have had a melancholy instance of a like kind in the case of Ireland. Ireland is not very far from London, but still for many years Ireland suffered a great deal from the fact that the administration was carried on by people who were not in sympathy with the population of the island, and I trust the government will intimate their intention to select one or two at any rate of these commissioners who shall fairly represent the mining population in that district.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has made a statement that is all right theoretically and, so far as possible, may be acted upon, but the whole population in that territory are a population that have not gone there to domicile. They have gone there to mine, and they do not expect to remain there for their lives. They are not expecting to become a permanent population, leaving their children in the country to occupy it after they are gone. They take no wives or families with them.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The commissioner will not live there during his lifetime either.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—When the North-west Council was organized, the government took the chief of the Mounted Police, a gentleman who was a lawyer by profession but was not practising his profession, Mr. McLeod, and other persons prominently connected with the supervision and maintenance of order in the country. They also took a Mr. Baillairgé, who resided at the Forks of the Saskatchewan, a prominent man, a chief, a man of great influence amongst the Half-breed population, so as to secure the confidence of that population and convince them that the administration of affairs of the country would not be unfair to them. The population, of course, was necessarily different from that which goes into the Yukon. The government, in the selection of the commissioner, may or may not take a person who resides in the territory. The nature of his functions will not depend upon whether he has been a long time in the country or not. They will depend upon his character and capacity, and his knowledge of public affairs. Then, in all probability, another party of prominence and of influence will be the judge who administers the law in the district. That was done in the North-west Territories. It no doubt will be done in that country also. That judge has been there for some considerable period of time, nearly as long as anybody else who has been in the country, and we believed, on account of his legal attainments and his knowledge of public affairs and in the framing of ordinances for the local administration and government of the population, that his knowledge of law and his experience would be of very considerable value. At the present time it would be very difficult to say who else would be selected. There is the chief officer of police, but he may be there for a year or two years, and it may be necessary to recall him and appoint another in his place, and whether he would be a suitable officer to be made a member of the council or not, whether it would be in the public interest or not, is a matter upon which I might not be disposed to express any opinion at this moment, nor could I speak for my colleagues in respect to a question that has not been fully discussed. I am sure any opinion which the House may express upon the subject would be very carefully considered, but I am also quite sure that the House would never think of undertaking to instruct the government in the matter of administration, to remove the responsibility from their shoulders to their own and to say to them who should or should not be selected where the population becomes large, and even for a temporary purpose, to a certain extent a fixed population, it would not be desirable to go outside for the purpose of selecting a council. There is no doubt about that, and I think that in the selection of that council the matter can be left fairly in the hands of the government.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Who is the head of the Mounted Police in that country?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Major Walsh is the head.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, but the active officer is Constantine.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—What position does Major Walsh occupy?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Acting commissioner at the present time.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Will there be another commissioner under this Act in addition to Walsh?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly not: only one. If he withdraws, another one will be appointed in his place.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—He is commissioner at this moment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, and he will remain commissioner.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It is highly desirable that this council should be selected from the people in that country. Surely there must be six parties qualified to discharge these duties. There must be a considerable number of gentlemen who have resided in that country for some time who would be qualified to discharge the duties of councillors. We all know that people do not like the idea of having foreigners brought into their midst and appointed to positions in authority over them. I think it will be well for the government to consider this question and to endeavour to avoid the possibility of having strangers or interlopers interfering with the legitimate operations of parties who have taken the trouble to settle themselves in that country. I merely throw that out as a suggestion. I know it is extremely difficult to convince people that they are not interfered with by sending strangers in among them. Even in Ontario we would not like it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Would the hon. gentleman apply that rule to the policemen, the judge and other officials?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—No, I merely apply it to these six men if they are competent men. You can state what qualification they must possess—that they shall be residents in the country for a certain length of time, or any other qualification you wish. It is in the interest of the government to select, if possible, parties who are there.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not wish to be understood as going as far as the hon. gentleman from Rideau goes. The officers indicated by the Minister of Justice would almost necessarily be members of the council, but what I ventured to suggest was that in making the appointments the government should, if practicable, take pains to appoint some one or two persons residing in the district and whose interests were identified with the interests of the mining population. That was my point, and I do not think that the argument of the Minister of Justice overturned the argument which I ventured to use. It is true that people are not going in there to spend their lives, as a rule, but the officers that the government send in there are not going to spend their lives in the district either. They are going there to govern the country in the interest of the population who are in there, as well as in the interest of Canada at large. My contention is that it is desirable, in order not only that the administration may be in the interests of the Yukon district, but that it shall be felt by the people in that district that it is in their interests. No matter how well half a dozen gentlemen sent from Ottawa or some other portion of eastern Canada might govern that country, the feeling would be in the minds of the miners there that they were not being properly governed, and that if they only had men of their own, the government would be more in their interest. It is in the interest of the government here, in order to prevent dissatisfaction, in order to prevent any danger of outbreak of the foreign population, which is so numerous in that district, that there should be one or two commissioners who would be looked upon as fairly representing the mining population. We have been governing that country from Ottawa; and we had a deputation from the Yukon this session asking that certain modifications should be made in the mining regulations. The mining population ought to be represented in the council, so that their views could be put before the government of the country without having to come to Ottawa to represent the case of the miners to the government here; and I am glad to gather, from what the hon. Minister of Justice says, that in all probability that course may be adopted.

I trust, if any other gentleman entertains the same views that I do, that he will not hesitate to express them here now, because the hon. leader of the House has said that the expression of opinion in the House would have a great deal of weight with the government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must express my surprise at the want of confidence that the hon. gentleman from Halifax has displayed in the government in the selection of this council. Had his remarks come as earnestly and forcibly from hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, they might be excusable, but for an outside pillar of the party now in power, it seems to be a reflection upon the government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A reflection on the government in the line of the selection of this council. I cannot go so far as the hon. member from Halifax. These appointments must of necessity, be in the hands of the government of the day, and if they do not appoint men who are well versed in the wants of that section of the Dominion, then they will be held accountable by parliament and the people. The views taken by my hon. friend from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) are those that are entertained by gentlemen who are interested in mining in that country, and have been put about as forcibly as the hon. gentleman from Rideau puts them. I sent a copy of this bill to a gentleman who has been in that country and is interested in mining there, and he advances this argument in a memo. on the bill—"These appointments will likely be political and will be made in Ottawa and do not provide that the miners in the country shall be in any way represented." What suggested itself to me, after listening to the Minister of Justice, was this: if these appointments are to be made from Ottawa and not made, partially at least, from among the residents of that country, then who is to pay them and what positions are they to hold as officials? I can understand the appointment under the commissioner of a judge—Judge McGuire, for instance—that would be carrying out the same policy that was followed by the late government in the council of the North-west Territories. The commissioner of that country was one of the judges and Mr. McLeod, who was a lawyer by profession, but who had been living in that country for a long time and understood the wants, wishes and peculiarities of the half-breeds, was also put on that council, and an admirable officer, one of the best in the whole territory, he proved to be. Mr. Constantine, who has been in charge of the Mounted Police and who has proved himself, I think I can safely say, a very efficient officer in more respects than one, not only in managing and governing the police force, but in administering the laws so far as he is vested with power in that country, and if I were to express an individual opinion I would say infinitely superior to the gentleman who has been appointed commissioner over his head—should be appointed. These appointments must be in the hands of the government, and it lies with them to say whether they will select men in that section of the country to hold positions in that government, or will they take men who are interested in mining. I take it for granted that the council of six will not be a paid council, that the officials of the government will probably constitute some of them, and then the others should be prominent men—men of character and reputation, who understand the wants and the requirements of the people. If not, you will have difficulties that will not be easily surmounted in the future. This is the view which I take of the responsibility which must rest upon the government, and they must, if they desire to be successful, act upon the suggestions which have been made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, and also so forcibly put by the hon. gentleman from Rideau.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In drafting this bill it was supposed that, if we followed the example of the hon. gentlemen opposite during the nineteen years of their experience, we certainly should not be exposed to such sharp criticism as we are met with on the present occasion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You would be perfectly safe if you would follow the example of the late government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The North-west Territories Act provides for appointments in the same way. We are doing exactly what was done by the late government, acting on the principle which prevailed with them for over twenty years.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—That is what I complain of, you should profit by experience.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We propose to avoid any mistakes that they made. I do not know why any one has a right to assume that persons of standing and position in that country will not be placed on the council. You must recollect that no one of any position or standing, has been in that country yet, for twelve months. Dawson City was founded only about a year ago. Many who go into that country leave it before the end of the year. Many who go there are unfortunate and leave it disheartened; others who are successful leave it with what they have made, never to return. It must be remembered that the mines are in the neigbourhood of the western boundary of the district and if there was a strike made on the west side of the 141st meridian, there would be a stampede in that direction, now that Canadians have a right to mine in Alaska. It must be remembered also that about ninety per cent of the population are foreigners.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There are in that country now respectable merchants and professional men who would make excellent councillors.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then we shall have an opportunity to make a choice. We are anxious to govern the country on the soundest principles. We are anxious that the men who are to assist the commissioners shall be men who will be acting in the interests of that country. It is scarcely fair to the government to anticipate that they will appoint what the hon. gentleman would perhaps call "heelers," from Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the danger.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not intended to do anything of the kind. I do not know whether the members of the council will get any remuneration. If they will, the amount will be very small, not sufficient to tempt any man to go to Dawson. That is perfectly clear. The government necessarily would be guided, in the selection of those men, by the best that they could find. The principal number would be taken, of course, from their own officials, for the present at all events, until men of position and standing have establishments out there. Where a population is so migratory it would be difficult to select men suitable for the position.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—One of the best features of the bill is that its object is to give local control. I agree with the hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Power) that the Yukon district ought to be governed by people who are interested in its future and in harmony with public sentiment in that country. This bill is a step in the right direction. I hope it will carry, because we want that country to be governed, not from Ottawa, which would be impossible, but in the country itself. The commissioner and judge and some of the merchants of the place, if selected, would be a good council, and I hope that the government will not consider for a moment the sending of men from here to act in that country, men who would not be in harmony with the people of the country and would not know what they were doing. I am strongly in favour of the bill and hope it will be made a very good measure before it leaves the Senate. What will become of the gold commissioner when this bill passes?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The commissioner in charge of the mines will be an officer under the commissioner.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is it the intention to pay those six members of the council?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That has not been considered. It is not likely that they will be paid a sum which would be an inducement for them to go there and take the office.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 6.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—With regard to this clause is there no power given to this council to levy taxation?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. I would say to my hon. friend that it would be an unheard of proceeding, under the British parliamentary system, to give to a nominated council power to tax. It has never been done. When the council was created under the Quebec Act of 1774, the power of taxation was not given to them. If they create municipal bodies, those bodies will have power to tax.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Take the sanitary question, who is to pay for the expenditure for sewage? Unless they have power to levy a rate how will the money be obtained, and the question of sewage in a city like Dawson is a matter of importance.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that:

> The Commissioner in Council shall have the same powers to make ordinances for the government of the territory as are at the date of this Act possessed by the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories, acting by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Assembly thereof to make ordinances for the government of the North-west Territories, except as such powers may be limited by order of the Governor in Council.

There are no powers of taxation; but if this council, in the exercise of their powers, create or authorize the establishment of a municipal council for Dawson, that body would have the power, if elected by the people there, to impose taxes and to make improvements. This council will not have any such power, as it would be wholly contrary to our notion that taxes are a gift or grant on the part of the population out of their own moneys, and as this council is not a body created by election, but nominated by the Crown, it has not the power of taxation.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I would ask the government then that they should lose no time in moving towards having local taxation in that country. Mr. Livernash, at a public meeting in the theatre here, said that the United States trading companies, who carry all the gold of the country, pay no taxation at all, and if royalty is to be charged on gold mined in the territory, the banks and those companies ought to pay the royalty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I notice the question of draining has been brought up at Dawson at a public meeting, and it was conceded that there was no power to impose taxation, but an appeal was made to the people, and they all responded to it and agreed to improve the sanitary arrangements by mutual consent, recognizing that there was no power in the country to tax unless they were organized.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 8.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the reading of subsection A, which is ambiguous, and I would suggest to him that it be made to read shall not have power "to impose any tax or any duties of customs or duties of excise or impose any penalty exceeding $100."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, it means that; and I would say that we would require to make certain amendments in this, as mentioned the other day, by inserting the word "ordinances" instead of the word "laws" in the second line, I move that "ordinance" be substituted for "laws" in that line, and also in the line 14, and also that subsection A be made to read "impose any tax or any duty of customs or excise or any penalty exceeding $100."

The motion was agreed to, and the clause, as amended, was adopted.

On section 9.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In line 31, strike out the words "any law or."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, and add the words after "civil and criminal matters" the words "and the ordinances" and I move that this amendment be inserted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I find in memos I have here from a miner, speaking of penalties, says, that a penalty of $100 is often a very small fine in that country, that it is similar to about $10 in this country; the question is whether it would not be advisable to increase that penalty. There the pay of a labouring man is $10 a day, and what this miner points out is that for the commission of some offences, $100 is often a small fine.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They would still be liable to the provisions of the statutes of Canada.

The motion was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 10.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the third line of clause ten we are told this court "shall be called a territorial court." Should it not be called "the territorial court"?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not object to the definite article there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think this clause is objectionable, in this respect, that it permits the appointment of "one or more judges."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, it is impossible to say whether one judge is sufficient or not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There should be some limit. The Governor in Council might appoint a very large number.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is the restriction, we cannot appoint a judge without providing the salary; we have no legal power to make an appointment without salary, and when the Crown exercises the power of appointing a salaried officer it must come first to parliament and ask for the salary. We shall probably ask this session for two judges, but we do not know that we will require to appoint more than one, but we shall certainly have to ask parliament for the necessary appropriation.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—If you find it necessary to have more, cannot you amend this next year?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think we had better not have more impediment in our way than necessary. This district will extend over a length of, say, perhaps from here to the Detroit River, and it would be utterly impossible for one man to administer justice over that extent of country, so if we find it necessary to appoint two we may appoint two; but if it were necessary to appoint more than two, then we could not do that without coming down to parliament again and asking for an additional salary, and we would need to change this clause, and so I think it is more advantageous that it should be left in its present form.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I take it you have no power to appoint either a second judge; you have one there for whom the salary is provided by law, but you could not appoint any other till the law had been passed providing his salary.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see there is a bill before the House of Commons for that very purpose now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—For this territory?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Including this country—yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not know that.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—This clause, as I understand it, does not preclude the commissioner from practising on his own account. It says the judge shall not hold any other office of emolument in the service of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would like to ask the hon. gentleman before whom he would practise.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the second judge.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 13.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Will the commissioner have the power to appoint sheriffs?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That would depend upon the regulations made The Governor in Council may appoint such officers of the court as may be deemed necessary, and may define and specify the duties. The words "and emoluments" are not supposed to be in the bill in this House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That will be added in the other House.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 15.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Clause 10 says that the court shall be the Territorial Court, and I think that is the name we should preserve, instead of calling it the Superior Court.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, certainly. The words "Supreme Court" should be struck out in that clause, leaving it "Territorial Court."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the name of the court in the Northwest Territories, the Supreme Court?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I think so.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 20.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Supposing the commissioner were to die suddenly, communications are not very easy with the Yukon country and the government should provide another officer to replace him until the government named another commissioner.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—We are getting a telegraph line in there.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think it would be perhaps as well not to make any special provision. We have no such provision in any of the provinces or the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Supposing the commissioner dies suddenly, there would be no commissioner in authority there.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We expect to have telegraph communication at a very early day.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—It is a country where the people are much more troublesome than in our own provinces.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There might be a provision that the senior judge, for the time being, should act as commissioner in case of the death of the commissioner.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Just as they do in the case of absence from the province of a Lieutenant Governor.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If a Lieutenant-Governor dies, the information is received by the government immediately, and they can appoint an administrator.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The senior member of the council would do.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We can provide in the 21st clause that in case of the death of the commissioner ——

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Or absence.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that the resignation or absence of the commissioner could only be with the knowledge of the government, and I propose to confine it to the case of the death of the commissioner. In that case the senior member of council shall act until his successor is appointed. I move that the clause be amended accordingly.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Will the commissioner, after this becomes law, have the right to issue permits for the sale of liquor in the Yukon district?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He will have the power that the Governor in Council may confer upon him. This bill confers no power, but it gives the right to the Governor in Council to confer powers on the commissioner.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Under the North-west Territories Act, the Lieutenant Governor had power to grant permission to bring liquor into the Territories, but not to sell it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was by statute.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Will the same apply to the commissioner of the Yukon district?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This bill confers no definite power of any kind. We take the power to confer upon the commissioner, in his administrative capacity, by Order in Council, such power as we may think necessary, and that will depend wholly upon the action of the Governor in Council. If the Governor in Council bestow power to issue permits or withhold it, they can do so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the minister will see that he has given, by the 6th clause, the same powers to the Commissioner in Council that are now exercised by the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories, acting with the advice and consent of his council. Now, the council of the North-west Territories have the power to permit liquor to be sold in the Territories.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that the concluding words are "except such powers shall be limited by the Governor in Council."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You can certainly limit them.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Then, the fact is he has the power, but you can limit it if you wish. I understand that the council of the North-west Territories have no power to issue permits for the sale of liquor except for mechanical and other such purposes. Will it be the same in this case?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If I remember rightly, in the North-west Territories the Lieutenant Governor acted in that matter without the advice of his council.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Under this bill the Commissioner in Council will have power: the commissioner cannot act alone.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—But the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories never issued a permit for the sale of liquor, and liquor could not be sold in the North-west Territories under permit from the government until such time as the council of the North-west Territories had power to regulate the same by license.

The clause was adopted as amended.

Hon. Mr. KING, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed under a suspension of the rules.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (S) "An Act to amend the Companies Act." He said: As I explained yesterday, this bill is to allow mining companies incorporated outside of Canada to do business in the Yukon district by filing with the government a certified copy of their charter and obtaining a license.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We are not supposed to commit ourselves to the principle of this bill by reading it the second time to-day, but I wish to call the attention of the government to the fact that those charters which are granted in England, under the Companies Act, some times contain very objectionable provisions, and I have grave doubts as to the wisdom of allowing a company, which is composed largely of Canadians and which is to operate in Canada, to act under charters granted under the Companies Act in England. I happen to be aware of the case of one company, whose operations are chiefly in the city of Halifax, who were refused a charter by this parliament and who went over to England and got a charter giving them powers that no parliament or legislature in Canada would dream of giving them. There might be no danger in the case of companies that are proposed to be dealt with by the measure that is now before the House, but I do not think it goes without saying that we should, as a matter of course, accept the charters granted in England. The powers given under the charter to which I refer were most extraordinary and unreasonable, and unfair to the shareholders living in Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This bill does not authorize them to exercise the powers granted under their charters. It simply enables the government to give them a license to mine, and the privilege is restricted to that only, and they would have no powers outside of those conferred by the license other than now exist under the law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not seem to me that this bill would give any of the extraordinary powers referred to by the hon. member for Halifax. It only enables the government to grant a company that has been organized under the law of the parliament of the United Kingdom the right to carry on mining operations. That is all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is all. It was drawn carefully with that object in view.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They could not exercise the powers given to them by their Act of incorporation. My suggestion the other day was that I could see no reason why similar privileges should not be given to such companies to mine in the Saskatchewan and throughout the North-west Territories. My hon. friend said that it might interfere with the revenues of the country, that is, they impose a license upon all parties who asked permission to mine on the Saskatchewan. So they do in the Yukon territory. No man can get out a license there for the exercising of the functions of a mining company, or engaging in a mining operation; why should not a company be permitted to take out a license in the North-west Territories to carry on operations? These companies are wealthy, and as wealthy companies they would be apt to spend more money in the North-west Territories than any individual who might take out a license.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The reason for the bill is this, that the mining regulations that were issued in January last read as follows :

> Free miner shall mean a male or female over the age of eighteen, but not under that age, or joint stock company, named in, and lawfully possessed of a valid existing free miners' certificate, and no other.

As the Minister of the Interior had in the regulations provided that a joint stock company, if registered in Canada, could take out a free miner's license, it became necessary to adopt this bill. I desire to restrict it as much as possible, because I felt it was interfering considerably with the revenue of the Secretary of State's Department. The revenues have recently increased nearly one-half. It would only become necessary for things of this kind to get abroad over the country, and then we could not make a change very well, and so we restricted it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not take very long for a company to get a charter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Two months.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not think it took so long. Then, the Secretary of State's Department should accelerate their mode of action. I do not speak against the Secretary of State, but I think some change ought to be made whereby a charter could be obtained in a much shorter time. It is altogether unreasonable that it should take two months to get a charter for a joint stock company. I am not so much troubled about the revenue, although, of course, I should like to see the revenue of the Secretary of State's office as large as possible, but I think this practice would be liable to very serious abuse, and the cause which I referred to illustrates that point. Those gentlemen can get a charter from the government here at a very reasonable figure, and in a reasonable time, and I have grave doubts as to the policy of allowing them to come here and operate under charters granted in the old country. I do not think that a company incorporated under our Joint Stock Companies Act would be allowed to operate in England, and I am very doubtful about the policy of the measure, because, as I say, the case which came under my notice was a most glaring one, and I can see that the same objection might arise in the case of a mining company as in the case of a manufacturing company. The hon. Secretary of State says that it only authorizes them to take out a license to mine. If you recognize the English joint stock companies here, you have to recognize them for all purposes. You have to allow them to trade and make contracts and do other acts. They will not be satisfied to be recognized merely for the purpose of taking out a license. Having taken out the license, they go and mine and make contracts with the people in mining regions, and so on, and I hope the government will think over this point before they go into committee with the bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Perhaps my hon. friend, the leader of the House, will be able to tell me whether a Canadian company can take out a miner's license in the name of the corporation, or must it be in the name of one of their officers?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, a Canadian company can do it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was under the impression that they might have to take out the miner's license in the name of one of their officers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will just read from the regulations: "Joint stock companies shall mean any company incorporated for mining purposes under a Canadian charter or licensed by the government of Canada."

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. member for Halifax seems to raise rather a large question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This bill does not touch it at all.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The point that the hon. gentleman makes is that a joint stock company chartered in England, should not have powers in Canada. We have introduced a bill here called the Loan Companies Act, which proposes to allow companies formed in the provinces to come under Dominion legislation. The same objection might be raised against that if the principle laid down by my hon. friend from Halifax should prevail. I think till some very glaring thing should occur to cause us to amend the law, it would be advisable for us not to do so.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (128) "An Act further to amend the General Inspection Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This bill consists of but one clause, which provides that where any package has been inspected, the letters "V. R." shall be stamped on it and the words "Canada Inspection." It is merely permissive and provides also that no one, except the legally appointed inspector, can inscribe those marks on a package under penalty.

Hon. Mr. DEVER, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (140) "An Act further to amend the Militia Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is also a bill of one clause. The object of it is really to authorize an addition of $2,000 to the allowance of the officer who is placed at the head of the Canadian militia. It has been intimated that if we are to expect an officer of high standing and large experience, the salary at present is not sufficient, and this simply authorizes the allowance up to the figure I have named.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suppose you will guarantee that we will have a major general with whom we will have no difficulty in the future?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We will try.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will you guarantee that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am afraid I could not give any guarantee.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (144) "An Act further to amend the Indian Act."—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (131) "An Act to amend the Acts respecting the North-west Territories"—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

LAND TITLES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (132) "An Act further to amend the Land Titles Act, 1894."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the bill be read the second time on Monday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As we have very little time at our disposal before prorogation, I think it would be advisable if the hon. gentleman would inform the Senate what the contents of the bill are. And while I am on my feet, I would urge the absolute necessity for having these bills promptly printed and laid before us. Unfortunately, at the close of the session, we generally have the most important bills before us, and to-day we passed the second reading of a bill without knowing what it was.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That bill was very simple. This is more complex, and I would suggest that we take the several stages at the next meeting. It is a longer bill.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is the Torrens Title, I suppose?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I think it is.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Well is it the Torrens Title?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, all that territory is under the Torrens Title.

The motion was agreed to.

GRANT OF LAND TO NORTH-WEST MILITIA FORCE BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (133) "An Act to make further provision respecting grants of land to members of the militia force on active service in the North-west."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move that the bill be read the second time on Monday next. The title of the bill is indicative of its provisions. There is only one clause, which reads as follows :

1. Notwithstanding any limits of time prescribed in chapter 73 of the statutes of 1885, or in chapter 29 of the statutes of 1886, or in chapter 13 of the statutes of 1891, or in chapter 6 of the statutes of 1892, or in chapter 3 of the statutes of 1893, or in chapter 24 of the statutes of 1894, the Governor in Council may grant a free homestead or scrip, as therein provided, to any person who is entitled thereto under the said Acts, or any of them, but has not already been granted such homestead or scrip; Provided that such person complies within two years after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, with the conditions required by the said Acts or any of them, to be complied with on or before the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-six ; Provided, also, that the provisions of the said Acts shall, as far as applicable, apply to grants of land or scrip under the authority of this Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is just an extension of time, is it ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. The parties who have not availed themselves of the rights they might possibly have had under the statutes referred to, will be given an opportunity.

The motion was agreed to.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (130) "An Act further to amend the Dominion Lands Act."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the bill be read the second time on Monday next. The first clause relates to the cases of co-operative farming associations, the next is to regulate the second homestead entries, and the next is a provision relating to land surveyors, penalty for illegally having possession of land marks ; a homesteader may select part of quarter section ; exchange of Crown lands between Manitoba and Canada ; disposal of arid lands ; disposal of lands when sale has been cancelled ; ejectment of persons wrongfully in possession of Dominion lands.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (145) "An Act further to amend the Railway Act.

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the bill be read the second time on Monday next. The attention of the minister has recently been called to the fact that where transportation of goods is partly by rail and partly by vessel, they lose the control of any regulation over the rates, and it is to provide, if the transportation of the article is by water and rail, that they may still exercise the supervision.

The motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (110) "An Act further to amend the Post Office Act."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move that the bill be read the second time on Tuesday next. Hon. gentlemen know pretty well what the provisions are. It is to abolish the free transportation of newspapers and it makes some other regulations which would require time to explain to the House. I promise to give the House a full explanation of the bill and the reasons for adopting the provisions, when we meet again on Tuesday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman inform me whether the clause providing for an area of ten miles has been retained ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is twenty miles now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was ten miles each way before—ten miles from the centre.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, and it was applied to all papers, and subsequently I think it was reconsidered and it applied only to weekly papers. Since then I think the bill has been further considered in the House of Commons. I cannot tell my hon. friend exactly how it stands at the present moment, but I shall be able to tell him at the second reading.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I may say, however, that I think it is a mistake. I do not see why any exemption should be made at all—that is, if it is to be abolished. However, we will discuss that by and by.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire to know from the Secretary of State whether he has made any inquiry about the balance of those returns for which I moved last year. I may inform him that the Printing Committee have appointed a sub-committee to deal with this question, and they cannot move until they get the papers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I thought all the information had been furnished, and I explained that there were no more to be brought in. However, I sent over specially to all the departments and got this return. There have been returns from the following departments: Indian Department, Post Office, Interior, Justice, Railways and Marine and Fisheries. There are here letters from the Deputy Ministers stating that there were no commissions issued in the cases of the Departments of Inland Revenue, Public Works, Agriculture and Militia.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And no dismissals?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Your inquiry had reference to those cases only where the dismissals were the result of commissions, the number of commissions and so on. I think we brought down the other returns.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There were no dismissals in the Geological Department, or the Governor General's office, or the Privy Council, nor were there any in my own office, nor in the Queen's Printer's.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And the Board of Works?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a letter from the Deputy Minister that there were no commissions. If they dismissed officials they did not go through the form of appointing commissions.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Has the hon. gentleman any returns in response to my motion, the one I asked for last year, as to the dismissals in the county of Montmagny?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will look it up and inform the hon. gentleman on Monday. I am constantly appealing to the other departments to furnish returns, and I must say they are greatly remiss.

Hon Mr. LANDRY—I will follow the hon. gentleman's example, and appeal constantly to the hon. Secretary of State.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would like to call the attention of the government to the fact that a return moved for by myself in the early part of the session, with reference to a report from the officers of the steamer "Petrel," regarding the observations made last year in regard to the winter crossing between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, has not been submitted. I want to know whether that return is ready to be brought down.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will make inquiry and let the hon. gentleman know on Monday.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, 30th May, 1898.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I desire to give notice that when the House resolves itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (16) "An Act to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act," I will move certain amendments. Perhaps it will not be necessary for me to read the proposed amendments to the House at length, but I will state in a few words what the meaning of the amendments is. It is well known that in the province of Ontario there is an appeal to the county court judge from the decision of the revising officer in framing the electoral franchise lists. There is also a similar appeal to the superior court judge, as I understand, in the province of Quebec—an appeal from the revising officers to the judiciary. There is likewise, I am informed, a similar appeal to the judiciary in the province of British Columbia. The object of my amendments is to give an appeal in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Manitoba, to the county courts of these provinces similar to that possessed by the other three provinces which I have named. The phraseology to accomplish that is lengthy and perhaps the House will dispense with my reading it. I am not strictly obliged to give this notice, but I put it on the paper in order that hon. members may have an opportunity of reading and studying it, and making themselves acquainted with it before they are called upon to vote on it. In that way I dare say the House will be very glad that I gave this notice of motion.

REPATRIATION OF THE 100TH REGIMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON rose to—

Draw the attention of the government to the question of the repatriation of the 100th Royal Canadian Regiment of the Imperial Service, and asked if any steps are being taken to secure the establishment of its headquarters at the city of Ottawa or elsewhere?

He said: Hon. gentlemen are acquainted with the question that I have put on the notice paper, as it has been before this House on another occasion. I had the honour of moving in this matter a month or six weeks ago, in order to give force to the petition that was circulated so freely in Canada and signed so very largely from one end of the Dominion to the other, that the 100th Regiment, which was raised in 1858 and had since been merged into the Imperial service under the name of the Leinster Regiment, might be restored to Canada under its original designation and in its recruiting power in order that it might be identified in the British service as a distinct Canadian regiment, and in the same way that Scotch and other regiments are designated, and in which capacity they serve and form part of territorial districts in the war. The war has been caused by the want of preparation in the United States and the weakness of Spain, together with a defective policy governing her colonies, especially that portion of them in the West India Islands. I do not think that we can have better evidence for the justification of any stand that we may think it necessary to take in Canada in order to strengthen our forces, than the position which the British government to-day occupies among the nations of the earth. If there is anything that is preventing the present war from extending its bounds it is the fact that the British government is strong to insist that the war shall be confined to the two nations engaged in it and let them fight it out on their merits. If this war is not extended to a great war throughout the world, it is due to the preparedness and strength of the British government all over the world and the force of its arms, its navy and its broad and liberal policy. To strengthen that policy and their arms is the privilege of the people of Canada, and where any responsibility attaches to our action in this matter we should not shrink from it in any degree, upon any general question as to the part we might play in making warlike preparations. Fortunately for us we have only to fall into the ranks, and by that means give strength to British arms and British policy. The time will no doubt come when international law will have the same force in the government of the nations of the world, as national law has in the government of a single nation. In the government of a nation laws must be wisely enacted and forcibly carried out or anarchy will result. On a larger scale the same principle affects nations, and peace or war result. British policy is to control the force that disturbs civilized nations, and subdue the uncivilized nations of the earth. We in Canada have shown great capacity not only in mastering the principles of government, but we illustrated it in the strength with which we enforced our laws in the rebellion which arose in 1885. There we had, in a distant part of this large country, some two thousand five hundred or three thousand miles away, removed from any railway base two hundred and fifty miles, in the midst of an Indian population that knew no power to suppress them except the power of force—we, with the United Kingdom. It may be called hon. gentlemen, a forward policy in our relations with the central power of the British Empire. As you are all aware, the response to that petition has of late been given effect to, and that the first battalion and the second battalion of the Leinster Regiment have been moved to Halifax. The first battalion of the Leinster Regiment is the Royal Canadian Regiment that was raised in 1858. It is linked with the second battalion of the Leinster Regiment which originally was the 109th Regiment. Now the object that we petitioners, and the people of Canada generally, have had in view is the return of this regiment to Canada when not on service abroad, and the transfer of its headquarters from Birr, in Ireland, to Ottawa, in Canada, in order that the commencement of its identification through recruiting here might commence. I am very happy to see that so far the Imperial authorities have given effect to the prayer of the petitioners, and to the wish of Canada, and I may say of this parliament, because the petition was signed by nearly every member of the last parliament and every senator in this House. I might premise my remarks by saying that there are some think that we should have nothing whatever to do with anything in the shape of warlike preparations—who think that peace is the great object to be gained. Now, peace is only to be secured by strength. We never can be assured of peace through weakness. We have a most remarkable instance of that before us, at the present moment, in the war that is now going on between the United States and Spain. No one will deny that had the United States been prepared with her military forces, ready to put forth her military strength to enforce any policy she might think it advisable to give effect to, either in the interest of her own country or in the interest of the peace of the world, there would have been no war. Spain would have respected her at any rate sufficiently to realize that the force of the United States was so great that it would be impossible for a nation like Spain to combat it in her possessions so adjacent to the American coast. On the other hand, if Spain had applied the right principles of government to her outlying dependencies and had sufficient force to give effect to her policy there would have been no cause for utmost promptness, within one hundred days from the first breaking out of that rebellion, were able to re-establish the peace of the country, and to protect the whole country from any extension of that Indian war and showed great capacity in dealing with it from a military standpoint. It is an extensive country we have to deal with, but we have a loyal and patriotic population, and a population very largely endowed with military instincts, and in consequence of the semi-civil and semi-military spirit we have developed, we were enabled to put down that rebellion and restore peace to our country and to establish it so firmly that the power of the government is now unquestioned. The accounts we have lately had from the Yukon country show the necessity of foresight in that direction by sending a contingent force there, and if it was supported by a detachment on the Peace River to prevent disturbances between the incoming miners and natives in that district, it would still be foresight, and in the extension of the British power, so far as it is to be extended to the various colonies and dependencies that have been brought into existence through a great number of years, is essential that we should bear our share in sustaining British power. One of the modes of linking our fortunes with the Imperial service and the simplest mode that presents itself at the present moment, is the question we have now to deal with, that is the repatriation of the 100th Regiment. That is a regiment we raised in Canada for the defence of the Empire—to aid Great Britain in putting down the Indian mutiny in 1857. We are not in a position to take a very prominent part in any financial assistance that might be considered commensurate at all with our duty in this matter, but we have a large recruiting ground. We have in Canada a very large number of young men who, I believe, would be glad and thankful for the opportunity that would be afforded to them by enlistment in the British army—men who very probably in their enterprise would drift away perhaps to other parts of the world or other colonies in South Africa or Australia. From an emigration standpoint any recruits that went into the British service we could not look upon as any weakness to Canada, because they are a class of men who desire to see something beyond their own neighbourhood and they take that means. The British service is very different to what it was in 1858 when I joined it, 40 years ago. The comforts that have been added to the life of a soldier are immense and are commensurate with any comfort that have been added to our civil life generally. Lord Lansdowne, Lord Wolesley and Lord Roberts have all advocated and carried out reforms of great benefit to the soldier, the latest of which is making his pay a shilling, clear, per day. It is no longer the old saying :

> When war is threatened and danger nigh,
> God and the soldier is all the cry ;
> But when war is over, and the country righted,
> God's forgot and the soldier slighted.

When I first went into the British service soldiers pay was four pence a day and liable to stoppage. It was paid daily and there were no reading rooms nor any other of the great adjuncts which have been added since that in the shape of gymnasiums and canteens, managed solely for the comforts of the men, and all those appliances which have made the life of a soldier very different to what it was formerly. The pay of a soldier in the British service is one shilling clear, or in familiar currency, seven dollars and a half a month. The outside clothing is furnished in the shape of a kit, two pairs of boots a year and all the clothing necessary. He has most comfortable meals and most comfortable accommodation, and with his food and clothing furnished him, all except his underclothing, he receives his shilling clear after two years' service, and in the British service one man out of every six receives additional remuneration to that shilling a day, which is the compensation a private receives. There are many other opportunities of increasing this remuneration, in the service as non-commissioned officers and other modes by which one man of out every six receives greater pay than a shilling a day. At the end of their service they get a pension. My Sergeant Instructor of Musketry in 1859 has enjoyed a pension of ninety cents a day since he left the service twenty years ago, and to-day is in remunerative employment with a salary of $1,500 a year. Another man writes to me from Windsor, saying, for the past twenty years he has been working as bridge foreman for the Grand Trunk Railway at Windsor. After their service, the recruits who join will return to Canada to finish their life's work, a valuable adjunct to the population. I mention these facts to show what the British army is, both in regard to its remuneration and comforts, to say nothing of being well trained, well set up, and taught obedience to authority, a most valuable characteristic. Everything is done to make the soldier's life more comfortable, and his occupation one which he can follow with respect to himself, and therefore it is by no means a disadvantage to any young man in Canada, who has a desire to see something of the world, to take the Queen's shilling in a regiment with which his own compatriots and countrymen are identified by the fact of being a Canadian regiment. Now, which is the best recruiting field ? That is one of the points we have to regard in discussing this question. Before doing so, I should like to read a couple of short references to the question I am now discussing, one from the London Daily Mail and one from the Army and Navy Gazette of the 14th of May, discussing this question. The writers say :

SHAMROCK V. MAPLE LEAF.

WILL THE WAR OFFICE DEFER TO CANADA'S WISHES?

13th May "Daily Mail" Special.

Precisely one year will have elapsed to-morrow since the reception by Lord Aberdeen, as Governor General of Canada, of a petition, or rather of 225 petitions, from different parts of the Dominion, praying the Home Government to repatriate the Leinster Regiment with an established depot in Toronto.

Nothing has been done since then, although the infantry of the British Army has been increased, and several regiments have been augmented by the addition of a third battalion. The opportunity voluntarily offered by the colony of opening up a fresh recruiting ground for the Home Army has been, as might have been expected, entirely ignored by the War Office.

The history of the 100th Foot (Prince of Wales' Royal Canadian Regiment) is rather an intricate one. It was the sixth regiment in the British Army to bear the number "100"; which was bestowed upon it when it was raised in Canada at the outbreak of the Indian Mutiny.

One of its predecessors, however—the old "100th or County of Dublin Regiment"—was intimately connected with the Dominion, having taken part in the American War between 1812-14, for which service the battle honour "Niagara" is borne upon the colour of its successor. But the Royal Canadians, in their present form, acknowledge a somewhat mixed ancestry, and exhibit strong evidences of the straits to which the military reformers were put in their efforts to bring the old organization of the Army to a fancied compliance with the necessities of TEUTONIC TERRITORIALISM.

To form the necessary linked battalion regiment, with its accompanying militia battalions, they were forced to bring East and West together in the 100th P.W.R.C. Regiment and the 109th, formerly the 3rd Bombay European Regiment. To find a common depot and the requisite militia they were compelled to go to Ireland, where they pitched upon Birr for the one and the King's County, Queen's County, and Royal Meath Militia for the other.

They found a sufficiently unweildly title in "The Prince of Wales' Leinster Regiment (Royal Canadians)," and made an attempt to preserve the magical

"100" by making Birr the centre of the regimental district distinguished by that number.

The wish to preserve the traditions of the two parent regiments resulted in a helmet-plate bearing the Prince of Wales' plume over two maple leaves (the badge of the 100th Foot), and the words "Central India" on a scroll commemorative of the service of the old 3rd Europeans during the Mutiny. The words "Niagara" and "Central India" are also placed upon the battalion regimental colour.

To make the changes requisite, in order to grant the wishes of the loyal Canadians, by making the 1st Battalion the Leinster Regiment once more Canadian, instead of Irish, would seriously overstrain the intellect of the British War Office.

It is a far cry from Birr to Toronto. The linked battalion system would be dealt a shrewd blow by such a change. And what would become of those anomalous Irish Militiamen, the 3rd, 4th, and 5th Battalions the Prince of Wales' Leinster Regiment (Royal Canadians !)—tare an' 'ounds?

It has been decided to open the Leinster Regiment at Halifax, Nova Scotia, for local recruiting. This determination is actuated by a desire to meet the wishes of those who recently petitioned for the establishment of the headquarters of the Leinster Regiment in Canada. The Canadians have now an opportunity of showing that they were in earnest when they sent in their petition. If they can show to the satisfaction of the War Office that they can keep up the proper supply of recruits they doubtless will succeed in their object, but the War Office could scarcely consent to allow the old 100th and 109th to be drafted permanently to Canada without a proper guarantee, first, that the necessary number of recruits would be forthcoming, and secondly, that the regiment would be available for any service for which it might be required. Both Lord Lansdowne and Lord Wolseley are naturally in sympathy with the Canadian demand, for they have both of them had experience in the Dominion, and appreciate the loyalty of the Canadians. But the wretched exhibition of bad feeling—not to say bad taste—with respect to Major General Gascoigne has, it must be admitted, done great injury, following as it does so closely upon the unfortunate incidents which resulted in the withdrawal of Colonel Ivor Herbert.

No one can regret more than I do the causes that draw forth that last remark, but that is the position in which the attack on General Gascoigne is viewed by military critics who write for the Army and Navy Gazette. It shows that the British Government puts on us the responsibility of showing there is a justification for the placing of this regiment with the object the petitioners had in view, and that is that recruits will be forthcoming in Canada. I am quite satisfied there is no difficulty in the world in raising recruits if the right steps are taken. The regiment's headquarters should be removed farther west than it is at present, namely, Halifax. Halifax, of course, is one of the garrison towns of the world, and is maintained for imperial necessities, such as a coaling station, and the headquarters for the North Atlantic fleet, which has been shown to be so absolutely essential in the present war between Spain and the United States when international law enforces neutrality in contraband of war and the closing of neutral ports. The weakness of those two nations, which is equal in that respect, lies in the want of these garrison towns and coaling stations, in the conduct of any war and putting forth their strength. It is our western towns we must look for soldiers. As a preliminary step the British government should give the uniform of the recruiting parties the distinguishing badge of "Royal Canadians" on their shoulder straps, and the depot for training of these recruits should be established, and if it should result in the establishment of a territorial district in Canada the linking of our Canadian establishment with the British service will be initiated. Now, the question of the location of the headquarters has very largely to do with our own government. I thoroughly appreciate, and I think the home government appreciate, Rudyard Kipling's remarks in that poem which created so much criticism, "Our Lady of the Snows," where he says:

> "I am daughter in my mother's house, > but mistress in my own."

And when it comes to promulgating a policy of this kind, by which we propose to unite our own Canadian strength with the British strength in the British service, it becomes a matter for consideration between the two governments as to carrying out of the policy that I am speaking of, and the British government also feel that it is necessary that barrack accommodation may be started here, because it would raise a controversy in the British parliament if they were to build barrack accommodation here when there is so much barrack accommodation available elsewhere. It is not easy for the British tax payer to realize the necessity of going to any further expenditure in building barrack accommodation in Canada when it is available elsewhere. Now I should like to read a communication received from Colonel Turnbull who was one of our cavalry offices of considerably long experience in the Canadian militia, and I think before he retired he was the Inspector of Canadian cavalry: He says:

SATURDAY MORNING, 21ST MAY, 1898.

DEAR SENATOR BOULTON,—Allow me to thank you for your kindness in enclosing me a copy of the Senate Debates with your valuable historical address upon the repatriation of the 100th Regiment, and now that the efforts put forth on that behalf have been crowned with success, and the Royal Canadians are again in Canada, I am most anxious that we should lose no time in supplying them with recruits, and amalgamating if possible our Royal Regiment Canadian Infantry with them as a 2nd Batallion.

As matters stand at present the militia authorities have so reduced the strength of Permanent Schools of Infantry that their usefulness as they stand are almost nil—and their maintenance a waste of money for all esprit-de-corps is dead, and no future in sight; while on the other hand the amalgamation that I suggest would infuse not only new life but give a permanent career with a few years of foreign service and possibly war experience to all ranks of those enlisting, at no expense whatever to Canada.

The future officering, too, of the Royal Canadians might come entirely from the Royal Military College, thus making this institution more popular with the general public; and if all the infantry instruction was under regular Imperial officers the present friction between the active militia and the permanent corps would be at an end, and the jealousy and want of harmony between these two sections of the same force cease.

In the distant future a third and fourth battalion could be added in times of emergency with comparative ease, as is being done at present with the Royal Fusiliers and several other British regiments, in those territorial districts where recruits are easily obtained, we would thus, I believe, cement the British empire more solidly together.

I feel certain if you would bring this change to the notice of the Minister of Militia he would lend his powerful influence in its support.

Believe me as always, sincerely yours,

I. F. TURNBULL.

That is a letter that I am very glad to incorporate into my remarks, because I think it contains a great many valuable hints for the Minister of Militia, and also the idea of linking our Royal Regiment of Canadian Infantry with the Imperial service, is one worthy of very serious consideration. However, these are matters which our government have to deal with and which I do not propose to touch upon any further than producing this evidence on the part of an officer who, I think, everybody who knows him realizes, possesses capacity and patriotism and is sincere in his devotion to the interest of Canada. The barrack accommodation that is afforded by our government is a question that I have also embodied in my remarks. I see by the papers that the cities of Toronto, Ottawa, Kingston, London and, I think, Quebec, are all competing for the honour of having the headquarters of the Canadian regiment established in their midst, which shows additional popularity in regard to the move that has been ably started and that has met with success so far as it has gone. I think, myself, that the centre of the country is the place where the regiment ought to be stationed, and possibly the city of Ottawa, the capital of Canada, might be considered as valuable a position to place the headquarters of the regiment as anywhere else. It is the capital of the Dominion, and anything that would add lustre to the capital of Canada is worthy of consideration by everybody. I do not desire to place myself in antagonism to any of the places that are desirous of having this regiment, but it does seem to me that if a move of this kind is to be made, and is to take any definite shape and to lead to the far greater results which Col. Turnbull's letter would indicate, and which I myself feel it would lead to, the headquarters where the government is situated, is a very proper place indeed; and so far as the recruiting is concerned, it will be more extended than merely in one place. The recruits will be drawn from all parts of Canada, and it is possible that other places may be utilized for the collection of those recruits. The ultimate result of the present efforts would in all probability be the establishment of a double battalian of Royal Canadians in the Imperial service, and linked with them a double battalion of our permanent corps maintained by the Canadian government, and interchangeable for service. When the young men of Canada see "Royal Canadians" on the shoulder straps of an Imperial regiment they will be ready to follow the colours and to take their place in the service of the empire. I can assure any one who has that object in view, that seven years of service for our young men abroad is one of the very greatest advantages that any one could wish for, that any young man can come back to Canada greatly advantaged by a tour of travel through the world without any expense to himself, and then return to civil life benefited by seven years of travel. I got a letter from one of the members of the 100th Regiment the other day, in which he said he had seen seven years service, and since then had been for twenty-four years continuously in the employment of the Grand Trunk Railway Company at Windsor. That shows that men who are enlisted for a time are not lost to the country. Every man who enlists for service abroad will return to Canada when his term is up with his savings, or, after twenty-one years of service, with his pension, to be a good citizen of Canada. I am only pointing this out to show that we will be great gainers by any effort that we may put forth in this direction, and that it is not only an advantage to the country from an Imperial standpoint, but also from the standpoint of the young men of Canada who may wish to see something of the world under the British colours. I had the honour of receiving a letter from Lord Wolseley when I enclosed him a copy of the speech which I made some time ago in regard to this matter, and which he was pleased to receive, and he wrote at the bottom of his letter, "How is it that we find so few assistant surgeons from Canada in the army?" There is an opening for the medical profession. I am sure that when our medical men learn that there is an opening of this kind, and that there will be a welcome for our young medical men in the army, many of them will feel that there is a great advantage in leaving the crowded ranks of the profession in Canada and turning their attention in that direction. I conclude by putting the question to the government on the notice paper at the same time expressing the hope that the question will receive their consideration.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite sure that we all share in the gratification expressed by the hon. gentleman from Marquette, in the matter, that the appeal made by Canada to the mother country to send the Royal Canadian Regiment to this country has been acceded to. I scarcely can agree with him in the very rosy picture that he draws of the readiness with which result will be obtained in Canada. I am afraid the Queen's shilling will not prove as tempting in Canada as in the mother country. In reply to this question, he has referred himself to a number of Canadian cities which have applied to be made headquarters for this regiment. The government have not considered the subject and therefore no action has been taken upon it.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I do not rise to add anything to what has been so well said by the hon. gentleman from Shell River. I do not think any Canadian would be found to oppose such a measure. I am sure the whole people of Canada would be delighted should Her Gracious Majesty be pleased to allow this regiment which was originally raised in Canada, to be quartered in the Dominion. No doubt the greater number of its members having been recruited abroad, are not Canadians, but it will, in a few years, consist entirely of Canadians if stationed in Canada. I rise to reply to one remark made by the hon. gentleman who has brought this question before the Senate; he said it was a pity that the United States were not prepared for war, because if they had been so prepared, Spain would not have fought. Such is not my opinion. I entirely differ from the hon. gentleman. I am sure that even if the United States had been fully prepared for war and had possessed a navy as powerful as that of Britain, Spain would not have submitted to injustice. No nation, I should think, however weak it may be, would submit under such circumstances before being crushed by superior force. This is not the first occasion on which a weak nation has gone to war with a powerful country, knowing that they would be defeated and perhaps ruined in the end; but there is one thing remaining after defeat, and that is honour, and I am sure that the sense of dignity and right in the Spanish people would have led them under any circumstances to resist the aggression of the United States, who have gone to war so contrary to international law and the principles of justice. No doubt the war will go on, and Spain will be crushed in the end, but Spain will be honoured for having done her duty while the United States will always have a stain upon its record and be regarded with distrust. It is well known that the Monroe doctrine is not yet dead, that the United States want the whole of America for the Americans. We are not going to submit to that, and as our turn will probably come to defend our rights if things go on, then I say it is only proper, though the mother country sympathizes with the United States, that we should give expression to our views and honour those who deserve honour and criticize those who deserve criticism for the criminal course they follow.

THE MILITIA EQUIPMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Did the Minister of Militia, when in England, cable authority to adopt the Oliver equipment? If such is the case, what is the wording of the cable?

2. It being reported that the Oliver equipment, as adopted, is materially different from the model sets sent for testing purposes, and further, that such an equipment is not the same as that reported upon by Major General Gascoigne, to what extent, in what particulars and on whose authority and recommendation has such a change been made?

3. Does the price of $5,000 given for the rights of Deputy Surgeon General Oliver's equipment include a full settlement, or will he, in addition, receive a royalty on each set made?

4. What is the name of the firm who are to manufacture the equipment? What is the price per set? What are the names of the shareholders in the company or companies who are to manufacture the equipment?

5. When were the ten sets of the Lewis equipment delivered to the militia authorities? When were they sent by them to the regimental depots of Royal Regiment of Canadian Infantry? If there was a delay of three months in the distribution of those sets, why was this delay permitted to take place, and was General Gascoigne aware of this fact?

6. Was any letter sent to the Honourable Minister of Militia by Captain Ernest F. Wurtele? If so, why such letter or letters have not been produced in the Return ordered by this House in connection with the equipment of the militia force? Will they be produced.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.—The following are the replies to the hon. gentleman's questions:—

(1.) I am not aware of any such telegram. (2). I am not aware that any change has been made from the pattern equipment of Deputy Surgeon General Oliver. (3). Full settlement. (4*a*.) The following are the names of the firms actually manufacturing the Oliver equipment: Adams Bros., Toronto, and Knight & Munro, Halifax. (b.) Price per set $6.45 without the valise. A certain number of valises are now being made by Adams Bros at $2.50 each, there being no money sufficient to order the whole quantity. (c.) The department has no knowledge who are the shareholders of said company,

5. When were the ten sets of the Lewis equipment delievered to the militia authorities?

On the 11th of September, 1897, Captain Wurtele was written to and asked to send us the ten sets of equipment to be tested. His answer dated the 13th of the same month was that there were in the militia stores at Quebec. They were deposited there on the 14th June, 1897. On the 27th Sept., instructions were issued by the general officer commanding to have them tested at the regimental depots to which the equipment was sent on the 1st October next.

(b.) If there was a delay of three months in the distribution of those sets, why was the delay permitted to take place?

The delay which took place is partly due to the fact that the ten sets of the Lewis equipment were not forwarded direct to headquarters, but left in stores at Quebec. However, this fact did not interfere in any way with a full and fair test being made of that equipment.

(a.) Was General Gascoigne aware of this fact? No.

(6.) Was any letter sent to the Honourable the Minister of Militia by Captain Wurtele (Ernest F.) If so, why such letter or letters have not been produced in the Return ordered by this House in connection with the equipment of the militia force?

They have been produced in a supplementary return on the 25th instant.

STEAMSHIP LINE TO FRANCE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER inquired:

1. In what state the negotiations are between the government of Canada and that of the French Republic regarding a line of Transatlantic steamers intended to give a service between the two countries?

2. Whether it is the intention of the government to grant $80,000 for this service, as has been announced for some months?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In reply to the two ques ions which the hon. gentleman has put, I may say the subject is before the government and is under consideration, but has not been finally disposed of, and so I am unable to give him any further answer at the present time.

MINISTERS' TRAVELLING EXPENSES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. How much did cost the voyages which were undertaken in 1897 by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the Honourable the Solicitor General, to Europe, to the United States or elsewhere?

2. Are these travelling expenses the expenses incurred by each of these two members of the administration individually, or do they comprise the expenses of a private secretary or of any other persons composing the following of each such member of the administration?

3. Were these members of the administration accompanied by their private secretaries?

4. Had these two members of the administration in their service other persons than a private secretary? Who were such persons and in what quality were they employed?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When the hon. gentleman placed on the paper questions of a similar character, as I explained to him in giving the answer, the premier gave his reply, which I communicated to the hon. gentleman. So far as the premier is concerned, the answers I gave on that occasion would be the answers to-day. I can give him no other. In regard to the Solicitor General, he has up to the present omitted to send me any information on the subject. I sent him the memorandum, but he has not forwarded any answer to me.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then I might be permitted to let the inquiry stand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think it would be of any use. I think it would not be answered.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—You think it will not be answered?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister the other day spoke of impertinent questions. I think, perhaps, that word might be properly applied to the answer given by the premier. The answer was that if I would wait for one year I might find the information in the Auditor General's report. The House has a right to some better answer than that. We are entitled to have some of the details of the public expenditure, and the House is not being treated as they should be when the minister tells us that the information can be obtained in the Auditor General's report. I am asking for further information to-day and what am I told? That I will not get any answer. The hon. minister says there is no use in leaving the question on the order paper, because I cannot get any answer—because the Solicitor General will not give an answer. That is the answer we get to-day. I put those questions before the public and I want the public to know how this government are prepared to give the information we are asking for. That is the way we are treated by the government. They are afraid to give the information. They dare not answer because they know the facts would condemn them and would show the people of the Dominion what course they are following to-day and that is why they do not want the public to know how they are acting. But I will ask the question again.

FRANCHISE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (16) "An Act to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act, and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act." He said: This bill is one of considerable consequence, as it affects to some extent the constitution of the House of Commons. The provisions of this bill are not novel to the Senate. At the time the Federal Union was adopted, necessarily the qualifications of voters for the return of members to the House of Commons was the same as the qualifications which, prior to the union, had existed in the election of members to the legislatures of the different provinces that were united; and so, in our first election, both for the House of Commons and for the different provinces, the qualification of voters for the election of members from each province to represent that province in this parliament was necessarily the same as the qualification for the election of members to the provincial assembly. Although we had on more than one occasion proposals made in the House for an elective franchise, peculiar to the House of Commons and distinct from that of the provinces, no such measure was seriously pressed forward and carried through the House of Commons prior to 1885; so that from the beginning of the existence of this Federation in 1867 until 1885 or, practically, 1886, there was no difference between the voters' lists of the different provinces and the voters' list of the Dominion. The elective franchise for the return of members of the House of Commons was exactly the same as the elective franchises in the same province for the return of members to the legislative assembly. No complaint was made of any injustice or any inconvenience arising from the adherence to that policy. It was found in many respects advantageous, and it certainly was inexpensive. A very considerable sum has been required to prepare new voters' lists since the Act of 1885 came into operation, which was not required prior to that period. I am not undertaking to maintain that there is any great principle at issue between the law as it stands and the law as it was, and as we again propose to make it. The question is rather a question of convenience. It was found that under the law from 1867 to 1885 the convenience of adhering to the electoral franchises of the province was very great. Under the United States constitution, from the beginning, they adopted this principle, and their constitution expressly provides that whatever may be the qualification of an elector for the return of a member to the most popular branch of the state legislature shall also be the qualification of an elector for the election of a member of the House of Representatives. That, I say, was the law practically which we adopted from 1867 to 1885, and that is the law which, if this bill comes into operation, will again be enforced. Now, objections are sometimes made to this proposal. It is urged that you are practically divesting yourself of the authority to say what the voters' list shall be, what the qualification of the elector shall be. That is a mistake. If this law comes into operation, and the party who is a voter in the province also becomes a voter for the purpose of electing a member of the House of Commons, it is by virtue and force of this statute that that is the case. It is by our act that that becomes law, and so far as the legislation is concerned, there will be no departure from the principle which exists whether you follow the one system or the other.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Then we are not going to have a private ballot in the province of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend speaks about a private ballot in the province of Ontario? We have nothing to do with the question of the ballot; we have nothing to do in this bill with the question of the manner in which the election shall be conducted; we are dealing in this bill with the qualification of the voter who is, when an election occurs, entitled to vote at the Dominion election; and we say that if he is a voter for the election of a member to the House of assembly in any province, he shall also be an elector for the return of a member to the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—With a numbered ballot?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The ballot has nothing to do with it. We have nothing to do with their system of election. Let me say, further, that while this country is a unit, it is composed of different provinces. These provinces have each an autonomy of its own; each is sovereign within its own sphere to the extent of its authority. That has been held over and over again by the courts, and that view has been affirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The province, within its own sphere, is sovereign; beyond that it has no authority, and we are sovereign to the extent of the authority conferred on us by the British North America Act. Now the constitutional distribution of power between the provinces and the Dominion is also a matter of convenience, and the principle of confederation is an important principle. But the object of the British North America Act was to make what were before distinct provinces one Dominion. For certain purposes we are one people; for all national purposes we are one people, and whether you look at the constitution of the provincial legislatures or whether you look at the constitution of the federal parliament, there is an assumption in both cases, and what I think is a reasonable assumption, that the people of this country are qualified for self-government. You do not undertake to say that the power that is entrusted to the one or to the other cannot be exercised because it is liable to be abused. You assume that it will not be abused. You assume that the force of public opinion, being a healthy public opinion, if mistakes are made or if wrong is done, will be right, and so you are for all governmental purposes a unit—power distributed for certain purposes to local bodies, power for general purposes vested here—but whether it be exercised by one body or the other, it is power legitimately exercised by those who are qualified by the constitution to discharge the duties that that constitution imposes on them. That being so, how can it be argued that the legislature of a province is not to be trusted with saying what the qualifications of a voter should be? What power do we part with in saying that? If that becomes law for Dominion purposes, for the return of members to the House of Commons, it becomes a law by virtue of what we do, and not by virtue of what is done in the local legislature. And so the question, I say, is one of convenience. It is a question whether we have the necessary machinery to efficiently, and without undue burden imposed on some person or persons, prepare a proper voters list. The experience of the United States pointed that out early in their history, and when they came to prepare a constitution some five or six years after they had existed as a federation, they expressly provided that the qualification for the return of members to the most popular branch of the State Legislature should be the qualification for the election of members to the House of Representatives. They are one people, divided into States it is true, but for national objects one people, and so they entrust to the State Legislature that is returned by the same men who return members to the House of Representatives that represents the same people, and if they are qualified to elect the one they are qualified also to elect the other. The same public opinion which would govern or control the election of members to the local legislature, in saying what the qualification of an elector should be, would control the House of Commons in the election of a member.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—From a different standpoint.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No from the same standpoint.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The constitution of the United States did not provide there should be a federal list, while in Canada it does.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, you are mistaken. The constitution does not provide there shall be a federal list. It is in the statute.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is a distinction without a difference.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it is an essential difference. If my hon. friend will allow me to proceed——

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman might answer questions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But the hon. gentleman is not putting questions.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that by this bill he is going to give a numbered ballot in the province of Ontario, the same as we have now in some places, which has been used to abuse the electors of the country? If that is the case I must oppose the bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This has nothing to do with the voting. It deals with the qualifications of the voter. But how the election shall be held, whether it shall be by open voting or by ballot, as under the Australian system, or whether it shall be by ballot that that is absolutely secret, as under our system, is a question which this bill does not touch, and with which this bill has nothing whatever to do.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. gentleman look at section 19 and tell me what it means? If I understand the reading of it, the latter portion of the clause provides for the manner in which the vote shall be cast and the marking on the counterfoil of a number and then a number on the ballot.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But there is nothing in this bill touching that question at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, the 19th clause.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, there is no attempt to alter the provision of the law in that regard. I was stating, when my attention was diverted from the subject, that the question is not one of principle but one of convenience, that the electors who return members to the House of Commons, the community for whom those electors speak, is precisely the same community that elect members to the provincial assembly. There is no difference, and if our system of parliamentary government works smoothly and with accuracy, is it not obvious to ever yone that a subject upon which the public have made up their minds must find its expression in the legislature in which their representatives sit? Whether it be the local legislature or the House of Commons, the community being the same, the public opinion of that community will find its expression in both houses, and the expression of that opinion, if it is in favour of manhood suffrage, will be equally expressed in both houses; if it is in favour of a property qualification, that will be expressed in both houses, and so whether you entrust each house with a separate power, or whether you make the one in effect speak for both, the result will be in the end the same. The only modification of which that general statement is susceptible is a modification due to the fact that the representatives of one province may interfere in the House of Commons with the opinions formed by a majority of another province, and so the collective result may be somewhat different from what the result would be, taken in detail. I think every hon. gentleman will see that that is so, and that being the case, you have a more perfect expression of the view of each province, as such, if the voters' lists are prepared by the authority of the legislative assembly in that province than you can in a House of Commons, where they are all combined, and where one may interfere with the fair expression of the opinion of the other. Now, why should we declare that the qualification of an elector for the return of members to the House of Commons, shall be the same as those in the legislative assembly of the province? Because they have the machinery for the creation of the voters' lists which we do not possess, and so that list can be created more efficiently, more completely, through the instrumentality of the municipal organizations which owe their origin to the authority of the province, and are within the provincial jurisdiction, than it is possible to produce by any machinery which we can contrive. That view impressed itself strongly upon the late Sir John Thompson when he was Prime Minister, and he introduced into the House of Commons a bill for the same purpose which we have in view in introducing this bill, of declaring that the qualification of an elector for the return of a member to the legislative assembly should be the qualification of an elector for the return of a member to the House of Commons. When you look at our constitution, as it was originally prepared and given to the delegates who went to England for the purpose of having it moulded into an Imperial statute, you will see that in that original draft it was not proposed to give to the federal parliament power to deal with the subject of the qualification of voters, or with the electoral lists at all, that the return of representatives to the House of Commons was to be in proportion to the population of that province, and it was the original scheme to leave to each province to decide what the electoral division should be, what the qualification of voters should be and everything relating to the constitution of the House that represented the different provinces in the popular assembly of this parliament. When the representatives were in England they changed that system. They conferred upon the central legislature the power to provide for the distribution of seats and also as to the qualification of voters, but in the first instance the qualification was to be that which existed in each province prior to the union, and that law was to continue until this parliament saw proper to alter it. That law continued until 1885. It worked so satisfactorily that for eighteen years it remained in force—that is, the principle: the law as it originally stood did not, because the provinces altered and amended the law, and we did not adhere to the law as it originally stood, but accepted the alterations and amendments which had been made by the provinces down to 1885. Now, I would venture to say that any hon. gentleman who sits in this House, and was formerly a member of the House of Commons, and was returned to that House prior to the alterations of the law in 1885, will remember right well that during the whole of the continuance of that period he had little or no trouble in respect to the voters' lists; he was put to very little expense. The publication, where the lists were published, was under municipal control; the preparation of the lists originally was a preparation by the municipal councils in the different townships in which, in almost every instance, both parties had representatives, and that list was so complete, was made so satisfactory in its original preparation that in scarcely an instance—that is in the province of Ontario—was it found necessary to appeal to the county judge, either to add or to strike off names, or in any way to modify the lists as they came from the court of revision. That was a very satisfactory condition of things. The men who prepared the lists were men who knew the people, men who were qualified by their personal knowledge, because each municipality, each village, each township determined who were the electors within the municipality; and as they were personally known to the gentlemen who constituted the court of revision, very little alteration in the list, as it was prepared, was ever called for. Now, that is a condition of things that cannot exist under the independent list prepared by the authority of this House. We have no municipal organizations, and when we undertook to appoint a party to prepare the list, as we did, we called him under, our statute as it is still in force, a revising officer; but he was not in any proper sense a revising officer. He created the list. The list was his production, and if he did any revising, it was the list that he himself had prepared that he revised.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—From where did he get it?
